5304. So that you would have the receiving order against her and proceedings in bankruptcy in the ordinary way?—I think so, and my reason for that is that the old reason for this restriction against married women seems to me now to have gone since the Married Women's Property Acts, and that, as the condition of affairs in that respect is altered, the law ought to be altered to meet the state of circumstances prevailing with regard to her liability.

5305. Assuming you could make the married woman bankrupt without an alteration of the law the trustee would always be met by the separate estate being restrained from anticipation?—Yes.

5306. It would be almost useless to extend the law so as to make married women bankrupt if you did not in some way or other deal with this restraint on anticipation?—Yes, it would be.

5307. Then what would be your idea as to dealing with it?—I could quite understand there might be a great deal of opposition to an attempt to remove the restraint on anticipation, but having regard to the inconvenience of retaining the restraint on anticipation, it seems to me that the time is quite ripe for removing it altogether. As I understand the position of affairs the restraint on anticipation was many years ago applied, I believe, by Lord Chancellor Thurlow for the purpose of protecting the private income of a woman from her husband—that is to say, in language of the old text books to prevent her from being subjected to the kicks or the kisses of her husband, to obtain from her against her will the income arising from her separate estate. Now, that being the case, when you come to look at what was intended by the Married Women's Property Acts to a very large extent the object of that restraint on anticipation goes, because of course the object of the Act of 1882 as most people (I think) thought was to establish a separate entity altogether on the part of the married woman enabling her so far as her separate estate was concerned to sue and be sued as an ordinary individual. If that is so, then I fail to see why a married woman should be made as it were the protege of the law, and supported, in regard to the income arising from her separate estate, by being stopped from anticipating it any more than anybody else. Perhaps I ought to add to that that the result would be, if you look at it in that way, that the restraint on anticipation ought to go, and that in the event of a married woman, with separate estate, being made a bankrupt, her separate estate, or at any rate the income, ought to go to the trustee.

5308. Lastly, as far as I am concerned, do you think that the getting into debt by married women who do not pay is a mischief which is of a prevalent character—I mean that there is a great deal of it?—I am convinced of that. My experience in the West End has taught me that. I am sorry to say that during the last twenty years I think it has been very much upon the increase. There has grown up a class who in my opinion—I am speaking personally, but I know it is the opinion of a great many other people who have to deal with these things in the West End—deliberately set to work to obtain credit and take all the advantage that the law gives them in its present condition to avoid payment. One frequently comes across cases where, I will not say there is clear evidence, but the strongest suspicion of collusion between the husband and the wife in order to bring about that result.

5309. (Mr. Barker.) I suppose if your wife or my wife ordered three or four dresses we should know that they had been ordered?—I should think so—most people would, I think.

5310. And somebody would have to pay for them?—Yes.

5311. And in many cases that you have cited the husband has known that the goods have been had?—One would assume so—in the ordinary course of life one sees ladies with dresses.

5312. And the same thing would apply to jewellery would it not?—Yes.

5313. You cite a case here with regard to Mrs. Holden. Did Mrs. Holden open the account herself and pay by her own cheque?—Yes, she did—that is the case of Paquin v. Beauclerk (formerly Holden).

5314. She opened an account in her own name and paid by her own cheque?—That is so.

5315. And that occurred I think three or four different times?—Yes, I think it was on three separate occasions that she paid cheques before the amount for which we we ultimately sued was incurred.

5316. Mr. Holden was never in the case whatever?—No, she merely said that she was Mrs. Holden and no enquiries were ever made as to whether there was a Mr. Holden. We simply thought we were dealing with the lady. Credit was given to the lady and the lady paid by her own cheques. She may have been Mrs. Holden, or may have been using the prefix "Mrs." without any authority. She may have been a widow.

5317. Then you sued her, I believe, for her debt?—That is so.

5318. And then what happened.

5319. (Mr. Addison.) That is all reported.

5320. (Mr. Barker.) You understand the case?

5321. (Mr. Addison.) Yes.

5322. (Mr. Barker.) I did not know you did. This is a particular case where a woman opened the account herself and paid by her own cheque?—We look upon that case, rightly or wrongly, as being a very strong case in our favour. The Married Women's Property Act, 1893, contains the provision that a married woman shall be deemed to bind her separate estate in all cases where she is acting otherwise than as agent. Now here is a case where a lady says that she is Mrs. So-and-So, and she pays several times with her own cheque. We never knew anything about the husband and the whole transaction takes place with the lady without there being any evidence that there was a Mr. Holden at all. What we feel is that if that is not "otherwise than as agent," that is to say if she is not acting on her own basis as it were, in paying with her own cheque, and dealing with her own goods, the bills not being sent in to the husband at all, it is rather difficult to imagine a case of "otherwise than as agent," and on those lines we were advised that it was a case that we ought to take to the House of Lords. We took it there, and as I daresay you gentlemen know, the House of Lords was divided. Two of the Law Lords were against us and two were for us. I should particularly like to refer the Committee to the judgments of Lord Atkinson and Lord Robertson on the matter.

20 Feb., 1907.

5323. (Mr. Addison.) That case will be before the Committee.

5324. (Mr. Barker.) Did the judge on that occasion state that "it is well-known in these cases you must take the good with the bad."—I believe one of the Lords Justices did say that in the Court of Appeal.

5325. (Mr. Richardson.) Did I understand you to put the case like this, that if a married woman goes to a shop and she orders a quantity of goods in her name, and does not say that she has the authority of her husband for buying them, and she is not asked by the shopkeeper or shopman with regard to whom she buys them for, but simply gives the name of Mrs. Thompson and buys a quantity of goods, if the shopkeeper sends them into the house that then she shall be liable to be sued for them independently of the husband?—We do; that is what we are contending.

5326. Do not you think that that would be a very serious step to take. Do not you think that the remedy is going to be far worse than the evil as it exists? Do not you think that it would be opening the door in tens of thousands of cases among the lower middle class to husbands encouraging their wives to go and trade in that manner when they know that the liability is going to be moved from their shoulders?—That may be so, but first of all I ought to say that I do not agree with that view at all. I think that the onus ought to be put on the women who makes the contract to say exactly what her position is. That is the point I make. Moreover if the woman is in fact the agent of her husband it would not free him from liability and if she is not in fact his agent you cannot make him liable. The husbands in the lower middle class can now secretly withdraw the authority and are, therefore, not liable—I do not suggest that a husband should not be liable for "necessaries." Then with regard to the question of whether it is a bad thing or not my answer is this, that the condition of the law now is extremely bad, because the whole trouble arises from the fact that the married lady is only assumed to be the agent of the husband. That authority can be secretly taken away in the bedroom getting up in the morning, or wherever else you like to think of, by the husband and that frees the husband from all liability. That surely is not a fair state of affairs. The point you put to me as to the lower middle classes does not seem to me very much to touch the case because I take it that more frequently these cases of husbands and wives arise in the higher circles and for greater debts. But, even assuming that you were dealing with a case in the county court for a small debt of that description, the woman has always got her proper protection by saying "enter these goods to my husband." That is my point, and that is the point I want to make, that the women ought to say if she wants to protect herself "please enter these goods to Mr. A. B." and the onus of proof ought to lie on her having done that.

5327. But if you do not insist upon the married woman when she is ordering goods declaring to the tradesman whether they should be charged to herself or her husband they are charged to the woman?—Yes, but the tradesman would have his remedy if in fact she was agent.

5328. I fear that that would be opening a very wide door to a great deal of evil amongst the lower classes you introduced a change in the law in that direction?—It seems to me that the present position is extremely unfair to traders.

5329. (Mr. Addison.) May I take it that the point of view from which you have approached this subject is that of the trader creditor? You have not considered the social aspect as affecting family life?—I think I have. I think I have looked at the thing all round.

5330. As affecting family life?—Yes.

20 Feb. 1907.

5331. Very well. I do not understand that you want to impose any greater liability on the husband than exists now ?—No.

5332. That is to say with reference to a question put by Mr. Barker where the wife has got, as you suggested a large separate income, the fact that the husband sees her dresses should be no reason why he should be liable to pay for them ?—No, that is so where she has got separate estate.

5333. Then coming to the question of the wife's separate estate, that generally proceeds not from the wife's own property, but from what her father or her relatives may have settled upon her intending to make a provision for the bringing up of the family ?—Yes, very frequently.

5334. If an extravagant wife is to alter the law as it now stands, by enabling any creditor who gets a judgment to take away that income that is defeating the intention of the settlor ?—Yes, the answer to that is—which is the most honest position, that is to say, whether the family should take advantage of a settlement which has been made, and obtain goods from a tradesman, and never pay him ; or whether funds which have come to the family for the proper upkeep of the family should be applied for payment of debts incurred for that purpose.

5335. I rather take another view—that the tradesmen should not be so ready to give credit until they have satisfied themselves as to what is the state of things ?—Of course that opens up the whole question of commercial credit in this country.

5336. Your point of view is that it is better to break up family settlements made by third persons in order that tradesmen may give credit ?—No, I do not put it as high as that. I do not say that it is better, but I think there is a middle course that could be pursued. I do not think you ought, as it were, to deprive the tradesman of his remedy against the income of a woman because somebody else has brought money into settlement which she has taken advantage of, and some of which may possibly go for the bringing up, the education, and the clothing of the family.

5337. So that any extravagant wife may defeat your intention or mine in making a family provision in that way ?—Up to a point.

5338. Up to what point ? I do not quite follow you. —What I wish to say is this. I do not see why a married lady should be able to escape the payment of her just debts, because she happens to have children any more than a man should.

5339. But the question is, is she to be at liberty to do something with a settled fund which the law at present says she has no right to do ?—She does what she likes with the income.

5340. I do not think it would be useful because I think that settlements would be varied in such a way that the result would be the same ?—Yes ?

5341. However, that is your view as regards that. Then in regard to the making a woman bankrupt—I am speaking as a husband—do not you see that where the woman is not a trader, but is merely an extravagant wife, what a terrible position you would put the husband in by the liability of his wife, to be constantly made bankrupt ? You may ruin the husband, he cannot allow his wife to be made bankrupt ?—You mean he would have to come forward from time to time.

5342. Yes ?—That may be so, but you have got the whole trading community to consider as against the individual.

5343. That is to say you would assist—I do not mean intentionally—an extravagant wife to ruin her husband ?—No, I do not put it as high as that.

5344. I do. I put it as the result ?—What I quite respectfully say is this. I do not like to see the law enabling parties to collude together for the deprivation of an honest tradesman of the payment of his just debts.

5345. Nor do I ?—Well, that is the present condition.

5346. It may be so in rare cases ?—They are not rare to me.

5347. I am only putting to you what might be the effect on you or me or any husband ?—I quite agree.

5348. Or upon any testator or upon any settlor from any such change in the law, that change in the law being made simply because traders will give credit without making proper enquiries and taking proper care ?—That raises the whole question if you are going to abolish the system of credit altogether in the country.

5349. I should very much like to do it in all cases affecting the purchase of articles of dress and ornament ? —That would make things very much easier if we could do that.

5350. My opinion will appear afterwards. However, you think that the trader's interest is so strong, that the consideration of the unfortunate husband and of the settlor or testator must be swept on one side for his benefit ?—If I may say so respectfully to you I think it is a question of honesty. These people have had the goods and they do not pay for them—you cannot get over that.

5351. I have nothing to say on the question of honesty ?—The real point, if I may say so again respectfully is this, that it is commonly found that the goods are had by a prominent member of the family and very likely applied only to herself though also very likely applied partly for the children and so on—I do not know—but at any rate a prominent member of the family has had the goods and the tradesmen who has supplied those goods has never been paid at all. Now, which is the proper thing to do ?

5352. It is very wrong ?—Extremely.

5353. But he should not have trusted her ?—That is the whole point.

5354. However, you have answered my question. You consider that the interest of the trader is superior to that of the husband or the settlor or testator ?—On the ground of general honesty I put it so.

5355. (Mr. Addison.) Very well, I follow.

5356. (Mr. Smith.) I am not sure that I quite understand the effect of the decision to which you refer. Am I right in supposing that the question of whether the married woman who obtains credit is acting as the agent of her husband or not may depend on facts which are not within the knowledge of the person giving credit ?—That is so.

5357. And not upon her own representation ?—That is so.

5358. And the judgment decided that the facts which were not within the knowledge of the person giving credit should be taken into account ?—I think they are.

5359. Or that they should not be taken into account ? —I think the question of whether the married woman is or is not the agent of the husband for the purpose of binding him depends upon whether the husband has secretly or otherwise withdrawn his authority from her to pledge him. Of course, if public notice has been given to tradesmen by A.B. that they are not to trust his wife that is a perfectly clear case ; but the law as it now stands is that it is not necessary to give public notice—that if the notice is privately given to the wife that she is not to pledge the credit that takes away the remedy of the tradesman as against the husband.

5360. (Mr. Addison.) I think in the particular case the husband said his wife had authority ?—In this particular case.

5361. In the Paquin case ?—He was an absconding bankrupt as a matter of fact, and we could not get hold of him.

5362. The evidence he gave—not very honestly—was I think that she had his authority ?—No, I do not think so.

5363. (Mr. Barker.) I think it was proved in that case that he had given her sufficient money to pay all her debts ?—Yes, that was part of the point, but that does not make it any better because even although the husband does give her money for necessaries there is nothing to make her apply that, and she may go and play bridge with it, and so on.

5364. (Mr. Barker.) Do you think that enquiries are made in every case before credit is given?—Yes, that is so generally in most businesses for which I am concerned.

5365. And do you know that private enquiry agents exist from whom information can be got about people who are not satisfactory and that everything is done to prevent a bad debt being incurred?—Yes, that is so in the case of most firms with which I am connected. Mr. Alfred R. O. Gery. 20 Feb. 1907.

5366. And this system of repudiation prevails in the higher classes?—Yes, as far as my experience goes. I have never come across it in another class—it is usually in the higher classes of society where it is found.

TWENTY-NINTH DAY.

Sir EDWARD W. FITZIAN.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. HENRY EDMUND TUDOR, called; and Examined.

5367. (Chairman.) I think that you are a solicitor of some considerable standing and have been for some years solicitor to the Hire Traders' Protection Association?—Yes. Mr. Henry E. Tudor. 27 Feb. 1907.

5368. One of the questions which has been referred to this Committee for inquiry and report is as to whether certain instruments should be registered or, in other words, made subject to a law analogous to that to which bills of sale are subject, and amongst those are assignments of book debts and hire-purchase agreements or hiring agreements. I think you have devoted a great deal of study to this question of the hire-purchase business, if one may call it so?—Yes, I have.

5369. And have had a considerable practical experience, I mean actual experience of the working of the present system by which goods are obtained on hire?—Yes, over twenty years.

5370. I would first like to ask you to inform the Committee of the trades represented by the association whose views you may be said to represent in what you tell us to-day?—They are all contained in a circular, copies of which have been supplied to the Secretary of this Committee.

5371. They are, I see according to that, the Agricultural Engineers' Association, the National Electric Manufacturers' Association, the Musical Instrument Trade Protection Association, the Furnishers' Chamber of Trade, the Institute of British Carriage Manufacturers, the Society of Motor Manufacturers, the Cycle Trades' Association, the Saddlers and Harness Makers' Association and the Sewing Machine Makers' Association. Are those large bodies most of them?—I believe so. Other evidence will be given on those statistics by other witnesses.

5372. Can you yourself give us of your own investigations the amount of capital that is invested in the businesses that are represented by those associations, or shall we get that from somebody else?—All those statistics I am afraid will have to stand over for the next witness.

5373. We shall have to get the statistics that are given in that memorandum from one of the members of the association, one of your committee?—Yes.

5374. Now I will just ask you first, in your judgment, would an alteration of the law which would make such instruments as hire-purchase agreements subject to the law as to registration be a desirable alteration of the law?—I do not think so, and for several reasons.

5375. Would you just give them to us in your own way?—Yes. In the first place I fail to see any ground for establishing a register of hire contracts having regard to the direct injury it would do to dealers, manufacturers, and those indirectly engaged in the different trades and to the hiring public. I think the only benefit you could possibly get from registration would be that it would show at a particular time goods were not paid for, and I fail to see that the knowledge whether goods are paid for or whether they are not should justify a person in giving or withholding credit. And for this reason—say the goods were actually paid for, and there is a butcher who, for instance, is uncertain as to whether he will give credit for £100. He searches the register and he finds that the furniture is paid for, but is that any reason why he should give credit, is that any reason why it should influence him at all? Those goods the day after credit has been given may be sold by the debtor or taken in execution or a bill of sale given over them. Therefore I think those are some of the reasons which tend to show that visible possession of goods is not a true basis for giving or withholding credit. What would be far more to the point, although one hardly likes to admit even this as a sound basis, is the rent which he pays for his house. If he paid £70 or £80 a year, for instance, that would tend to show that the landlord had made careful enquiries in all probability from bankers and so on, and that might be some indication as to whether or not credit ought to be given. Again I think a man's character really and truly is the true basis on which credit should be given or withheld, as has been mentioned in a good many law cases. Then I do not think registration would be of any use to high bailiffs, or sheriffs, or very little use, and for this reason. I do not think it is the practice to even search the Bill of Sale Office, and what takes place is you put in an execution, then the debtor says that there is a bill of sale, and then enquiries are made, but I do not think the register is brought into requisition anyhow at that stage. Now with regard to hire contracts you do not want that as regards high bailiffs and sheriffs, because it is to the debtor's interests to tell the high bailiff and sheriff, which he almost always does, that the goods are on hire, that he does not want his home broken up, and, therefore, by doing that he affords the bailiff or sheriff just that information that he would get from the register. The bailiff then writes to the execution creditor, the hire agreement is produced, and, unless there are very suspicious circumstances, execution is withdrawn and there is very little expense and there is very little trouble. Therefore, I fail to see how registration of hire contracts is going to benefit sheriffs or high bailiffs, and to show how very slight the risk they run is, there are very few cases I believe in which actions are brought against high bailiffs or sheriffs in respect of hired goods. I have only brought such actions myself on about five occasions in the last twenty-three or twenty-four years, and I have only heard of a very few cases, and if there had been many I should have heard of them because I have to write notes on all legal cases, from all cases which appear in the public Press every month, and therefore they come under my notice in one way or another. Therefore I say that registration would not protect, or be of any particular use to, those classes of persons. Then the other class of persons is the innocent purchaser. I do not think that registration would be of much use to him. I will tell you why, because if a person is going to be fraudulent what he would do would be this. He would transfer his goods to a friend in the next street. The person in the next street would then offer them for sale or send them to some second rate auction place, and if enquiries were made from him as to whether those goods were on the hire system or not what he would say would be this, "No, if they were on the hire system you would find my name of the register and my name is not there. You can be perfectly sure that I have got a title to the goods otherwise than by the hire system." And by that means the register would be used as an instrument of fraud, and so I fail to see that it would be of much use to the innocent purchaser. Then there is a further reason against aiding innocent purchasers. In only a very few cases, indeed nothing like one per cent., are hired goods sold in an improper way. Consequently there are very few of those innocent people about, and in those cases where there are, it is very difficult indeed to trace them, so that the innocent purchaser is very rarely brought to book. And are you in the interests of that very limited class going to impose on traders and on the hiring public an expensive and obnoxious system of registration ? In addition to that there is another reason why this class of person should be especially on his guard, and the old common law maxim, "Let the purchaser beware," stands good and it also shows the wisdom of it. When I took a test case up to the Lords—Helby and Matthews—under which the innocent purchaser or the innocent pawnbroker had a good title—so said the Court of Appeal—when the Court of Appeal held that, what occurred was this: pawnbrokers took in hired goods right and left. But as soon as Helby's case was reversed in the Lords they took ordinary and proper precautions and the consequence has been that those innocent purchasers and pawnbrokers are very scarce indeed now, and I very rarely get a case against a pawnbroker. But at that time I had, I should think, about 200 cases all pending on that decision. There was one pawnbroker—I am sure he did not do it with a criminal intent—but he actually advertised "hired goods taken in." I do not want to press that too far, because I cannot give you any details of it, and so therefore I say that registration is a very doubtful benefit to a very limited class of persons, and that so far no case has been made out why the hire trade should be penalised and compelled to adopt this particular system. I tell you what would take place undoubtedly if registration were passed. Dealers would sooner face the risk of bankruptcy and allow the goods to go to the trustee than have this registration. I think it is not any exaggeration to say, is it, that barristers and solicitors and other professional people would not altogether care for the public to know that they have got goods on the hire system, and in addition to that the biggest houses, because I got to know these things when talking over Helby's case on its way to the House of Lords—the biggest firms in London came to me, and came to many of us, and said, "We are very deeply interested in this hire system, but we do not want it known because the public are so sensitive. They do not care for people to know that they have goods on the hire system." It is not that they want to obtain false credit or anything of that kind, it is ordinary instinct. I suppose you do not want other people to know your private affairs. Now if it could be shown that the hire system really worked a hardship to others, that it was almost fraudulent, and that people were justified in giving credit on mere visible possession regardless of the circumstance of that possession, then there would be something to be said for registration; but I would only remind you that in all those cases under the reputed ownership clause which have been decided the very basis of them all is that certain hired goods, carriages and so on, do not come under the reputed ownership clause, because no one is justified in giving credit merely because people are in possession of that class of goods, and owing to the notoriety of the hire system it applies to a great many cases other than those that are to be found in the law books. Some cases are so clear that no trustee has the courage to face them. Take the case of a sewing machine. I do not think in the English Law Reports there is a single case establishing that custom. Why ? Because it is so well known that people will not do it. There is an Irish case, but I do not think there is an English one; I think it was cited in Crossley's case. So if you are going to say that registration is justifiable you have to say it is justifiable in the teeth of the decisions of those very learned Bankruptcy Judges in which they have held the hire system to be so well known they do not require, even in particular cases, evidence of the custom to be given—that no one is justified in giving credit merely because people are in possession of those particular goods, and therefore they do not come under the reputed ownership clause. I have no quarrel whatever to make with the terms of the reputed ownership clause; these are the words of it, if I may remind you for one instant, "Under such circumstances that he is reputed owner thereof." But if registration is going to be passed you are going to read into that sentence, "Under such circumstances whether he is reputed owner or not." Now to take a third person's goods to pay someone else's debt must be justified, if it can be justified, on some well-known ground. If I may just remind you for one instant of the history of the reputed ownership clause. In the reign of James I. when it was first passed it only comprised goods which were at one time the goods of the debtor, and the Judges and the Court have been very jealous about extending that doctrine. One of them has stated the reason.

5376. I think it was in Joy v. Campbell, because it was found, I presume, that it was done fraudulently, that the owner of the goods unconscientiously, as the law presumed, allowed them to be in the possession of the person who was not the owner ?—Yes, and in this particular quotation, if I may just read it to you, this is what Robson says in his "Bankruptcy." "It appears to have been but little acted upon for about a century after its introduction, and the policy of the doctrine has occasionally in modern times met with judicial disapproval, founded on the notion that credit is not given so much from regard to the goods in the debtor's possession as the general character which he bears. There is also an appearance of hardship in taking one man's property to pay another man's debts." And so in order to justify registration those who seek it ought to show in the first place that they suffer some admitted hardship and, secondly, that registration will remove that hardship, and, further, they ought to show that their interests so preponderate over the interests of all those different associations, the hiring public, and the dealers, that it is justifiable to take a third person's goods to pay their debts if they refuse to register.

5377. Of course what is perhaps pointed out on the other side with regard to the law, first starting with the reputed ownership clause, and then with the Bills of Sale Acts, is that it is desirable where there is a change of ownership and not a change of possession that the fact should be publicly known. Do I understand that you say that you think that unnecessary where the possession is changed under a contract of hire ?—I certainly think think in all cases where the person has been at some time the owner of the goods that the contract should be registered.

5378. But not in the case where he is not ?—Not in the case where he is not, and there are many weighty reasons why that should be so, and perhaps I may give two or three of them, because at first sight I do not think that it is quite easy to distinguish. If you put it this way to me, if registration is justifiable in cases of bills of sale then why not in the case of hire contract ? That is, I think, a point I ought to try and meet as far as I can. On that point in the case of registration of bills of sale, registration is a positive benefit to both the lender and the borrower. The lender can ascertain if there is a prior bill of sale by searching the register. If it were not for that knowledge he could not, with any degree of safety, lend money on that particular security. By the register the lender satisfies himself there is no prior bill of sale and the borrower is enabled to get his loan. By means of the register the borrower can avoid being harassed by executions because he tells the people, "There is a bill of sale and it is no use wasting money," and therefore you see there is not any injustice done to anyone. Whereas the registration of hire contracts would entail hardship and loss on both the owner and hirer, the public and the trades affected, directly and indirectly; it would increase the cost of the article, and increase the risk without any corresponding advantage such as the lender and borrower enjoy under the bills of sale. Besides, a hire contract is no evidence of poverty, as the judges pointed out in Helby's case in the House of Lords, whereas a bill of sale is direct evidence of poverty. Therefore as it does not injure anyone, it is of some use to the public, and that is one of the distinctions why it is directly justifiable in cases of bills of sale, but quite unjustifiable in the case of hire contracts. Then there is just this one practical difficulty—if there is any truth at all in the statistics which are going to be read before you—namely, that there are existing something like 8,000,000 hiring contracts. How on earth are you going to erect a register to contain all that vast number of contracts? All of them would be in a central registry, and just think of the number of names under each letter of the alphabet that there would be. Then you may say, "We can get over that difficulty, partly, by saying that goods under the value of £30 are not to be registered." While that would get rid of some millions, there would still be some millions left to deal with. In addition to that, on what principle can a piano, say, worth £28, be exempt from the trustee, whereas a piano of £31 is to become the property of the trustee? It would only be arbitrary. It could not be justified on any ground of justice, and convenience is not a sufficient ground for drawing the distinction. You must either have registration, I should have thought, entirely or not at all.

5379. Would you think that the present system need not be altered for the protection of execution creditors, high bailiffs, and rate collectors, who sometimes find they have seized goods which are really the property of the owner and are rendered liable to actions accordingly? —I do not think it is necessary for the reasons I have given. There are very few actions brought indeed and the notoriety of the hire system puts people on their guard, and they make inquiries, as they would, I suppose, if there was a register.

5380. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I see you state as one of the strong reasons against the registration of these agreements that people ought not to be deceived by mere visible possession?—Yes.

5381. But do not you think that registration would get rid of that difficulty? They are deceived by visible possession at the present time?—I do not think so. I think they give credit by reason of competition. I do not think anyone gives credit simply because a house is well furnished, and I do not think they ought to, having regard to the hire system.

5382. Is it not your opinion that traders take all reasonable precautions they can before giving credit?—No.

5383. To ascertain the position of the persons to whom they are giving it?—I will assume for the sake of argument that they do, but would the register help them?

5384. Pardon me, that is hardly answering the question I put to you. Do you think that traders recklessly give credit, or do you think that they take every opportunity known to them to ascertain the position of the person who is asking for credit before giving it?—I think the ordinary creditor works, if I may say so, between those two extremes.

5385. Do you not then think that it would be to the advantage of creditors, if they knew that the property in the possession of any particular person was not his?—No, not in this particular connection.

5386. Why not?—Just because it is his property at that time it does not at all follow that it will be his property at the time the creditor wants to put in an execution.

5387. Of course we know that, but we are dealing with the subject at the particular time that this transaction takes place. It is not necessary to state that afterwards the conditions may change?—I do not think it ought to affect the person one way or the other—I am afraid I am repeating myself—for the reasons I have given.

5388. Then you give as a reason against registration that the hire system is well known, and the bankrupt or the judgment debtor, as the case may be, at once informs the trustee or bailiff that certain goods are on hire, which statement is easily verified by inspection of the hire contract." What I want to get at is this: what security is that to the person when he is giving credit—it is too late to ascertain the fact when the bankruptcy has intervened?

5389. The trader wants to know at the time he is giving credit as to the position of the person to whom he is giving credit?—But I say that that is a false basis on which to give credit.

5390. What is the false basis—visible possession?—Yes.

5393. They would show whether the property was his or not?—But I go so far as to say that that ought not to influence him either one way or another.

5395. But the presumption is that way—the presumption is that he cannot pay for them because of having acquired them by the hire system?—I do not think so—as the Judges have pointed out in the House of Lords in Helby v. Matthews. They say that there may be various reasons why a person does not see fit to pay for goods at the time, and one of those reasons is this: that he has not made up his mind as to whether he will exercise the option of purchase and so he thinks, "I will go on hiring and then if I want to buy I will buy later on."

5396. But is it not notorious that this hire system has tended to an enormous amount of fictitious credit being given to persons who otherwise would not obtain credit at all?—I do not think so, and I do not think that persons ought to be encouraged to give credit on a fictitious basis.

5398. Are you aware that the parties who are asking for the registration of hiring agreements are the traders themselves?—Oh, yes.

5400. (Mr. Chamberlin.) But the trade protection societies would be only acting on behalf of their clients?—That would be all.

5401. (Sir Edward Fithian.) Are you aware that chambers of commerce are strongly in favour as a whole of the registration of hire agreements?—Yes.

5402. And would you consider the institution with which you are connected as solicitor entitled to have as much importance, weight and influence given to it as a chamber of commerce such as the London Chamber of Commerce?—I think, if I may say so, that is a misleading question, though I am sure you have not put it in that way intentionally. I think it ought to be compared with the very strong list of trades affected by the hire system with regard to whom evidence will be given shortly.

5403. Of course, we have had no evidence of that kind yet?—No.

5404. But the evidence we have received is in the main I think rather the other way. Can you tell me what distinction you draw between the case of bills of sale and hire agreements, apart from the question of the original ownership of the property ?—Yes, I thought I gave one or two reasons, and one was that registration actually aids both the borrower and the lender in cases of bills of sale.

5405. I would suggest to you that the registration of bills of sale was not introduced for any purpose of that kind, but for the protection of outside traders, and in regard to outside traders I would like to know if you can draw a distinction between the two cases ?—In the case of a bill of sale it invariably deals with goods which were originally the property of the person giving the bill of sale.

5406. I omit that point altogether and I ask, apart from that, dealing with the question of traders, and the general interests of traders, what difference is there between the hiring agreement and the bill of sale so far as the creditors are concerned ?—There is the notoriety of the hire system which ought to put everyone on their guard and which ought to prevent creditors from supposing that the holder is the owner, and that is the basis of all the cases under the reputed ownership clause.

5407. But assuming the question of notoriety exists, what advantage is that to an individual trader unless he knows that in this particular case such an agreement has been entered into ; it is of no advantage to him, the general question of notoriety ?—I think so in this way.

5408. Why ?—Because it ought to put him on his guard ; he ought to say to himself, "In all probability the person in possession of these goods is not the owner owing to the notoriety of the hire system ; but whether he is or whether he is not it ought not to influence me in giving him credit."

5409. But surely that very same argument would apply to bills of sale, and Parliament has decided otherwise in favour of registration ?—As regards Parliament and registration, to show you that Parliament does not attach quite so much importance to the infallibility of the register, even goods which come under the Bills of Sale Amendment Act may still come under the reputed ownership clause. Although they are on the register yet Parliament seemed to think that the register affords so little information that it can still come under the reputed ownership clause.

5410. I am afraid I do not follow you on that point?—Possibly your president would.

5411. But in regard to the policy of the 1882 Act as well as the policy of the previous Act that was entirely in the direction I indicate, namely, for the protection of the ordinary trader ?—Yes. I have tried to point out to you that in the opinion of Parliament the Act of 1882, in ordering registration of that class of contract does not think it at all conclusive—not the information given by the register—otherwise the goods would not fall under the reputed ownership clause.

5412. But under both Acts the bill of sale must be registered ?—Certainly.

5413. Both under the 1878 Act, and the 1882 Act ?—Yes ; but as I pointed out, there is this very great distinction that registration does not work any hardship in the case of a bill of sale, but it does in the hire agreement.

5414. I may go a step further as indicating the policy of Parliament in this matter, namely, that the Deeds of Arrangement Act also required registration exactly in the same way and for the same purpose. The object of the Act was to benefit traders so as to give them an opportunity of knowing the position of the person concerned ?—Yes, but that Act dealt only with the debtor's own property.

5415. (Mr. Addison.) I understand you cannot speak as to the extent of hire purchase transactions ?—No, I cannot, but if there is any substance at all in the statistics which are going to be laid before you there will be something like 8,000,000 hiring contracts always in existence. I think you can work it something in this way—if there are 2,000,000 entered into annually and if they run out about every three years you get 6,000,000 in that way. Then allow 2,000,000 for contracts which are not completed within the time and so you would get something like about 8,000,000, if the 2,000,000 per annum is correct.

5416. Are the particulars which are going to be given limited to hire purchase or to other hiring agreements for goods ?—Hire purchase only, but if I may say it at this point if registration is to apply at all of course it ought logically to apply to hire contracts as well as hire purchase—there are three different classes of hire purchase contracts.

5417. Yes, I was rather anxious to know whether we should get the full extent both of hire-purchase agreements and of hiring agreements as well.

5418. (Mr. Richardson.) You say that a butcher searches the register, and if he finds that the furniture is paid for that that is no reason why he should give credit ?—No.

5419. Supposing he had the opportunity of searching the register and of finding that the furniture was not paid for, but that it was on hire purchase, what would be his position then ?—I do not think it ought to influence him, and I feel quite certain in point of practice, that it would not influence him, by reason of competition.

5420. You are quite certain in practice. Do you not know, sir, that it is getting quite common—it is in my district—for a traders' local association to be formed of butchers, bakers, and those who deal in perishable goods for the particular purpose almost of finding out, if they can, whether the goods of people coming to live in their particular district are on the hire-purchase system or not ? Do you know that that is the case, that these local associations are being formed for the special purpose of finding out that information ?—Then can I take that case. Take the case of the butcher and assume that he finds out that these goods are paid for—does that justify him in giving credit ?

5421. You are leaving the point, sir. If you were a butcher—I put it pointedly to you—and you saw that the goods of a would-be purchaser were held under a hire-purchase agreement, you would not give him credit, would you ?—I would, certainly.

5422. You said that, of course, the next day if he were the owner of the furniture he might assign by a bill of sale ?—Yes.

5423. But that bill of sale would be registered and it would become common knowledge that his goods were under a bill of sale ?—Then it would be too late. The point I take up is that that circumstance one way or a another ought not to affect him as to whether the goods are paid for or not.

5424. Then you said that a man's character and the house he occupies, being at a rent of £60 or £70 a year, should be the true basis on which credit should be given. It is the first time I have heard anyone say that the value of the house which a man occupies is any indication of his ability to pay his debts ?—Indeed. I thought it was common knowledge that doctors are rather influenced by the amount of rent which a person pays when they are making their charges.

5425. I am afraid they are more influenced by the furniture which is in the house, whether paid for or not ?—What about marriage settlements, and so on ?

5427. That is practically the old system of trade ?—I do not know what you mean by "the old system of trade."

5429. Then you say here that no one has been deceived by visible possession ?—I said no one is ?—ought to be deceived.

5430. You say no one is. I suppose you have known a good many who have been deceived?—Certainly, but I say nobody ought to be.

5431. In pointing out the difference between a bill of sale and a hiring agreement you said, of course, in the case of a bill of sale the property was the property of the owner. Is it not the fact that in the bulk of hiring agreements that at least a part of the property has been paid for?—Oh, never, except in some very exceptional cases which you need not take into consideration.

5432. I do not know anything about them. I have never had one, but I have always been under the impression from what I have seen advertised that so much had to be paid down, and then so much a month afterwards, or so much a week, is not that so?—Yes, but I will tell you what I think is in your mind—you are under the impression that as the goods are paid for they become the property of the person hiring.

5433. Oh, no, I do not. I know that the trader retains his hand on the whole until the whole lot is paid for, but I say this, that when a man has paid 20 per cent.—if he does pay 20 per cent.—that when he enters into the hiring agreement he is already paying 20 per cent. of the value of these goods, and that 20 per cent. really and honestly at that moment is his—is not that so?—No, because the customer has the use of them, and therefore that 20 per cent. would go towards the use of those goods, It may not culminate in a purchase at all—one cannot say. The person may not have made up his mind one way or the other.

5434. Then you say under Clause A., "As a person's general character and estimation as a merchant is the true basis of credit, and not the visible possession of goods no person is justified in giving credit by reason of such possession, and he only has himself to thank if he does give credit on a false basis." Do you see any reason why dealers in unperishable goods should not deal on the same lines as those who have to deal in perishable goods?—I see very great reason, if I may say so, it has always been the policy of the English law to allow freedom of contract, and it is not for one portion of the community to dictate to the other the way in which they are to trade.

5435. No, but I take it that it is for the legislature to take care of one set of traders against the policy of another, and to prevent, as you say here, one-sided protection. At present it is a one sided protection. Dealers in non-perishable goods have the best protection as compared with dealers in perishable goods?—If I may say so, I do not know that that is the comparison. I think you have got to show that the dealer in perishable goods has a right to someone else's property—that is what you have got to show in order to justify registration.

5437–8. (Chairman.) That is rather a matter for argument.

5439. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I take it that one of the principal answers you have against legislation is contained in your statement, both verbal and written, that a person's character should be the true basis of credit?—Yes.

5440. His general character and the estimation in which he is held?—Yes.

5441. How is that general character and estimation to be arrived at?—That, of course, would depend upon the particular circumstances of each case, and it is, of course very difficult for an ordinary tradesman, like the butcher and the baker, to arrive at anything very definite on that.

5443. Would it be very helpful to inquirers to know whether the household furniture of a man belonged to him or belonged to someone else?—I do not think that it would be of any material assistance. It might well be that every stick in the house might be his wife's property under a settlement. It does not at all follow that that man is not in receipt of some private or professional income which enables him to meet all his engagements quite apart from the fact as to whether he is the owner or merely the holder of the goods in his house.

5444. But character and estimation do not pay debts, do they?—No, they do not pay debts—of course not, but that is not the reason why you should take a third person's goods to pay a debt with.

5445. But, supposing a tradesman is asked to give credit and he makes inquiry as to the standing and position of the would-be debtor, and the trader gets an answer to his inquiry that the man lives in a well-furnished house, he appears to be in good circumstances and so on, do you think if it comes out afterwards that the house of furniture belongs to someone else, it would not make a good deal of difference as to whether he would obtain credit or not?—I do not think it ought to affect the person giving the credit.

5446. (Mr. Barker.) You are opposed to any hire agreements being registered?—I am entirely.

5447. Of any kind?—Except in cases where the person had been the owner.

5448. State the cases, please?—In every case except where the person has been originally the owner of the goods; but in all probability those cases are all covered by the present Bills of Sale Act.

5449. (Chairman.) Yes, they are.

5450. (Witness.) And so I can say in every case.

5451. (Mr. Barker.) If a manufacturer has machinery on hire under the hire system, you do not think that that should be registered?—No, certainly not.

5452. Have you had much experience in hiring agreements?—I have had a very great deal of experience in hiring agreements.

5453. Would you tell the Committee, please, about the rate of profit that is put on?—Oh, as to the profit I cannot speak—I was only speaking of the legal aspect.

5454. You cannot tell me that?—No, but might I just say on that one point, as we are on the point of registration that I fail to see how any profit, however great——

5455. I do not want to know how you fail to see. I want to know if you can answer the question?—No, I cannot.

5456. Do you know that a very large profit is charged on goods obtained under a hiring agreement?—A large profit is in a good many instances, but it all depends on the nature of the goods, and nature of the risk and the particular firm.

5457. And the character of the man, I suppose, whom you trust?—Yes, and the character of the firm.

5159. You know whether he is an unprincipled man or not?—As an ordinary rule, and just because goods are unpaid for, it does not show that the person is not going to meet his engagements, because you can be perfectly certain that the hiring trader has made some rather careful inquiries as to his customer being able to fulfil his engagements.

5460. But do not you think it necessary for a man who lets a house to know whether the furniture which is coming into the house is paid for or not?—No, on account of the law of distress.

5461. I do not want to know on account of—I want you to answer the question. You do not think that it is a matter for him at all to inquire into?—Not a bit.

5462. Would you tell the Committee if in your opinion the hire system has increased enormously during the last five or ten years?—I do not know whether I can put my finger on the figures as to five years.

5463. Well, ten years?—It goes on increasing.

5464. I want to know whether it is your opinion that the practice of obtaining goods under the hire system has increased enormously during the last five or ten years?—Yes, I say so undoubtedly, and especially in the book trade—The Times "Encyclopædia" and so forth.

5465. If a man had a good character according to your argument there would be no necessity for a bill of sale?—Oh yes.

5466. Why?—A man wants to raise money and he cannot raise it because he has other engagements, and therefore, although he may be perfectly honest he is obliged to obtain the money by means of a bill of sale because there is no other way.

Mr. Henry E. Tudor.
27 Feb. 1907.

5467. I suppose you know that it is a common thing for hired goods to be seized at times, through ignorance, by traders ?—Oh yes, certainly.

5468. A very common thing ?—Not a very common thing.

5469. Well, it is not an uncommon thing ?—No, but the average fraudulent hirer would work out at considerably under 1 per cent. of the number of hirers.

5470. On the whole you think that it is not necessary that traders should be protected so that they may know the monetary position of the people they trust ?—I do not think so.

5471. You seem to think that it is only character you should go upon, and respectability, and the rent of the house ?—Yes, I think those are the chief elements.

Mr. William John Weller, called; and Examined,

Mr. William J. Weller.
27 Feb. 1907.

5472. I think you are principal clerk in the Bills of Sale Registry of the Royal Courts of Justice ?—That is so. Also the Deeds of Arrangement. They are a combined department.

5473. I think the registrar—one may call him the titular registrar—is the senior master ?—The registrar of deeds of arrangement is the registrar of bills of sale, and the registrar of the bills of sale is either one or all of the masters of the Supreme Court.

5474. But I think you are practically the head of the office ?—Yes, principal clerk of the department.

5475. And it is a large department, is it not ?—It is a large department in point of work, very large, but it is not a very large department in point of staff. There are five clerks for the combined department.

5476. And as I think you were just saying you have under your charge the registration of bills of sale, and the registration of deeds of arrangement ?—That is so.

5477. And the two procedures are substantially the same, are they not ?—There are points of resemblance. For instance, bills of sale and deeds of arrangements have both to be registered within seven days of execution. In that there is a similarity, but I do not think there is a similarity in any other way.

5478. Except I think that a file copy is left in each case with affidavits ?—That is so. The only thing is that with a bill of sale there is one affidavit of execution, and with a deed of arrangement there are two, one by the debtor and one of it's execution by him.

5480. And of deeds of arrangement ?—About 4,000.

5481. Have you any notion, so that you could give us it within certain figures, what the amount of assets and liabilities included in the deeds of arrangement is ?—I am afraid I cannot, but I did make some years ago an analysis for one quarter. I know that it came to a very large sum—over a million in money; I should say that the totals were very nearly half as much as the totals in bankruptcy all over the kingdom.

5482. I think that you have given some attention also to the subject of administration under deeds of arrangement ?—Yes, that is so.

5483. Two questions that have been referred to this Committee for inquiry and report are whether it would be expedient that there should be increased official control over trustees under deeds of arrangement by audit of their accounts, and that they should be required to find security and so forth—have you given some attention to that ?—I have given considerable attention to it.

5484. Then would you favour the Committee with your views on the question ?—I think that the blot, as far as I am able to form an opinion, on the Deeds of Arrangement Act, is the want of efficient control over the trustees' accounts. Supposing this control and there was an audit or taxation of those accounts I think it would be shown that this Act, which is for the benefit of creditors, would produce a maximum amount of good. I mean by this that most of the money possible to be extracted from the estates would find its way, less the legitimate charges of the trustees, of course, into the pockets of the creditors.

5485. That would be by means of audit ?—Audit, and I should think taxation. If you mean by audit simple examination, I am not clear that that would be sufficient. We might not understand audit in the same way.

5486. By audit I mean the audit which goes on for the trustee's accounts in bankruptcy, where he has to produce vouchers of all his expenditure, and satisfy the Board of Trade that his expenditure is within his powers as trustee ?—I should hardly think that that would be sufficient unless you have power to fix on a certain item, and say "That is too much. You ought not to be allowed so much." Otherwise you do not get on very far. You have vouchers for what payments have been made, but there are a good many other things, for instance, trustee's remuneration; that may be estimated, and an amount which may be perfectly reasonable in one case may be the reverse in another.

5487. Would you go so far as to suggest that there should be a scale of fixed remuneration for trustees under deeds of arrangement ?—In some cases. If I might I should like to refer to the figures which are given in the last Report of the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy, more especially with regard to the first five columns. It appears that this table deals with 3,068 cases. Of those, 1,807 are concerned with estates of £200 or less, and by referring to the column which gives the percentage of costs you find that they vary from 88·12 to 33·13 per cent. Of course I am not an accountant, but it does appear to me that this is very extraordinary considering that this Act is under all the circumstances especially one to be worked in the most economical manner possible—I may explain what I mean by that. To begin with, in all these cases, there is only one court fee to be paid, and that is a matter of £2—that is paid when the deed is registered, and directly it is registered, the trustee takes possession, and he is not further interfered with by anybody. He deals with the estate, and he realises and pays the creditors. There are no constant applications to the court. There are no official fees to be paid in any shape or form, and therefore one would think that realization could be done in a very reasonable way. The lowest figure given here is 33 per cent.—I have discussed the matter with people who understand it, and they think with me that 20 per cent. costs in cases like these would be sufficient. Of course I do not want to say anything at present as to the larger amounts, because as regards those a different state of circumstances arises, but in all the smaller cases I have mentioned, where the charges are so high, invariably under those deeds the trustee is the debtor's trustee. He is a man who is put in either by the debtor, or by the debtor's solicitor, and I do not know whether it would be going too far to say that in many cases he is the debtor's agent. Now what can you expect under those circumstances ? Not very great solicitude for the interests of the creditors. And there is an additional reason, and that is, that the trustees apparently allow a very long period to elapse before they wind up the estate. If they realised at once, and there is no reason why they should not, the results would be much better. It is to the interest of the creditors that a realisation should take place immediately. You do not want to protect the estate. You cannot improve the estate—the thing is to realise and wind it up, and if it were wound up quickly, within a fixed period—because the three months does not come in if you do not anticipate bankruptcy—there is every reason to believe that the current expenses which must be running whilst the business is not wound up would all be saved, and the creditors would be getting what they are entitled to, that is, the major portion of the estate.

5488. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Do I take it that you tell the Committee that in your judgment the cost of winding up an estate by a deed of assignment is more costly than under bankruptcy ?—No, I do not give any opinion about that at all.

5489. But you speak about the trustee's remuneration? —Yes.

5490. And you gave us some of the percentages?—Yes.

5491. I take it that you have compared that with the cost of winding up the estate?—No, I have not. I am only dealing with a case under the Deeds of Assignment Act.

5492. You say that you think that there ought to be an audit of trustees' accounts?—Yes.

5493. By the Board of Trade?—Yes.

5494. And you say, so I understand, that the trustee is not to be further interfered with?—I mean that when once the deed is registered the property passes to him.

5495. Of course you know that under a deed of assignment there is always a Committee of Inspection?—Not always—oh dear no—not in these cases. My remarks are confined strictly to those cases under £200. It is quite a different thing in the larger cases. I said so purposely. The same remarks are not applicable to the larger cases at all. It is only as to two-thirds. I was struck in going through these figures by the fact that two-thirds of the deeds of arrangement—two-thirds of the complete total—are for sums of £200 and under. I was struck, when I know how small the expenses are, by the great amount of the costs, and I said to myself—"How is this?" Then I understand the trustees are bound to send in to the Board of Trade once every year in January, an account. That account goes to the Board of Trade, and the trustees having then done their duty in so forwarding, it would not matter if all the accounts showed to a reasonable man of intelligence at the Board of Trade that the charges were grossly in excess of what they ought to be, because there is no power anywhere to take a penny off. That is all I mean.

5497. Because I put it to you that in the bulk of winding, up estates under deeds of arrangement it is the creditors and not the debtor, who appoints a trustee?—Oh yes, that is so with the larger estates; but what happens in these small cases is this: a debtor is served with a writ. He owes, we will say, £300 and goes to his solicitor and the solicitor says: "Very well, there is only one thing for you to do; you must execute a deed of arrangement." He goes and gets a simple form, executes that, puts in anybody he likes as trustee, and it is not likely that the man who was put in would be opposed to the debtor or the debtor's solicitor; he would probably be acting principally in their interests.

5498. The usual way, if I know anything about it, and I ought to, is that it is the principal creditor who is selected under such circumstances?—Probably the principal creditor has been the person who initiated the proceedings and who issued the writ. I do not want it to be mixed up with the larger cases where there are meetings of creditors, and where there is a proper trustee, and as you say a committee of inspection appointed. That is quite another matter. What I want to make perfectly clear is that I am only dealing with two-thirds of the cases which embrace very small amounts, and in those cases I say if there had been proper supervision of the accounts, and if a speedy realisation had been insisted upon, and power had been given for the speedy realisation, the creditors would have received immense sums which would not have been frittered away unnecessarily.

5499. I take it that you look at it from an official point of view?—Oh yes, but I have had experience in other ways. I mean I know accountants and lawyers, and I have discussed the matter over and over again inside and out. I have also a certain general knowledge of the world as to what goes on and how men are pressed and what happens.

5500. A good many witnesses who have been before this Committee have very strongly urged upon us that they want no official interference in deeds of assignment?—All I can say is then that things would be worse than they are at present in that case.

5501. (Mr. Richardson.) I take it that you are in favour of some speedy realisation in the cases of deeds of arrangement?—I am in these small matters.

5502. And I take it that you would be in favour of limiting the time from three months to one month?—I was going to suggest two.

5503. Do not you think that one is quite sufficient, and that a man ought to be able in a month to make up his mind whether he will enforce bankruptcy or accept a deed of arrangement?—Yes, I think so in these small cases, although I was going to suggest a reduction to two months, but one month may not be too short, because there may be only a few creditors to communicate with, and they could make up their minds as to what is best to be done in a month.

5504. I see you say you are in favour of the registration of hire agreements, and that you would provide to limit them to the same sum as applies to bills of sale?—Yes; but we are now going to another branch of the question.

5505. Do not you think that £30 is too high and that it should be £20?—No I should think not, because you see that is the present limit for bills of sale which are given over a man's furniture and it is reasonably small. It is not too high as far as I can see, and it might lead to difficulties to make a difference between the amounts. I should think that £30 would be a very convenient sum to fix.

5506. Do not you think that the bulk of hire purchase agreements are below £30?—Well, the inconvenience of having to deal with such an enormous number as there would be if the amount were lower than £30 would have to be considered.

5509. And 90 per cent money?—90 per cent. money.

5510. (Sir Edward Fithian.) You have had a large experience in connection with the registration of bills of sale?—Yes, very considerable.

5511. Is the office much frequented for the purpose of inspecting the registers?—Oh yes; I suppose there are taking the searches for bills of sale and deeds of arrangement fifty people who search for these things every day.

5512. And that is in addition to the searches that are made on behalf of Trade Protection Society people and Gazette people?—Yes; those people pay in one sum.

5513. And they represent many thousands of subscribers?—Yes, an immense number.

5514. And therefore the Bill of Sale Register is searched to a very large extent indeed?—Yes, certainly.

5515. You think that the information which is obtained is utilised by traders as a guide to them before giving credit?—I should think it would be to a very large extent. It is not only searched by traders though I suppose the great majority of the searchers are concerned in some way or another with trade.

5516. And do you see any difficulty that there would be in registering hire agreements in the same office?—None whatever. It is only a question of arrangement and of increasing the staff and so forth. I mean it is a matter that if it had to be done could easily be arranged.

5517. The cost would not be a serious charge on the Exchequer, I suppose?—I should think it would more than pay itself and leave a handsome profit.

5518. I suppose you are not able to give us any idea as to the possible numbers of hiring agreements?—Oh no; I know they are very large, one knows by what one sees in the paper and reads, and from one's general knowledge.

5519. But presumably the great bulk of them would come under the £30 limit?—I do not know; I cannot say that.

5520. At any rate a large number?—I should think that there would be a very large number, the majority, I should think, the great majority would come under £30.

5521. That is what I imagine?—No doubt if you made the limit £30 you would rule out a very considerable quantity.

Mr William J. Weller.

27 Feb. 1907.

5522. You would consider that limit reasonable as being the same as in the case of a bill of sale?—Just so.

5524. And Parliament itself provided that bills of sale should not be given for less than £30?—Yes, we could not receive one for less than that; of course that does not apply to an absolute bill of sale. If it is only for £5 that can be registered, but the conditional bill of sale limit is £30, and there is no bill of sale filed for less than that.

5526. (Chairman.) What is your procedure for sending country bills of sale and country deeds of arrangement to the county court offices?—An abstract is made of the bill of sale giving the names of the mortgagor and the mortagee, the address and description of the mortgagor, the amount borrowed, the amount of interest per cent, the date of repayment, the date of the deed and the date of the filing, and that is sent to the local registrar of the county court where the borrower resides.

5527. Whatever county court it is?—Whatever county court it is, so long as it is not within the London bankruptcy district.

5528. Is that done with deeds of arrangement and bills of sale?—No; it is not done in quite the same way; with bills of sale an abstract of the bill of sale is sent; with the deed of arrangement, a copy of the complete deed is sent, not of the affidavit or of the list of creditors or anything else, but simply the deed.

5529. Then suppose we are told, as we shall be told, that there are a very, very large number of hire agreements, quite out of proportion to the number of bills of sale or deeds of arrangement. Would there be any office difficulty in registering them and transmitting them?—Only the clerical difficulty of the numbers, of indexing them and sending those extracts off.

5530. Would it involve a very large increase of staff?—Of course the larger the number of hire agreements filed, if they are filed at all, the more the men who would be required to deal with them.

5531. Is your staff kept very busy?—Oh, yes, it is.

5532. During office hours?—Yes, and after office hours.

5533. So that it is a matter in which both staff and space would have to be considered?—Oh yes, most decidedly.

5534. Can you give us the total number of bills of sale and deeds of arrangement that actually are registered at this moment?—The average annual number?

5535. No, the total number that you have got?—What up to to-day?

5536. No, altogether since 1887?—I could give you that. I should think that it would average, as I said just now, about 8,000.

5537. That is bills of sale?—Yes, 4,000 deeds of arrangement, some years they are over 4,500, but 4,000 is a fair average.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. ERNEST JOSEPH SCHUSTER, called; and Examined.

Mr. Ernest J. Schuster.

6 Mar. 1907.

5538. I think that you are a member of the English bar?—Yes.

5539. And also a member of the bar in Germany?—I am not a member of the bar in Germany. I am a Doctor of Laws. I have graduated in a German University, and I am Doctor of Laws in the University of Munich.

5540. And you have a very large experience, I think, in the German codes?—I have, yes.

5541. I daresay you are aware that this Committee has been appointed in order to consider and report upon certain questions relating to the administration of Bankruptcy law, and that the Committee are anxious to be advised on certain points as to what is the law which prevails in Germany on some branches of the question which they have to consider. Can you tell the Committee first what are the courts in Germany which have jurisdiction over insolvent debtors?—The courts are the courts which I call the local courts; they correspond in a certain measure to the English county courts.

5542. Who is the President of the court?—Each of the local courts has at least one judge, many courts have more than one judge, and in all the more important towns the local court has a considerable number of judges, but there is no President of any local court, except in Berlin. Where there are several judges they divide the work between them, and probably one or more of them in a very busy place would be entirely absorbed in the bankruptcy jurisdiction.

5543. Is the bankruptcy jurisdiction a local one, that is to say, each local court administers the estates of the debtors who are resident in the jurisdiction in the district?—Yes, the debtors who are resident or carry on business in the district.

5544. Much in the same way as in the county courts?—Yes.

5545. Could you tell us when a debtor is insolvent what is the nature of the proceeding which is taken to sequestrate his estate?—It is very much the same as here, he can either petition himself, or any creditor can petition.

5546. Is there any limit of the amount which the creditors debt must be for?—No, there is no limit at all as there is here, but in practice it comes to very much the same thing, because if the estate is too small, and in the opinion of the court there is not sufficient property in the estate to warrant the expenditure of any costs they can dismiss the petition.

5547. Then is there anything like our procedure as to there being acts of bankruptcy, or is the mere fact that the man is insolvent sufficient to put the court in motion ?—No. If you allow me, I have, in connection with another question drawn up a statement which I will read to you, on the doctrine of relation back, showing how that is worked out in German law. (See answer to Question 5552.) There are no acts of bankruptcy other than insolvency.

5548. I follow. Then what proceedings are taken to enquire into what the man's commercial dealings have been, and his business honesty ?—The powers are not nearly so extensive as they are under English law. There is nothing corresponding to the debtor's examination by the court. What happens is this: the court when opening the bankruptcy proceedings appoints an administrator who corresponds to the English trustee in bankruptcy, and it is the duty of the administrator to enquire into the causes of the bankruptcy and to report to the first meeting of creditors, and at that first meeting of creditors, questions can be put to the debtor, to the bankrupt, but he is not on his oath there; he simply makes a statement. He can be put on oath by the court with respect to the property which he owns. He can be made to swear on oath as to the property of which his estate consists and as to his debts, but beyond that he is not examined in the same way as a bankrupt is examined here.

5549. (Mr. Addison.) May I ask whether the proceeding is the same in the case of a trader and a non-trader ?—It makes no difference in that respect. There are some differences as to other matters which I shall point out, but in respect of the procedure there are no differences between traders and non-traders.

5550. (Chairman.) Then as regards offences, are such things as failing to keep proper books of account and speculation punishable ?—Yes; they are punishable. The German law has two kinds of bankruptcy offences—one kind is called simple bankruptcy, and the other is called fraudulent bankruptcy. Simple bankruptcy is punishable with imprisonment up to five years and is one of the following four things. The expenditure of extravagant sums for personal expenses, gambling or betting, or for losses on time bargains, and in Stock Exchange securities and produce. Secondly, the obtaining of goods or of negotiable instruments on credit and realising them considerably below their cost against the rules of good management with the intention to postpone the opening of bankruptcy proceedings. The third offence only relates to traders, or rather to traders belonging to a certain class who are called Kaufmann. These traders are bound by the commercial code to keep certain books of account, and if they suspend their payments or if bankruptcy proceedings are opened against them, then the omission to keep such books of account is deemed simple bankruptcy, and punished as such; and also the concealment or destruction of books; or the keeping of books in a manner so irregular as to preclude a proper insight into the state of the debtor's pecuniary position.

5551. (Mr. Addison.) Do those two last offences come under simple bankruptcy or fraudulent ?—They come under simple bankruptcy, but if any of the offences as to keeping books is committed with the intention of injuring creditors then it becomes fraudulent bankruptcy. The fourth offence which constitutes simple bankruptcy is the omission on the part of a mercantile trader to draw up balance sheets at the prescribed time. There again the commercial code prescribes that a Kaufmann has to draw up balance sheets once in the year but in certain exceptional cases it is sufficient, if it be done only once in every two years; the omission to comply with these rules on the part of a person who becomes bankrupt or who suspends payments also constitutes simple bankruptcy.

5552. (Chairman.) And then as regards fraudulent bankruptcy, are they different offences, or are they the same offences; committed with intent to defraud ?—That particular offence about keeping proper books, if committed with intent to defraud creditors comes under fraudulent bankruptcy. Then in addition to that there are certain other offences which correspond very much to the offences which are also punishable under the Debtor's Act in England.

5553. And those are fraudulent bankruptcies ?—Yes. Then there is one other offence which is also punishable and that is giving a fraudulent preference to a creditor in a particular way, and that is punishable with two years imprisonment.

5554. Under which of the bankruptcy offences does fraudulent preference fall ?—Under Sec. 241 of the Bankruptcy Code.

5555. (Mr. Addison.) What is a fraudulent preference ?—The giving of satisfaction or security to any creditor in a manner, or at a time, to which, or at which, he was not entitled to claim such satisfaction or security, if that was done with a knowledge of the debtor's insolvency with an intention of giving the particular creditor a preference over other creditors. Then I thought I would call attention to some other offences in addition to those. There is a particular offence, or series of particular offences, which has or have been constituted by an Act passed in 1896 in connection with the bankruptcy of certain banks who took away their client's securities. An Act was passed in 1896 by which it was ordered that the client's securities should be marked in a certain manner and that entries should be made in the books of the bank so as to identify those securities as securities belonging to the customer; also another rule prescribes that if a banker or commission agent is ordered to purchase Stock Exchange securities, they being mostly according to the German custom bearer securities, the agent is compelled within three days after the completion of the purchase to give the numbers and other particulars to the customer. If the trader has not complied with any of those regulations and suspends payment or is adjudicated a bankrupt, then he is punishable with two years imprisonment. But that only applies to mercantile traders. It would not, for instance, apply to lawyers, the reason being that according to German practice financial transactions are not carried on through lawyers but are always carried on through banks. It would not be at all customary to have investments made or to place securities for safe custody with lawyers.

5556. (Mr. Addison.) Does a court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy inflict the punishment ?—No, it would be brought to the notice of the Public Prosecutor and he would have to take proceedings in the ordinary criminal courts.

5557. (Chairman.) Are there any other offences ?—Yes. I ought to mention that under German law there is no distinction between the compulsory winding up of insolvent companies and ordinary bankruptcy proceedings. They come exactly under the ordinary bankruptcy law. The directors of a company who commit any of the offences which I have mentioned with reference to the affairs of the company are punishable in the same way as the trader who carries on a business on his own account. Another rule which specially concerns directors of companies is as follows: where a company is insolvent—or even where it is not insolvent, but where it is found that the liabilities exceed the assets—it is the duty of the directors to petition in bankruptcy, and if they fail to do so they are liable to punishment.

5558. Does that exhaust what one may call the bankruptcy offences ?—Yes.

5559. Now perhaps you would tell us now the bankrupt is punished—that is to say what is the first step that is taken to bring to the notice of the court the fact that he has committed any offences ?—It would be the duty of the bankruptcy court to call them to the Public Prosecutor's attention, and it would be the duty of the Public Prosecutor to institute proceedings before the ordinary criminal tribunals.

5560. Then does the administrator of the estate report to the judge of the bankruptcy court, or does the judge of the bankruptcy court ascertain it from the proceedings in the bankruptcy ?—The judge of the court has to preside at every meeting of the creditors.

5561. And so he ascertains the facts from them ?—Yes.

5562. Lastly on this subject, are bankruptcy prosecutions frequent as far as your experience goes ?—No, I do not think so, but I can say from personal knowledge that the fact of their possibility is very well realised.

5563. There is just one other question germane to what you have been telling us—it is an offence to fail to keep the books that are prescribed by the Code. What provision is there that orders a debtor to keep proper books ?—It is Sec. 38 of the Commercial Code.

5564. Could you tell us what that is, because that is a sort of provision with which we have nothing to correspond in English law ?—I will translate it. Every mercantile trader—I use that expression for Kaufmann—is bound to keep books, to the intent that those books shall show his business transactions and state all his property in accordance with the principles of proper book-keeping. He is compelled to keep copies of the letters which he sends out and which he receives, in a properly ordered manner.

5565. Does that apply to the shop-keeper ?—Well, the expression "mercantile trader" does not apply to small traders—no; by Section 4 of the Mercantile Code the people who are only carrying on business in a small way are excepted. That is why I used the expression "mercantile trader," because there are a great many people who would be called traders according to English terminology who are not mercantile traders within that meaning. I mean the Commercial Code defines exactly what mercantile traders are and the small shopkeeper is not a mercantile trader in the full sense of the word.

5566. Could you give us what the definition is ?—No; it is a rather long definition.

5567. Because that is rather one of the questions which have troubled us so much ?—I have got that in my book on German law which has recently been published, but it is rather a long definition because it is a sort of exhaustive enumeration of a number of various kinds of businesses.

5568. I wonder if you would mind giving us a little bit of it so that one might just get it in one's head. Of course we could get it from your book perfectly well—at least I could, because we have just got it in our Bar Library ?—By virtue of ss. 1-3 of the Commercial Code the definition includes manufacture, buying and selling on a large scale, insurance business, bankers' business, money changers' business, carrying and forwarding business, the business of commission agents, forwarding agents or warehouse keepers, the business of commercial brokers or commercial agents, publishing business and printing business in so far as it goes beyond the extent of only a handicraft. Persons carrying on any of these businesses are mercantile traders, but there is a distinction made between mercantile traders in the full sense of the word and minor mercantile traders. The latter are referred to in s. 4 of the Commercial Code, which provides that the rules relating to the keeping of books and the giving of powers of procuration are not applicable to people carrying on handicrafts or to any persons whose trading does not go beyond the limits of small trade, so that even these traders who come within the general definition would, as regards the rules about keeping books, be excluded by virtue of that section.

5570. On that branch that we have been dealing with of the punishment of the debtor is there any other point to which you can call our attention that I have not asked you about ?—No.

5571. If I may I will just pass on to the next thing, which is with reference to setting an insolvent debtor free from his debts—what in English law we call getting him his discharge. Can you tell us what corresponds to that in German law ?—Yes, there is a very vital difference between English and German bankruptcy law there. The discharge in the sense of English bankruptcy law does not exist at all in German law. When the debtor becomes bankrupt, his property is administered for the benefit of the creditors who prove in the bankruptcy, but this property only includes property which is vested in him at the period of the petition. The property to which he becomes entitled after the bankruptcy belongs to him absolutely, only the creditors who prove in the bankruptcy while bankruptcy is going on are not entitled to touch that other property which accrues to him. There are various methods of finishing the bankruptcy, one of the methods being that there is nothing left. When the administrator has distributed all the assets which he gets hold of the bankruptcy is terminated. When that happens the creditors are restored again to the same position in which they were before the bankruptcy. They can then take such proceedings as they choose against the debtor. He is not released from his debts except to the extent to which the creditors have been paid. The creditors are then—supposing he has paid 10s. in the £—as regards the other 10s. in exactly the same position as if there had been no bankruptcy.

5572. And the creditor can get a judgment ?—He can get a judgment and seize the debtor's property whether belonging originally to the bankruptcy or accruing afterwards. That is one of the methods, and I think it is the most usual method of finishing a bankruptcy. Then another method is the payment of a composition. There the majority of the creditors have power to compel the minority to accept a composition subject to the approval of the court, and where that is done, of course the creditors having accepted the smaller sum in full satisfaction of their claims have no further remedy against the other property. The third way of terminating the bankruptcy would be, if all the creditors unanimously agreed to the termination of the bankruptcy proceedings, in such a case the question as to the outstanding liability of the debtor would be a matter of arrangement. If no other terms were made the creditors would be able to take proceedings against the bankrupt for the recovery of their outstanding claims.

5573. So that he never, until he pays in full, gets free from the possibility of being sued ?—Unless the prescribed majority of the creditors in the prescribed manner have agreed to a composition.

5574. Then I suppose, except for the purpose of punishment there is no consideration of a debtor's conduct such as there is here when a man applies for discharge ?—No.

5575. Then how is the property of the bankrupt realised and distributed amongst the creditors ? Is it by the Judge of the Court, or by the administrator ?—By the administrator. On the adjudication the Court appoints an administrator at the first meeting of creditors, and the creditors can either affirm the appointment of the administrator who has been appointed, or appoint another one, and he has the management, and the realization of the assets, subject, in many cases, to the concurrence of a committee of inspection which may be appointed by the creditors, but which need not be appointed, by the creditors but which, as a matter of fact, is appointed in all the more important cases. The administration of the estate is also subject to the approval of the meeting of creditors as regards certain matters.

5576. Then does the property vest in the administrator ?—No, the property does not vest in the administrator in the same manner as it vests in an English trustee in bankruptcy, but for all practical purposes the result is the same. The property remains vested in the debtor, but he is restrained from disposing of the property in any way, and when the administrator is appointed he has the power of disposing of it, as it were, as agent of the bankrupt, so that it is practically exactly the same thing as if the property vested in him as he can make out a good title to the property. Only he does not make out a title by virtue of the fact that the property is vested in him, but by virtue of the fact that his powers of management include a power of alienation. The administrator in the German law is under the supervision of the Court, but he is not under supervision to the same extent as an English trustee in bankruptcy. He is much freer, he has much greater power than the English trustee—but he is less under control, and there is no control corresponding to the control of the Board of Trade—there is only the Court but not the Board of Trade. I think it is rather important to call the attention of the Committee to that, because I have got some statistics here about the costs of administration. There is a most extraordinary contrast between the costs of administration in England and the costs of administration in Germany. I find in the English statistics in the last year for which there is a report, that the cost of the winding up an estate which was administered by an Official Receiver was between 35 and 36 per cent.; in the case of estates administered by trustees, it was a little over 29 per cent. In Germany the average cost was only 9½ per cent., so that the cost in Germany is about one-third of the cost of management in England.

5577. As knowing the law of both countries can you tell us what is the explanation of that, do you think ?—

No, it absolutely puzzles me; I do not understand it; it startles me. I do not know whether it is because the trustees are freer according to the German law in their management, and are less under control, but it is a curious thing, because Germany is supposed to be the country of officialism, though as regards bankruptcy administration I think there is a great deal more officialism in England than in Germany.

5578–9. Then what is the procedure analogous to proving debts with us?—Very similar.

5580–1. On this fourth point about the after acquired property—I think you have already referred to that, but is there anything else you can tell us about it?—I think I have said everything. Of course after acquired property can be charged, or can be made subject to a lien, or right of pledge and a creditor who does not prove in the bankruptcy may proceed against the after acquired property. It is only when a creditor has proved that he foregoes the right of proceeding against any property which is not divisible in the bankruptcy, while the bankruptcy lasts.

5582. And then, I suppose, while the bankruptcy lasts the subsequent creditors can reach the after acquired property?—They can; they can reach the after acquired property, but, of course, they cannot get anything out of the estate. But on the termination of the bankruptcy, otherwise than by composition, the estate is handed back, and the powers of administration are again restored to the bankrupt, and all the creditors can then again come against the whole of the property.

5583. Without any difference between them, I suppose?—Without any difference between them. As regards married women, a married woman can be made a bankrupt in the same way as a feme sole, but the complications arise through the fact of what is called the matrimonial régime in Germany. Under the statutory régime—that is to say, where no contract was made—the husband on marriage acquired the right of managing his wife's property, and enjoying the income of the property, except as regards property which is given to the wife in terms as privileged property. As regards the privileged property the wife is quite free from her husband. The property which is subject to the husband's right of management and usufruct to a certain extent is also subject to the wife's debts, and in so far as that property is subject to the wife's debts the administrator in bankruptcy can take possession of it, but in so far as the wife's debts have been incurred in a manner so as not to bind this property, which is under her husband's management, the trustee in bankruptcy can do nothing—he must leave it alone.

5585. Does the case often occur of a married woman being made bankrupt as well as the husband?—Of course it might occur; if a married woman trades separately, it is not at all an unusual thing for a married woman to carry on a trade. There might also be extravagant women who incur debts on their own account, and who might be made bankrupts without having carried on any trade.

5586. You have told us about the composition which may be made with creditors in a bankruptcy. Is there any system of composition with creditors outside bankruptcy altogether, like our deeds of arrangement?—Yes, deeds of arrangement are pretty common. I have said there are no acts of bankruptcy, and therefore the assignment of the debtor's property to a trustee for the creditors would not be an act of bankruptcy. It is perfectly legal; it has to be done in a certain form—the Civil Code prescribes a certain form in which it is to be done and there is no necessity to register.

6 Mar. 1907.

5587. Is there any step taken to make it public?—No.

5588. Or any step taken to ensure that all the creditors get dividends?—No.

5589. Is there anything for giving notice of it, so that people may come in and claim under it?—No, that is a matter of individual arrangement; of course it would not bind any creditors who were not parties to the arrangement, but I am told that these arrangements are much too frequent, though no one has suggested any alteration.

5590. Then is there any system under voluntary arrangement by which the creditor who has assented to it can enforce his rights, like our originating summons here, to have the claim of a creditor adjudicated upon, or accounts filed, or anything like that, or is it entirely outside?—It is entirely outside. There are no special remedies given.

5591. Is there anything in German law that corresponds to our execution of a trust? Do the German Courts execute trusts like our Courts of Equity?—No, trusts are not at all recognised in Germany.

5592. You have been kind enough to say that there are one or two points outside those which I have indicated in the memorandum on which you would be good enough to inform us. I think you mentioned relation back as one of them?—Yes, the doctrine of relation back in accordance with English law does not exist in Germany, but the following rules apply. The following transactions are voidable at the option of the administrator in bankruptcy: first transactions entered upon after suspension of payment or the filing of the petition, so far as the creditors are prejudiced thereby, and in so far as the other party has had notice of the suspension, or of the filing of the petition. Secondly, transactions entered upon after suspension of payment, or of the filing of the petition by which security or satisfaction is given to a creditor having notice. Thirdly, transactions entered upon within the last ten days before or after the suspension or filing of the petition, by which a creditor receives security or satisfaction before the maturity of his claim, unless such creditor can prove that he was not aware of the suspension of payment or of the filing of the petition, or of an intention on the debtor's part to give him the preference. Then there are certain transactions which are voidable under rules similar to those of the English statute of Elizabeth, and the sections of the English Bankruptcy Act about the avoidance of settlement. Would the Committee like to have those?

5593. Yes, please. This is one of the subjects we have to report upon?—The following transactions are voidable:—First, all transactions done with the intention to injure the creditors in so far as such intention is known to the other party, but proceedings for the avoidance of such transactions cannot take place after the lapse of 6 months from any date. Then, secondly, their transaction entered upon for valuable consideration within the year before adjudication by which the creditors are injured is voidable if it was entered upon (a) with the spouse of the bankrupt either during or before the marriage; (b) with any ancestor or issue of the bankrupt or of his spouse, or with any brother or sister of the bankrupt, or of his spouse, or with the spouse of any such person, unless the other party can prove that he was not aware of any intention to injure the creditors. I think that goes rather further than anything in the English Bankruptcy Acts. Then, thirdly, all gratuitous dispositions made within the year before adjudication are voidable, unless they consisted of customary gifts; and, fourthly, all gratuitous dispositions made in favour of the spouse of the bankrupt within two years before the adjudication are also voidable.

5595. Speaking from your experience as a member of the English Bar and as knowing the jurisdiction here, do you see any objection to adopting the system of making such an offence as not keeping proper books punishable with due safeguards for small humble prople ?—I see no objection whatever and, as I stated, though perhaps the prosecutions for these offences are not so frequent in Germany—I have not looked up the statistics—I am quite certain that the threat of these proceedings is present to the mind of everyone who carries on business in Germany.

5596. (Mr. Addison.) I only want to ask about after-acquired property. I think by the French code as to after-acquired property the later creditors may come in first and after they are satisfied the surplus may be claimed by the administrator under the bankruptcy if the bankruptcy is not closed. Is that substantially what may take place in Germany ?—No, the administrator has nothing whatever to do with the after acquired property.

5597. Only with the assets which exist at the time of the bankruptcy ?—Which exist at the time of the bankruptcy. Supposing the bankrupt carries on a business, or has an appointment, or is under a contract for services for instance, the administrator may require him to continue the carrying on of this business, or may carry it on for him, or may require him to continue his contract for services, and everything he obtains by virtue of a contract which was entered into before the bankruptcy would belong to the bankrupt estate. But what we in English law call the after acquired property does not come in at all. Supposing the day after the bankruptcy a testator dies who leaves him a fortune, that fortune would be entirely outside the bankruptcy.

5598. In a composition to take the matter out of bankruptcy do you know what proportion in number and amount of creditors is wanted to make that composition binding on all ?—Speaking roughly, as far as I remember, there must be a majority in number of creditors present at the meeting and the creditors who approve the composition must hold claims amounting at least to three-quarters of the total claims which have been proved.

5599. That seems to be the same as in the French law ?—I am not acquainted with French bankruptcy law ; in Germany the court has power to refuse to sanction the composition and on certain grounds the court is bound to refuse sanction. For instance, if the composition offered by the bankrupt is less than 4s. in the £ the court has to refuse its approval if the low state of the assets is in any way due to the default of the bankrupt.

5600. One other question, what is the effect of bankruptcy on the man's political and civil rights ?—That varies—that depends to a great extent on State law. Most of the disabilities are imposed by State law, but there are certain disabilities which are imposed by Imperial law. For instance, a bankrupt cannot be the guardian of an infant, and there are several other things like that—several offices which he cannot fill while the bankruptcy continues. A bankrupt cannot be admitted as an advocate. If any person becomes a bankrupt while practising as an advocate it is within the power of the body which represents the advocates of the district to withdraw the qualification. The advocates of each province have a sort of committee who have to watch over the conduct of the members, and that committee has power to withdraw the qualification of any advocate who becomes a bankrupt. I am using the expression "advocate" because there is only one class—they are solicitors and barristers at the same time.

5601. There is, I suppose, some deprivation of political or municipal rights ?—Yes, there is in nearly every state —there is deprivation and that continues while the bankruptcy continues. As soon as the bankruptcy terminates, that disability would as a general rule cease.

5602. No matter what amount is paid in the £ to the creditors ?—No matter.

5604. I mean if he is adjudicated bankrupt he is sure to be punished ?—Oh, yes.

5605. I mean there is no excuse for him—if a Kaufman has not kept proper books according to the commercial code there is no excuse for him, and he must be punished ?—He must be punished.

5607. As regards the non-keeping of books with fraudulent intent, can you tell me how it is decided, whether it is fraudulent or not —what is the difference between fraudulent non-keeping of books and the mere non-keeping ?—That would refer more to the non-keeping of books in the proper manner. The section deals with both things—first of all, not keeping any books at all, and secondly, not keeping books so as to show the true position of the business.

5608–10. Then I take it that the non-keeping of books would be considered simply bankruptcy, but if books had not been kept properly or incorrectly kept—that would be called fraudulent bankruptcy ?—Both the non-keeping of books and incorrect book-keeping constitute fraudulent bankruptcy if there was an intention to injure creditors ; both things constitute simple bankruptcy if no such intention can be proved, but as a matter of fact I cannot conceive the possibility of a man carrying on a trade and not keeping any books at all.

5611. (Mr. Richardson.) I see there are a great number of bankrupts who have been fined in Germany. Could you tell us how those fines are recovered ? If a man becomes a bankrupt and has no money, are those held up by the court, and is he made liable in respect of them ?—In case of non-payment he may be liable to imprisonment, but the after-acquired property would become liable to the fines.

5612. He may have to pay them in instalments ?—Yes.

5613. You say say the public prosecutor takes action ?—Yes.

5614. Must he take the action when called upon, or is there any option ?—The fine is imposed instead of imprisonment where there are extenuating circumstances. Where there are extenuating circumstances, instead of imprisonment the court can impose a fine.

5615. That I quite understand, but I was wondering how they got the fines out of the man who has got no estate, unless they were held over him to be taken from his after acquired property ?—Quite so.

5616. Must the public prosecutor take action when he is asked to do so by the administrator ?—Yes.

5617. He has no option ?—No.

5618. You say that the small shopkeepers are not compelled to keep books—at least that they are exempt. I take it that the ordinary trader, the grocer, the ironmonger and such like men must keep books, must they not ?—It is a matter of definition as to who is considered a small trader. You may conceive a small grocer in a village who would come under that definition, but if you took a grocer like Harrod's Stores, he would have to keep books—I mean any big grocer in a town would not come under the exception.

5619. Is there a money-value ?—No, that is left to the discretion of the Court as to what is considered carrying on business in a small way. It is after all a matter of common sense. Of course there may be cases where it is difficult to draw the line, but generally one knows what a small shopkeeper is. As Mr. Mackenzie observed, where you see from the social position and education of the man that he is an uneducated man or an uneducated woman carrying on a business in a very small way, he or she would not come within the rule, but if he or she has had a proper commercial training the rule as to keeping books would apply.

5620. Whether he is in a village or not, because in some villages here especially we have some very large businesses ?—I know, but I am thinking of a particular kind of shop which I have sometimes been to in villages and I do not think that the people who keep those shops would be required to keep books.

5621. You mean people whose stock would not amount to more than £30 or £40 ?—Yes, or hardly as much as that.

5623. I do not know whether you have told us who the administrator is?—The administrator is appointed in the first instance by the Court and afterwards either confirmed by the meeting of creditors, or the meeting of creditors can appoint another administrator.

5625. I was going to ask you?—They have not got in Germany chartered accountants—that business is not at all developed in Germany. It is now springing up, and there are some men who make it their business to do these administrations—certainly a great many lawyers do them, but my friend who is a lawyer himself says that the public object to lawyers as administrators in bankruptcy.

5626. I was going to ask you whether the administrator was usually a man who understood the business which he had to administer?—He is either a lawyer or he is an accountant, who makes it his business to manage estates.

5627. Deeds of arrangement—I take it that those not agreeing to an arrangement can sue in the ordinary way at any time subsequently. You say you have had a good many deeds of arrangement in Germany?—Yes.

5628. Those not agreeing who may not know of the arrangement that the debtor may make, have an option at any time in the future to sue as if they had known nothing at all about it?—I suppose that would be the usual way. Of course it is always a private agreement. What happens is this—a man cannot pay his debts, then he writes to his creditors or he calls a meeting of the creditors whom he knows, and he says, "It is no good making me a bankrupt; you had better arrange the matter privately and I will hand over my property to some person you appoint. He will manage it for me." Then some lawyer is consulted and he draws up an agreement, into which he will, if well advised, put a clause to the effect that any creditor who may wish to become a party to the arrangement may do so by signing the agreement. There is no set form for these agreements.

5629. No, but if a creditor does not know of it and if he is not advised by the debtor that he is making an agreement with his creditor I take it that a creditor can sue at any time afterwards?—Yes, and also the transaction might be one of those which are voidable under one of the rules which I have mentioned.

5630. In bankruptcy, I suppose, you say that there they can agree to composition?—Yes.

5631. The creditors can agree to composition even in bankruptcy as I understood it?—You see there are two things: when you agree to a composition outside bankruptcy all the creditors must agree, and the creditors who do not agree are not bound; in bankruptcy the minority of the creditors can be compelled by a majority of the creditors to accept the composition. There has been a great agitation in favour of introducing a procedure in Germany, by which, as is done in England, a composition may be arranged for in the course of the bankruptcy proceedings, but before the adjudication, but the Government have made inquiries on the subject and collected a lot of evidence, and they came to the conclusion that the system did not offer any advantages.

5632. (Mr. Barker.) Did the Committee understand you to say that the bankruptcy law is administered in local courts, similarly to our county courts?—Yes.

5633. And would there be a law court of that description in every good-sized town?—Yes.

5634. And do you think that the fact of going into these matters locally saves time and expense?—Yes, certainly.

5635. You think it would. If a bankrupt kept his books we will say irregularly some, six, eight or nine months before his failure and failed, perhaps, to keep his cash book posted, would that be considered as fraudulent? It frequently happens here before a man fails that he ceases keeping his books and entering his takings daily, or keeping an account of his private expenses. That often occurs here—would that be considered an offence against the law?—He would not be bound to keep an account of his private expenses. I mean if he carries on a trade he must keep his books in such a manner as to show the position of the trade and the position of his assets anp liabilities.

5636. But you see a trader very often lives over his shop, and there are housekeeping expenses and expenses of the wife and family. Suppose they were to cease to keep a proper account of those we will say some six months before so that they could not be checked?—If he keeps his accounts properly his duty would be to enter into his books what he drew for his private expenses, but as regards the details of the expenditure, that is outside of the trade. Of course, the fact of his drawing large sums for his private account might be evidence of extravagant living, which is another offence.

5637. But if he did not keep an account of that extravagant living, it would be a very difficult thing to prove, would not it?—Supposing a small shopkeeper who makes, perhaps, £200 out of his trade, spends £1,000 in the year, or draws £1,000 for his private expenses, that would be distinct evidence of extravagance.

5638. I daresay the fact of these bankruptcy courts being in the towns in all probability, they get a knowledge of the bankrupt, and they get to know about him privately?—Certainly.

5639. It is generally known in a town when a man has been gambling or spending more money than he ought to have done, playing billiards or betting?—Yes, in the small German towns there is a good deal of gossip.

5640. And are traders in Germany supposed to keep an account of their gambling transactions. Are they supposed to enter those in their books the same as they would transactions in the ordinary way of business?—Supposing they speculate on the Stock Exchange, or in produce in connection with their trade, of course that ought to be seen in their books; but if they speculate for their private account that would not be seen in their books, but they would have to pay their differences, and they would have to draw those out of the firm, and it would be seen from the books of the firm that they had drawn large amounts, and then they would be questioned for what purposes those large amounts were drawn out.

5641. Then is an ordinary trader compelled to have a balance sheet drawn once a year?—Yes, once a year; only in particular trades he is not required to draw it out more than once every two years. That is by Section 39 of the Commercial Code. The general rule is one year, but if he has a store of goods, and according to the nature of his business if it is not possible to take an inventory of the goods in each year, it is sufficient if the balance sheet is taken every two years.

5642. Supposing a trader is doing, we will say, £2,000, or £3,000 of a return, and buying his goods in the ordinary way on credit, the same as Harrod's Stores, and keeping a banking account; would he have to keep, under those circumstances, a set of books according to the Code?—Yes, certainly.

5643. Can a bankrupt commence business again before his bankruptcy affairs are settled?—There is nothing to prevent him carrying on business while he is a bankrupt. Perhaps I ought to have mentioned that there is no rule similar to the rule in England, according to which an undischarged bankrupt who obtains credit without disclosing the fact becomes liable to punishment—there is no similar rule in German law.

5644. No; but supposing they take the premises, and take the goods and close the place—could he commence business again either in his own name or in an assumed name before his bankruptcy proceedings are settled?—If he has carried on a business, of course the goodwill of the business is part of the assets of the bankruptcy, and therefore, he could not enter into competition with his own business, but he could go into a different trade.

5645. He could go into a different business?—He could go into a different business, but of course if he carries on a business, it might be worth while to continue to carry it on on his behalf or they might try to sell the goodwill and of course he could not trade in competition so as to take away his goodwill.

5646. The creditors could sell the goodwill with the lease and retain the proceeds for the estate ?—Yes, the goodwill of his business would of course belong to the estate.

5647. But what I wanted the Committee to understand was this—it is a common practice here—at least it is often done—for a bankrupt to commence business perhaps under his wife's maiden name while the bankruptcy proceedings are going on, and he does not care a fig whether he gets his discharge or not ?—Yes, that is in my opinion one of the worst features of business in England, that you can trade under any name you like. I do not think that that is allowed in any other country. In Germany certainly you cannot trade in any name except under your own name or under a firm which you have acquired by inheritance or purchase. You cannot use a fancy name. You must use your own name, and of course a bankrupt who has been trading under his own name before the bankruptcy could not trade under that name while the bankruptcy is going on.

5648. Did I understand you to say that the costs of bankruptcy proceedings in Germany are about one-third of what they are here ?—Yes.

5649. Could you suggest any way to the Committee by which the expense of bankruptcy could be reduced here, or do you think that it is the fact of having these local courts which is the cause of bankruptcy proceedings being reduced. Could you give us any idea about that ?—In England the County Courts have bankruptcy jurisdiction.

5650. Suppose a woman married and that previous to her marriage she contracted some heavy debts perhaps unknown to her husband. She is married—could she be made bankrupt ?—Oh yes, she could be made a bankrupt in any case.

5651. Would the husband be responsible for those debts ?—The husband would not be responsible, but the property which the husband would take under his management would be responsible.

5652. The husband would not be responsible for those debts ?—The husband would not be personally responsible.

5653. And she could be sued for those debts and made a bankrupt ?—Yes.

5654. Is there anything in Germany that is similar to our bill of sale here ?—Well, yes, there is, and, like all things which are not regulated by law it is much worse than the English bill of sale. Because in England when you have a bill of sale you have to register it ; in Germany where the law does not recognise it, you go through a fictitious transaction. You sell your goods to your creditor, and you make an agreement with him to repurchase them at a later date, and so on. There is no need to register.

5655. And there are no means of knowing about arrangements of that kind ?—No ; no means of knowing. It is not used in a large way, but of course, now with increased intercommunication people have begun to find out about bills of sale in England, and astute lawyers have recommended their clients to raise money in that way. I am sure if it goes on on a larger scale they will have to adopt similar provisions about registration as they have had to do here.

5656. Suppose a tradesman sold his book debts we will say, a year or eighteen months before his failure, would that be considered an offence in the eyes of the German law of bankruptcy—would that be considered giving someone a preference over other creditors ?—I do not understand why it should be.

5657. Suppose a trader had £1,000 worth of book debts and he sold those book debts either to a bank or private person, would that be considered an offence if it occurred a short time before his bankruptcy?—Why should it be ?

5658. I do not know why it should be ?—It is quite a legitimate transaction.

5659. He can sell his book debts ?—Yes.

5660. Or he could sell a portion of his stock, say, three months before bankruptcy; he could sell privately to another trader his stock, a portion of his stock, or half of his stock ?—Of course it all depends on the nature of the transaction. If he sells his book debts or stock for full value, I do not see on what grounds it could be objected to.

5661. (Chairman.) There was one question that arises out of one of Mr. Schuster's last answers, that I should just like, with his assistance, here to mention to the Committee in another aspect. One of the learned registrars, Mr. Registrar Linklater, spoke to me privately on a question which is not quite within our terms of reference in which he said that he thought that it was a great mischief that the court could not approve of a composition after receiving order unless the debtor paid 7s. 6d. in the pound, because that is what it comes to, practically nearly every debtor fails so that he cannot pay 10s. in the pound and then it must be 7s. 6d. He said that he thought that a good many useful compositions were nipped in the bud, because the 7s. 6d. could not be made up, and that it would be a very good thing if the Committee saw their way to recommending in any future legislation that that limit should either be altered altogether, so as to give a complete discretion or should be diminished very much, and I rather gather that you would favour that view ?—Yes.

5662. Do you think that our procedure of composition after receiving order is a good one ?—It does not seem to be used very much.

5663. And do you think that the high limit of 7s. 6d. is a thing which militates against its being used ?—Certainly.

5664. (Mr. Barker.) Did I understand that if a limited liability company finds that their liabilities exceed their assets that they are bound to pull up ?—Yes. The directors would be bound to file a petition in bankruptcy.

5665. And would that apply to a trader as well ?—Do you mean to a limited company who trades.

5666. A private trader ?—No.

5667. But to an ordinary limited liability company, if they found that their liabilities exceeded their assets, they would have to pull up ?—Yes, of course ; the reason being that the limited company has the privilege of limited liability, and that therefore the public is entitled to greater protection, than in the case of a private trader.

5668. And that would not obtain with a trader ?—No ; because you see a trader is liable to an unlimited extent. If he acquires property afterwards the creditors can get hold of it, whereas in the case of a company, you can only get the assets that are there.

5669. Would it apply in Germany to a private trading company ?—It would apply to every company—yes, it would apply to every company that is registered in a similar way as an English limited liability company.

THIRTY-FIRST DAY.

JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

5669A. (Chairman.) Before we begin with the witness, I have had a very useful and important communication from Judge Tindal Atkinson, who takes a great deal of interest in the questions which have been referred to us, and as he is one of our ablest County Court judges, I thought it would be useful if I could get his statement, which is quite short, down on our notes, and then members of the Committee could read it. It is very very important, and it deals with some of the questions that we have to consider. He says: "(1) I agree that every bankrupt should appear before the judge in order that he may deal with the question of the bankrupt's discharge within six months after his public examination has been closed. I have drafted a clause sent herewith marked A. This clause is not intended to be complete or exhaustive, but only to indicate my opinion upon this particular point. (2) I am not in favour of giving the judges a power of imprisonment in cases of failure to keep books, or in which the bankrupt has been guilty of gambling, speculation, or hazardous trading. Probably the object of some of the Commissioners would be attained if a statute were to create these cases and other offences (misdemeanour) punishable by a term of imprisonment (limited as thought desirable) and such offences made triable at the Assizes or Quarter Sessions in the usual way, with power to the judge hearing the application for the order of discharge to commit the bankrupt to take his trial with all necessary powers as to granting bail. If the judge refused to commit then there should be no prosecution. That is, I would leave the question of a prosecution entirely in the hands of the judges. If such a suggestion as above were embodied in an Act of Parliament, it would be necessary to provide by rules of the Court for the necessary procedure. I think the knowledge that such a power were vested in a judge would operate as a great deterrent. To give a judge arbitrary power to order imprisonment forthwith without a trial in the ordinary way would in my opinion be dangerous and unjust. There would be no uniformity. Some judges would make orders for imprisonment, and others would not. As to how far the want of keeping proper books should be an offence, the matter will require careful consideration. Some definition ought to be given and offence limited to trades to be enumerated. To be an offence it should be clearly shown that the absence of proper book keeping has brought about or conduced to bankruptcy, or prevented the Official Receiver or trustee from being able to obtain for the creditors the full benefit of the bankrupt's estate. Book-keeping in a large merchant's or banker's office is very different to that necessary in the business of a builder in a small way of business and small shopkeepers. I should like to call the attention of the Committee to Section 122 of the Bankruptcy Act and to express my views upon it. I think it is important there should be some legislation in reference to this section. As it is now worked, in my experience, it is not merely worse than useless, but is mischievous in practice. If, however, the section could be worked so as to carry out the intention of the framers of the Act, the section would be most salutary and beneficial. I recommend the section should be extended to cases in which the debts do not exceed £100, I should personally prefer £150. As regards fees and costs there should be no preference. All creditors, including the Treasury, should come in under the order pari passu. If possible the Treasury fees should be reduced, but as to this latter point I feel that I am not in a position to judge, as the Treasury may have fixed their fee on the lowest scale. When an order has been made it should be an offence for the debtor to obtain credit without informing the creditor of the existence of the administration order. The order should be filed at some central office and notification thereof sent to one County Court Registrar in every district and for the registrar thereof to notify the same to every court in his district. I think all appeals from the registrars of the Bankruptcy Courts should be direct to the judge with an appeal from his decisions to the Divisional Court. I do not think where a judge has ordered a prosecution that there should be any veto given to the Public Prosecutor. I should have no objection to being relieved from the responsible and serious obligation of directing prosecutions and leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Public Prosecutor, but I do not think he should constitute an Appeal Court from my orders. I can, however, see no objection to the law officers having a veto. I have dealt with all matters which occur to me. If, however, there is any specific matter upon which I can render assistance to the Committee I shall be glad to do so.—H. Tindal Atkinson, Judge, Circuit No. 38."

Mr. THOMAS KEENS, called; and Examined.

5670. I think you are Secretary of the Luton Chamber of Commerce?—Yes. In addition to that I am a Fellow of the Incorporated Society of Accountants and Auditors, practising in Luton and in London.

5671. I think the views you are coming to put before us represent the Luton Chamber?—That is so.

5672. Is that a large body?—Not a particularly large body in point of numbers, but I believe it is the largest Chamber in proportion to population in the Kingdom.

5673. And has your Chamber collectively, and have you individually, given attention to the matters which this Committee is asked to consider?—Yes, consistently, for the last ten years.

5674. I think that the first subject on which you have been good enough to favour us with some views and facts is that of the bankrupt's discharge?—That is so.

5676. Would you kindly state as the result of your Chamber's experience what are the defects which exist and what you would suggest as a remedy?—In the first place, we suggest that the enormous growth in the number of undischarged bankrupts requires serious consideration. A large number of those undischarged bankrupts re-engage in trade, many of them in their own names, some in the names of their wives or their relatives or of an employé. We suggest that the provision of Section 31 of the Act of 1883, under which it is an offence to obtain credit for more than £20 without disclosing the fact that the debtor is an undischarged bankrupt does not afford adequate protection to the community. The number of prosecutions is very small. In a trading community like the borough of Luton, it is doubtful if a conviction could be obtained on the ground of the common knowledge of the bankruptcy. I cannot recall a single prosecution in this district under this section, although the number of undischarged bankrupts trading in their own names is considerable. Again, the provision can be easily evaded. In a case within my knowledge a grocer, an undischarged bankrupt, opened over 100 accounts all within the limit of £20, and stated to his creditors that they could not touch him as he had carefully kept within the limit, although the total indebtedness was considerable for the class of trade he was engaged in. An amendment of this section is, in my opinion, necessary. There is not sufficient discrimination under the present Act in suspending discharges according to the facts found in the bankruptcy. Since the introduction of the fixed minimum in the Act of 1890, where the assets are less than 10s. in the £, it has become the practice of county court judges to regard this as the full ordinary penalty. The suspension is, therefore, practically the same if only one fact is found or many. Provision should be made that the conduct of a debtor should in every case be brought before the court for consideration by the Official Receiver within six months of the conclusion of the public examination or such extended time as the court shall allow. The report can be on practically the same lines as the Official Receiver now makes to the court when the bankrupt makes application for his discharge. Upon the filing of the report, the matter should be set down by the registrar for hearing. Notice of the hearing having been served upon the bankrupt and notice given to the creditors in the ordinary way, the matter comes before the court, when all parties can be heard. It should be compulsory on every undischarged bankrupt to report every change of address to the Official Receiver, with the particulars of his trading name or style. The powers of the Judge in Bankruptcy should be extended, so that the court may be able, in addition to suspension of discharge, to inflict such punishment and impose such disabilities as may be deemed expedient, having regard to the facts and offences found in the bankruptcy. This view has been adopted by the Associated Chambers of Commerce, resolutions having been carried unanimously to this effect. The provisions of the laws relating to the discharge of a bankrupt should be made more stringent. One of the frequent causes of insolvency is bad book-keeping. In other cases the absence of books or books very incomplete and badly kept is only a cover for transactions of doubtful validity. It has been my experience that in every case where questions have arisen of fraudulent preference, transfers of property to wives or relatives, the books have been in such condition that the trustee could obtain no assistance from them. I am therefore of opinion that discharges should be refused with no possibility of a further application for five years, where debtors have failed to keep proper books of account. The question of what are proper books is a question of fact to be determined by the business of the bankrupt. The words of Section 8 of the Act of 1890 appear to be sufficient. Where it is apparent during the proceedings that not keeping reasonable accounts has been the means of covering up doubtful transactions, further penalties should be imposed. The following further offences should be followed by the imposition of penalties: (a) Rash and hazardous speculation, particularly outside the scope of the business, and also where the bankrupt has contributed to his bankruptcy by betting and gambling, (b) Fraudulent preference by the bankrupt, under such circumstances as to show that there was an attempt on the part of the bankrupt to defraud his creditors. I recognise that there is a natural desire on the part of debtors when the crash is approaching, to make their friends right where they are indebted to them under circumstances which admit of no doubt that the indebtedness is bona fide. On the other hand, in practice I have frequently met a claim on the part of a relative to goods, when the person claiming never had a banking account, kept no books, always handed money to the bankrupt to purchase goods, generally household furniture, and this story is corroborated by the bankrupt. This story is hard to meet and is frequently successful, especially if a jury is summoned. If, in addition to the risk of failure, the bankrupt had before him a penalty in the bankruptcy such claims would be fewer. The penalties contemplated under this head would be:—(a) Committal to prison for not exceeding forty-two days as a debtor; (b) Suspension of discharge for a fixed period with attendant disabilities. The condition of an undischarged bankrupt should be made a greater disability than at present, and under the altered circumstances of dealing with discharges, only those would be undischarged against whom certain facts or offences had been proved. The number would be very much smaller than at present, and the following suggestions are made: (1) There should be deprivation of political rights. (2) The undischarged bankrupt should be compelled to furnish to the Official Receiver every change of address and full particulars of his occupation. If a trader, the style of the firm. (3) There should be published annually in the London Gazette the names of all bankrupts undischarged. (4) Sec. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, should be amended to include an agreed aggregate sum in substitution for or as well as an individual credit of £20.

5677. I think that pretty well exhausts the first two clauses in our Terms of Reference?—That is so; and I should prefer to leave any details under those to Mr. Beck.

5678. Then if I may proceed to the 4th subject of our Terms of Reference about the realisation of property, I think that you in one of your statements to us have given your views upon that?—That is so. We are not of opinion that the present provision results in any hardship or harm to the debtor or creditors. Any realisation of property other than that of a perishable nature is very undesirable until after the first meeting. Creditors are certainly entitled to a voice in the disposition of the assets of a bankrupt, and it is difficult to see how the realisation can be very much expedited. If there are book debts, the collection must necessarily take some time and the realisation of the remaining assets can as a rule be effected long before the book debts are collected.

5679. (Chairman.) In reference to Clause 5 of our Terms of Reference what you said with reference to suppressing the number of undischarged bankrupts would of course mitigate the evil that is there referred to?—That is so.

5680. But your Chamber has some suggestions I think as regards the existing state of things for protecting creditors who deal bonâ fide with an undischarged bankrupt?—We only suggest that if any modification is made it should be limited to the protection of innocent persons in respect of property for valuable consideration, recognising the principle of law that the undischarged bankrupt is legally incapable of acquiring property and giving a title.

5681. Have you any suggestions to make as to publishing the names and addresses of undischarged bankrupts so that in some way or other people might know them?—We suggest that having got the number of undischarged bankrupts down to reasonable limits by bringing every debtor before the Court at the expiration of six months, or some such time, at the conclusion of the public examination, that subsequent to that the names of undischarged bankrupts should be published in the London Gazette, or in some other way annually; and in this connection we suggest that there should be a registration of firms in order to find out who are the actual partners in firms trading under various names.

5682. Then as regards married women the present state of the law I daresay you are aware of—I mean that there is such a very great immunity to a married woman who usually can only be made bankrupt if she has separate estate and is trading separately from her husband in respect of that estate. Has your Chamber any views with respect to that?—We suggest that the provision of the law by which a married woman can, in certain circumstances, be made a bankrupt, should be extended so as to render all classes of married women, who incur debts on their own account, subject to the Bankruptcy Law as males. And we suggest that it is highly desirable that there should be a registration of firms in order that it may be ascertained who is the actual proprietor of a business.

5683. Now passing over No. 7 of our Terms of Reference, No. 8 deals with the law relating to deeds of arrangement, and we should be glad to know what the considered opinion of your Chamber is as regards any amendment or alteration of the present state of the law?—The law relating to Voluntary Arrangements or compositions with creditors could in my opinion be amended with advantage to the commercial community in the following directions :—(a) The trustee under the deed should be compelled to issue an intimation of the execution of the deed to all creditors of whom he has knowledge as shown by the debtor's affidavit. That he should file in addition to the papers at present required :—(1) Copy of notice above referred to ; (2) affidavit of postage ; and (3) cover note of approved guarantee society for the estimated value of the assets. (b) That the trustee shall have power at any time after receiving assents of a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors, to apply to the Court to confirm the deed, giving notice of such application to non-assenting or dissenting creditors. The Court to have full power of enquiry and adjournment and discretion as to confirmation. Dissenting creditors to be entitled to represent to the Court in writing their objections to confirmation. The deed, if confirmed, to be binding on all parties and the debtor to be unable to file his own petition in respect of the debts included in the assignment. (c) Where the deed is voided by subsequent bankruptcy, unless in the opinion of the Court the estate has been wrongfully and negligently administered, the trustee to be treated as an agent and not as a trespasser, and his acts admitted; particularly that no debtor to an estate paying money to the trustee under the deed should be liable to be sued by the trustee in bankruptcy. Further the trustee under the deed on passing accounts with the official receiver to be eligible for election to the office of trustee in the bankruptcy. (d) Subject to the foregoing the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act to apply, and the power of disclaimer given to trustees in bankruptcy also.

5684. Then with reference to Clause 9 of our Terms of Reference we are asked whether assignments of book debts and assignments of hire purchase agreements should be registered rather in the way that Bills of Sale are registered. What is your view as to that ?—We are of opinion that a general assignment of book debts, and hire agreements of plant, and fixed machinery should be registered. It is difficult to see how hire agreements of furniture and domestic machinery, such as sewing machines, can be registered without practically abolishing the hire trade. If registration of hire agreements in respect of furniture is contemplated they should not be less than £30, the minimum sum fixed by the Bills of Sale Act.

5685. Then there are two points which are not exactly within our Terms of Reference but relate to the amendment of the law and possibly come within the general scope of our Reference, on which I believe you have some recommendations to make ?—Yes. We suggest that vesting clauses of materials in building contracts should be made null and avoid against a trustee so far as relates to all material not permanently fixed to buildings agreed by the contract to be erected.

5686. Is it the experience of your chamber that the present state of the law works mischievously ?—Yes.

5687. And then I think you have another recommendation as regards the law of fraudulent preference?—Yes, we suggest that the law relating to a fraudulent preference be amended making the result of a debtor's action and not his intention the test.

5688. That is to say if the transfer of property has the effect of preferring a creditor it should be void ?—That is so, rather than endeavouring to get into the debtor's mind to see what he intended at the time.

5689. (Mr. Barker.) Can you tell the Committee whether you think there is a steady decline of bankrupts seeking to obtain their discharge ?—It does not seem to be any real bar to them trading again, the question of discharge.

5690. What you mean to give the Committee to understand is that it is not a matter that they place that great importance upon, which it was thought they would do when the law was framed ?—That is my opinion.

5691. And in your opinion has the decline increased in late years ?—Yes ; there are a fewer number of people as far as my experience goes applying for their discharge to-day than there were some years ago.

5692. Do you think that a trader who has a banking account and pays his accounts by cheques should keep a proper set of books ?—Undoubtedly.

5693. And can you tell the Committee whether you believe failures have occurred through the non-keeping of books ?—My experience has been that in not more than 10 per cent. of failures have there been proper books kept, and I think 10 per cent. is rather a large proportion. Mr. Thomas Keens. 13 Mar. 1907.

5694. That is to say that only about 10 per cent of the bankrupts keep proper books ?—That is so. When I say proper books I mean books from which any information can be obtained—not necessarily books such as a man might keep without affording much information, but books which do contain some information of some kind or another. In these cases of failures the cash book is generally missing, or if it has been kept it is generally worthless and incomplete.

5695. And you think that if a man has a banking account he should keep a cash book ?—Undoubtedly. I mean to say that a large number of people in the country do not think they need to keep a cash book because they have a banking account.

5696. Do you think that a man should be punished by a short term of imprisonment if he does not keep a proper set of books ?—If his business was such that he should keep a proper set of books—I mean provided that the distinction is made as to the trader.

5697. And do you think he should, if he gambles or bets, keep an account of his gambling transactions ?—Certainly.

5698. And if a man by hazardous speculation and betting, or gambling, or fraudulent preference in any way, has been led into bankruptcy does your chamber think he should be imprisoned ?—Undoubtedly.

5699. And would you treat a woman in the same way as you would treat a man ; if a woman obtains credit and is dishonest to her creditors, would you treat her in the same way as a man ?—In precisely the same way.

5700. And you are in favour—your chamber advocates that where book debts or hire agreements amount to over £30 they should be registered in the same way as a Bill of Sale ?—That is so.

5701. (Mr. Chamberlin.) When you say that in your experience only 10 per cent. of bankrupts keep books of accounts I imagine that that would be amongst small traders ?—That is so. I am referring to particular bankrupts of which I have special knowledge, and failures (whether bankruptcies or not) in the particular industry with which I am very closely connected.

5702. In answer to Mr. Barker you said you would draw a distinction between one class of business in which the tradesmen ought to keep books of account and another class where he ought not to. Who is to draw that distinction ?—I do not think that it is really difficult to draw it. What I had in my mind was this—a little greengrocer is a trader undoubtedly just as a manufacturer on a large scale is, but I think it would be unreasonable to expect the former to keep a proper set of books.

5703. I was rather asking who you would suggest would be the arbitrator as to where the distinction is to be drawn ?—I think the distinction which might be drawn would be the one suggested by Mr. Barker, viz., that where a man carries on business and has a banking account he ought to keep a proper set of books.

5704. And anything below keeping a banking account you say should be exempt ?—No. But I think there would be a very great difficulty in getting any court to imprison a man under those circumstances. For instance, I do not say that it is impossible for people below that standard to keep books for a moment, but I do suggest that it would be difficult to get them locked up for not keeping them.

5705. As regards No. 9 of our terms of reference dealing with the general assignment of book debts, you say that in the judgment of your chamber they should be registered. I suppose your chamber has taken into consideration that there may be at some time an assignment of book debts of a large character which are assigned for a specific purpose and that there is a distinction between them and a general assignment of book debts ?—That is so. For instance, as you know, it is the custom of certain small traders to sell a few book debts rather than take the trouble and risk of collecting them. I do not think it would be necessary in that case, but where a mortgage is given for practically a large portion of them registration should be necessary.

5706. In large trades such as shipbuilding sometimes you get an overdraft from a bank or some financial corporation for the purpose of business. Would you say there was anything wrong in assigning a specific book debt for such a purpose ?—I should not. I should say that it was absolutely necessary. In the cases I have in my mind there have been instances where a trader carrying on business has without any knowledge of his creditors given an assignment of the whole of his book debts and it has only been when he has failed that they have ever found it out.

5707. If you are going to recommend that any assignment of book debts should be registered you would have to register everything ?—I suggest that general assignments of book debts should be registered.

5708. (Mr. Richardson.) I see that your chamber says, "That the trustee shall have power at any time after receiving assents of a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors to apply to the court to confirm the deed." Seeing that it is a voluntary arrangement do you think it is necessary to go to the court for confirmation ?—It seems to me that if you are going to get powers to bind the minority you have got to do something in an official way with that object.

5709. Do not you think that it would be enough if it were left to the option of a dissenting creditor to make his objection within a limited time ?—I should have no objection to that.

5710. Do not you think that a provision that application should be made to the court would increase the expenses and cause delay ?—It may increase the expenses, but I do not think it would cause any delay particularly.

5711. If the dissenting creditor were given a month—now he has three months —in which to object to an arrangement do not you think that would be sufficient and that the dissenting creditor should have the right to go to the court and not that the trustee should have that right ?—Do you suggest the limitation of their right to the presentation of a petition to a period of one month instead of three months.

5712. Yes ?—That would do something to meet it, but it always seemed to me that the real weakness of a deed of arrangement was the want of power to bind the minority. My experience has been that in a large number of cases bankruptcy has supervened where it was never the intention of the creditors that it should, but simply from the presence amongst the list of creditors of a money lender of or some creditor who wished to squeeze either the debtor's friends or the other creditors so that they might buy him out. As far as my chamber is concerned it suggests certainly having powers to go to the court to get the deed confirmed, but it would be equally satisfied if it could have the power to get confirmation of the deed without necessarily an application to the court.

5713. And you think that a month would be sufficient in which to allow any dissenting creditors to object ?—In my opinion it is quite long enough. A man ought to be able to make up his mind in a month as to whether he intends to assent to the deed. If he goes longer than that it is usually with the view that the creditors will square him rather than let it go into bankruptcy.

5714. I suppose you have frequently found that men who were able to keep books and have kept books have ceased to keep books ?—That is so.

5715. Do not you think that those people should be punished ?—I do think so.

5716. Without any hesitancy ?—Without any hesitancy.

5717. Because they have deliberately ceased to keep books ?—That is so.

5718. With the intention of mystifying the accounts ? Yes, I have always considered in those cases that they have ceased to keep books because they considered it was safer not to keep books.

5719. It is the opinion of your chamber of commerce that if provision were made for punishing such offences it would act as a deterrent to traders and tend to make them keep books ?—That is so.

5720. I do not know whether I understand this suggestion "that vesting clauses of materials in building contracts should be made null and void against a trustee so far as relates to all materials not permanently fixed to building agreed by the contract to be erected." Now by "to be erected" you intend to convey that where a building estate is being developed and traders have been supplying the builder with a considerable quantity of goods which have not been paid for, beyond what are necessary to complete the building, in case of bankruptcy the freeholder shall not have power to claim the assets on the ground ?—That is so.

5721. That is what you intend ?—That is what I intend. There are many well known cases in which it has been done and where the goods have been supplied for building twenty or forty houses, where it was only intended actually to build half a dozen.

5722. Half a dozen have been erected and material for twenty has been delivered and the freeholder has taken it all ?—Yes, the freeholder has taken the whole lot.

5723. (Chairman.) That would involve, of course, an interference with the freedom of contract, because it is always by virtue of a contract that that has been done ?—I admit that that is so.

5724. You still say that that contract should be void ?—Yes under those circumstances, because I maintain that it gives a very big opening to fraud. In fact I believe there have been cases in which the builder and the freeholder have been indicted for fraud as the result of transactions of that description.

5725. (Mr. Addison.) Dealing with that last point first, I daresay you know more about building contracts than I do, but have you considered this that very often the building owner makes advances on the architects' certificate in respect of the material on the ground ?—I have never known him to do it. I have known him to make plenty of advances in respect of the completed work, but then you see the stuff would be fixed to the freehold.

5726. But you have not known such cases as I suggest ?—I have not.

5727. With regard to married women I see you say that all classes of married women should be liable to be made bankrupt. That applies, I suppose, not only to a woman carrying on a trade but to merely incurring a debt ?—I simply suggest if they incur a debt on their own responsibility.

5728. Has that been considered by the Luton Chamber of Commerce ?—Yes it has.

5729. May I ask did they consider the matter only from the trader's point of view or did they consider the social aspect of it on husbands. Let me suggest a gentleman with an extravagant wife—she orders goods to the value of £50 without his approval, so as not to make him liable, Has it been considered what an unfortunate position the husband would be in if his wife were liable to be made bankrupt if he did not pay that £50 ?—Yes, I feel that, but still it seems to me to be much more unfortunate that traders should lose a considerable sum of money.

5730. May I take it that the point of view of the effect of such a provision upon what I may call social life and the position of the husband was not considered by the Luton Chamber of Commerce ?—I am afraid it was not very sympathetically considered.

5731. (Mr. Smith.) When you say there are very few prosecutions under Section 31, do you mean that there ought to be more prosecutions under that section ?—I am of the opinion and I think I may say I know that a considerable number of debtors do obtain credit for more than £20 without disclosing the fact.

5732. You have known such cases ?—Yes.

5733. But the creditors have taken no action ?—The creditors have taken no action.

5734. Can you explain the reason why ?—I do not think they, generally speaking, care to take the trouble ?

5735. The creditors do not care to take the trouble to enforce the law against the debtor who has defrauded them in that way ?—It is a considerable amount of trouble, and they do not usually care to take it.

5736. Is it not the case that there are comparatively few instances in which bankrupt debtors incur liabilities over £20?—I should not think so; I should think that they are very considerable.

5737. But they are not prosecuted?—They are not prosecuted.

5738. In whose interest then would you prosecute them—in the interests of the creditors?—No, I think you should prosecute them in the interest of the whole trading community.

5739. Although the creditors themselves do not think it worth their while to take any action?—It is quite another question as to whether or not a trader should lay out a good deal of money in a separate prosecution, or whether the public authorities should do so.

5740. It is not necessary for him to incur the cost of a prosecution—he could set the Public Prosecutor in motion. Do you know of any cases where representations have been made to the Public Prosecutor of fraud under that section where he refused to take them up?—I cannot say that I do.

5741. But you are still of opinion that there are many cases in which people know that debtors do incur liabilities beyond £20?—Yes, I am still of that opinion.

5742. Would you reduce the limit below £20?—No, I think the better way would be to retain the figure at £20 and to make an alternative aggregate sum.

5743. That is if he incurred a total amount of debts?—Yes.

5744. You do not make any suggestion to that effect?—I did in my evidence and I gave a case on the point.

5745. What is your suggestion?—I do not suggest what should be the aggregate sum, but I suggest that the section should be amended so as to read: "To include an agreed aggregate sum in substitution for or as well as an individual credit of £20."

5746. You would give the bankruptcy judge power to imprison the debtor?—Yes, that is so.

5748. It is the bankruptcy judge that your chamber desires should be vested with the power of imprisonment?—That is so.

5749. And you would imprison a man for not keeping books?—Yes, where the effect of not keeping books was to show losses to the estate.

5750. And with regard to deeds of arrangement you state in your paper and you said it in your evidence in chief, that you would give the trustee power to go to the Court and you would give the Court a discretionary power to make the deed binding on a minority?—That is so.

5751. Now you say that the Chamber would be equally willing to make the deed binding without the intervention of the Court?—That is so. What they want to do is to make the deed binding. Mr. Thomas Keens. 13 Mar. 1907.

5752. You want to make the deed binding under any circumstances?—Yes, on a minority under any circumstances.

5753. But you say that the creditors should have the power of representing to the Court their objections to the confirmation?—Yes, we say that.

5754. Or that they should not have the power? Which of those propositions do you put forward as the view of the Luton Chamber—that the creditors should have the right to object to the deed or that they should not?—Well, I take it that the position is not affected either way. If the law is made that the trustee shall go to the Court for confirmation of a deed, then the creditors would have power to object on the hearing to the confirmation of the deed. If, on the other hand, it is suggested that the time within which they shall be able to present a petition shall be a month instead of three months, I take it that the case is still met by the fact that the dissentient creditor is heard on the petition before the registrar.

5755. But which of those courses do the Luton Chamber recommend?—The Luton Chamber recommend that the trustee should take the deed into court to get it confirmed. We say if you suggest another course and that you limit it to a month we have no objection.

5756. I simply asked what course the Luton Chamber suggested under the circumstances, and I take your answer to be that the trustee should go to the court to get a confirmation?—That is so.

5757. Making the deed binding. On what grounds would the Court come to a decision for confirming the deed or rejecting it?—It would be upon such ground as would be brought out by the dissentient creditors. They might suggest that the assents were obtained by a wrong representation.

5758. Supposing it was suggested that the debtor had not kept proper books would you expect the court to exercise its discretion with reference to that fact and refuse to confirm the deed?—Yes, I should if that is to be the root principle.

5759. And of course it would be within the power of the Court to make any investigation in order to ascertain that fact?—That is so.

5760. (Chairman.) I might call one matter to your attention—perhaps it is a matter that Mr. Beck might deal with because I think you are not a lawyer, but some of the learned county court judges have suggested a difficulty in the way of their imposing a term of imprisonment. They do not like to imprison a man unless he has a regular criminal trial. Perhaps you have not thought that view out?—I heard you read the suggestion of Judge Tindal Atkinson, and as far as the Luton Chamber are concerned I do not think that they would very much mind in what particular way the bankrupts were brought to book, but it would not be imposing any very wonderful responsibility on the county court judges, or a greater responsibility than they now have under the Debtors Act for committing debtors.

Mr. Frederic Walter Beck, called; and Examined.

5761. (Chairman.) I think you are a solicitor practising at 21, Lime Street, London, and a member of the firm of Neve Beck and Kirby of 21, Lime Street, and Neve Beck and Montague Austin, of Luton, Beds?—That is so. Mr. Frederic W. Beck. 13 Mar. 1907

5762. I think you are solicitor to the Metropolitan Grocers' and Provision Dealers' Association and the Federation of Grocers' Associations of the United Kingdom, and that you are also solicitor for the Chemists' Defence Association?—Yes.

5763. And that you have been clerk to the justices of the Luton division and for three years President of the Luton Chamber of Commerce?—Yes.

5764. And I think that you are nominated to give evidence before us on behalf of the Federation of Grocers Associations and the Metropolitan Grocers' and Provision Dealers' Association?—Yes, that is so.

5765. Personally, I think you have had a large experience in connection with the administration of estates in bankruptcy and under deeds?—Yes.

5766. Could you give us some idea of what the constitution of the Federation of Grocers' Associations and the Metropolitan Grocers' and Provision Dealers' Association is—I mean to say what number of firms they represent and so forth?—Yes, the Metropolitan Grocers' and Provision Dealers' Association represent, I think, some 2,000 retail grocers in the metropolis. The Federation of Grocers' Associations of the United Kingdom represents the whole of the Grocers' Associations throughout the country who are affiliated with the federation.

and in that respect represents a very large number of retail traders throughout the country.

5767. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Have you wholesale as well ?—No, it is composed purely of retail dealers.

5768. (Chairman.) Then is there a central body to which all the other bodies are affiliated ?—Yes, the central body is the federation and the federation acts through its executive and through what is called the General Purposes Committee, which has upon it representatives of all the associations affiliated with the federation.

5769. I think that you have directed your attention mainly to two of the questions referred to us namely, the question of the application for discharge by a debtor and the question of deeds of arrangement ?—Yes, that is so.

5771. And what would be the means that your association would recommend ?—That instead of it being left optional to the debtor to make an application for discharge, because experience has shown that the proportion of applicants is very small to the number of orders in bankruptcy, there should be a report made bringing the debtor's conduct before the Court within six months after the close of his examination.

5772. And so that he should be brought before the Court ?—So that he should be brought before the Court nolens volens, and that it should not be left merely to his option to make the application for discharge, so that the Court always has the opportunity of considering the conduct of a debtor in relation to his estate.

5773. And then when you have got him before the Court, have you any suggestion to make as to what should be done with him ?—Yes. Speaking broadly, I think the view of the Grocers' Federation is that a man should either have his discharge forthwith or suffer some kind of summary punishment—that if a man is not fit to receive his discharge, he is worthy of some kind of small punishment.

5774. And would you recommend that the Bankruptcy Judge should have power to inflict punishment or only power to commit him to be dealt with by one of the criminal tribunals ?—The view of the Association I represent is very strongly that that power should be vested in the Bankruptcy Judge, who has brought before him the whole of the debtor's conduct in relation to his affairs, and that the committal of a debtor to a separate tribunal would involve a very great expense and would involve bringing before the court facts which have already been proved before a court of competent jurisdiction.

5775. Then as regards the prosecution of debtors, as for instance under Sec. 31, have your association any complaints to make under that head ?—No, the prosecutions undoubtedly have been very few and I think experience has shewn that convictions have been very difficult to get.

5776. Would you add to the number of disabilities and penalties that are at present imposed upon bankrupts whose conduct has been satisfactory ?—Where the discharge is not granted the suggestion made is that the existing disabilities shall of course be imposed upon debtors whose discharge is refused.

5777. And also that there should be power to punish summarily ?—Yes.

5778. I see the associated Chamber of Commerce have passed a resolution ?—Yes.

5779. I think it was on your motion that the resolution which you have set out was passed ?—Yes, that is to say, I was representing then the Luton Chamber of Commerce and not the Grocers' Federation, although they are in entire concurrence with that resolution.

5780. And substantially what it says is that you would amend the law by providing that within six months, or such extended time as the Court should allow, after the public examination present a report as to the debtor's conduct relative to his affairs, and that if, after such report, it be proved that the debtor has been guilty of misconduct, the Court be empowered to inflict such summary punishment and impose such disabilities as may be deemed expedient. Is that the view, do you know, of the federation as well ?—Yes, that is the view of the associated chambers and the federation concurred in that resolution.

5781. Have you considered at all the question of punishment for not keeping books, gambling, and what, if any, other offences ?—Contracting debts without reasonable or probable expectation of payment, rash and hazardous speculation outside the scope of the business, and where the bankruptcy has been brought about by losses in betting and gambling, and where there has been fraudulent preference with a view to defrauding creditors. I confess my clients do not go quite so far—I mean my association do not go quite so far as the Luton Chamber of Commerce in recommending that there should be imprisonment for not keeping proper books.

5783. Now then, passing on to the deeds of arrangement, would you just favour the committee with your views and the views of your chamber as to what alteration in the law is desirable ?—It is felt that it is a serious drawback that there should be no means of making a deed of arrangement binding upon a dissentient minority, especially as in very many instances the minorities are extremely small minorities, and composed of people who stand out either on their own initiative, or on advice, for the purpose of obtaining some unfair advantage from the debtor or his friends, or sometimes from the principal creditors themselves.

5784. That is the disadvantage—now what would you suggest as the remedy ?—That there should be a power of application to the court to bind minorities. We do not suggest that where there is no outstanding minority that a deed of arrangement should necessarily be brought before the Court to make it binding upon the parties to it, because there seems no reason for doing that, but there should be an application to the Court to bind minorities, and upon that application the minority should be entitled to be heard and to object to the deed being confirmed by the Court.

5785. Would that amount to this, that there should be in every case an application to the court to confirm it, or only if some minority objected ?—Only if some minority objected.

5786. Then supposing that there was a creditor who simply stood aloof and did not take part in the proceedings at all, would you give him power to go to the Court ?—No, I would certainly regard him as dissenting, and make it incumbent on the debtor or his trustee to bring the matter before the Court, before you can bind the person who is silent and who has not assented.

5787. Then I think that you would recommend that on his application for confirmation, the registrar should have three alternatives ?—Yes.

5788. Please name them ?—First to confirm the deed and make it binding on minorities, secondly, and alternatively, to defer the confirmation and direct a public examination of the debtor upon specified facts being alleged by dissenting creditors, and as a third alternative to make, straight away, a receiving order against the debtor.

5789. In your experience, which I understand has been a large one have you come across many cases in which creditors stand out ?—I think I have known very few cases indeed where all the creditors have assented. I believe in the vast majority of cases there are some creditors who stand out until at any rate the very last moment when the dividend is on the point of being paid.

5790. Have you any views to offer us on the question of the three months limit. I mean at present of course a trustee cannot safely do anything during the period of three months—in fact, I think there was only a few days ago a case reported in the law papers in which a trustee in the three months had sold the property and it was held that he could not make a good title to it ?—I appreciate that, but if you can get your deed made binding at any rate long before the period of three months, the question of the three months ceases to be effective in any way because it is merely the limit of time for the presentation of the petition.

5791. I see you have not in the statement you have been good enough to put forward to us dealt with it, but have you any views on two of the questions referred to us, namely, whether the trustee should give security, and whether his accounts should be subject to audit ?—I think unquestionably the Association I represent would be in entire concurrence with that—that in every case the accounts should be audited and that security should be given.

5792. (Mr. Addison.) Do you mean an audit by the Board of Trade, or an audit by a Committee of Inspection ?—I had in my mind an official audit by the Board of Trade.

5793. (Mr. Richardson.) On page 4, Clause (b) you say : " Discharge of the debtor subject to specified disabilities for a specified time " ?—Yes.

5794. I do not know whether you say what those specified disabilities should be ?—I had in my mind the disabilities somewhat similar to those that Mr. Keens has mentioned to-day, that is to say deprivation of civil rights and a liability to report annually his places of residence and a liability to be called upon at any time by the official receiver to undergo further examination.

5795. That is so long as his discharge remained ungranted ?—Yes.

5796–801. (Mr. Smith.) And to render accounts ?—And to render accounts. I see no reason why it should not involve that, for certainly an annual list of undischarged bankrupts. I remember when I first brought the matter before the Associated Chamber I suggested, and I think it is not impossible, that there should be a day each year on which undischarged bankrupts should surrender and undergo examination.

5802. (Mr. Richardson.) Would your association be in favour of the majority ruling in case of deeds of arrangement, and that if there were no objections within a month that that would be absolute ?—I think you would find it difficult in practice for this reason. I think there must be some formal step which makes the document binding on the dissentient persons, and I do not see how you are to get that evidence unless you have some formal application to the Court and a binding order made. In practice, I do not think it would be found effective.

5803. Do not you think that your process would add very much to the cost of realisation and also occasion considerable delay ?—I do not think so, but I think it might perfectly well be that an application might be made to the court to confirm a deed within seven days after it had been executed, and there would be an affidavit by the person who was responsible for the calling of the meeting and a certificate by the chairman which was the practice under the old 1869 Act. I think the whole of it might be done and carried through within fourteen days if there were no dissentient creditors, that is to say if the dissentient creditors did not pursue their opposition.

5805. Are they willing for these voluntary deeds of arrangement to come under the influence of the Court ?—That is the view where there are dissentient creditors.

5806. No, in any case it must come before the Court ?—No. I thought I had made my view clear.

5807. Yes. I remember now, but would you not have this difficulty with one or two creditors. You hear nothing from them, so that when you applied to the Court for compulsory powers to carrying out the deed these men would turn up and say : " We never heard anything of it." Would it not leave open the door to all sorts of delays to arise ?—I think the machinery should be such that it would be impossible for a man to say that he did not know of the meeting and did not know of the proposal. I think you would be bound to prove that he had notice of the meeting and that he had notice of the resolution and that if he does not assent say, within four or five days after the meeting, he must be deemed to dissent. Then I suggest that the matter should be brought before the Court. I think it would be found in practice that if creditors realised that the application would be made and that expenses would be involved by it, they would, instead of lying by as they do now, make a definite reply and that deeds would be much more effective.

5808. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I take it from what you have told us that the trades that you represent officially consider that a very great grievance in connection with this particular matter that Mr. Richardson has been asking about ?—Yes, that is so.

5809. I think I understood your answer to the Chairman to be that in a great many cases, in a majority of cases, you find that there are dissentient creditors ?—Yes, under the present system.

5811. One question that I want to ask, so that I may be quite clear about it, is this. You give us to understand that in your experience there are a very small number of prosecutions in respect of undischarged bankrupts obtaining credit without disclosure ?—Yes, in my experience a very small number. I think I have come across very few instances and in a great proportion of those I have found that there has been a want of success in those prosecutions.

5812. Have you any reason to give at all for that ?—I think very likely it is because for one thing the creditors do not want to be troubled with them. It is difficult to move a public authority to do anything and then I think there is a great deal of sympathy on the part of common juries at Sessions if a debtor in that position gets before them. I have known a number of cases in which there ought to have been convictions, in my opinion, where there have been dismissals.

5813. (Mr. Barker.) Do you not think that in many of those cases a man, knowing the uncertainty of the law and the expense of prosecuting, is discouraged to a great extent from entering upon a prosecution ?—I think so. I think tradesmen do not want to be troubled with the expense and with the anxiety of litigation of that kind.

5815. Do you find that chemists keep their accounts fairly well ?—I am afraid not so well as grocers, and grocers are pretty bad.

5816. Grocers' accounts would be better kept than those of a provision merchant ?—Yes, a great deal, and there is this reason for that and a perfectly good explanation for that, that the grocer has a greater variety of accounts and usually gives longer credit.

5817. For some things ?—I mean his trade is different to the provision trade where the turnover is larger and more rapid and where the same necessity for careful book-keeping does not exist.

5818. Do not you think that there is more necessity to keep your books properly in the business of a provision merchant than in that of a grocer—I am speaking of the leakages in the business of the former?—Yes, from the stock-keeping point of view.

5819. It is a very simple thing if they choose to keep their books ?—Certainly.

5820. It is a very easy thing to take stock every week. If they did that every week they would never fail ?—No, that is perfectly true.

5821. And they would know how the loss arose ?—Yes.

5822. I take it that you think that an undischarged bankrupt should get his discharge in six months and that there is no reason why he should wait three years for it ?—No, that is the view of the people I represent.

THIRTY-SECOND DAY.

Wednesday, 20th March, 1907.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

JOSEPH ADDISON, Esq.
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. ROBERT JAMES WARD, called; and Examined.

Mr. Robert J. Ward.

20 Mar. 1907.

5823. (Chairman.) I think that you are a chartered accountant?—Yes.

5824. Of Clement's Inn?—Yes.

5825. And you represent the National Federation of Building Trades Employers of Great Britain and Ireland?—Yes.

5826. Could you just acquaint the Committee with the composition of that body and to what extent it is representative of the building trade?—I believe that it is representative of the whole building trade in Great Britain and Ireland.

5827. Is it a federation of a number of associations, or is it a body to which different members belong?—I think it is a federation which is attached really to the building societies of London—a sort of star outside the sun, so to speak.

5828. Can you give us any sort of idea of the number of building firms or companies there are whose views you represent here?—I cannot give you the number.

5829. Is it a very large number?—Yes, very large.

5830. And they represent a large amount of invested capital?—Certainly.

5831. I think that independently of your representative capacity you have had a considerable experience in the administration of estates?—I have.

5832. And your experience has led you to form definite opinions on the existing state of our bankruptcy administration?—It has done so.

5833. And I think you have considered the Terms of Reference upon which this Committee has been asked to enquire and report?—Yes, I have.

5834. Now, in regard to the first of our Terms of Reference, which relates to the question whether the law should be altered with regard to the investigation of a bankrupt's affairs and conduct, and his punishment—would you just favour us with your views?—I put that at some length in a minute I sent to the secretary, shall I read it to you?

5835. We have each of us had a copy of it?—Oh, very well. My view, then, is that as the Act at present stands, there is sufficient power given to a trustee to enquire into the debtor's conduct both prior to and during his bankruptcy.

5836. And I gather that you are not in favour of any increase of the disabilities or punishments?—I do not think that any increase would do a very large amount of good, so far as that question is concerned. You see Section 27 gives us a very wide power, and it also gives us an opportunity of discovering matters affecting the conduct of the debtor. If you would like me to give an instance I will do so.

5837. Yes, please?—It would be with reference to a case I had about two years ago, in which a receiving order was made against a debtor on a creditor's petition, and he signed a statement of affairs, disclosing no assets whatever. The debtor was an oldish man. He failed, apparently, to show any capacity to answer enquiries either by the registrar or the official receiver in his public examination, but under the section I was enabled to discover assets to the value of about £6,000. The result of that investigation was ultimately that, under the powers contained in the section as to judging of the character of the debtor, upon his application for discharge the judge made an order for his prosecution, the debtor pleaded guilty, and he was convicted, and he was bound over to come up for judgment because of his great age. He was seventy-three or seventy-four years of age. That seems to me to prove that the section gives great power, first of all to ascertain as to assets, and secondly whether the conduct of the debtor has not been what it should have been, and in that event to bring him under the power of the judge in the way I have described, so that I think as the law at present stands it is sufficient for all purposes.

5838. You, as I gather, do not think that any increase of punishment, such as making the non-keeping of books a penal offence, would be of advantage, is that so?—I think it is important of course that one should have books kept. Perhaps I would go so far as to say yes—that the non-keeping of books should be a penal offence.

5839. Now it has been suggested, passing on to paragraph No. 2, that a bankrupt only comes up for the consideration of his conduct with the view of deciding whether he is to have his discharge or not if he pleases?—That is so.

5840. Well, do you think that the law might with advantage be altered so as to make him come up in any case?—I have said in my note here, if a judgment was entered against every debtor for the payment of at least 5s. in the pound, and the discharge should only be granted conditionally upon such a judgment being entered against a debtor for a sum sufficient to make up that dividend, supposing his estate should not realise it, I think in that way the creditors would have a chance of receiving a minimum dividend, and the debtor might be deterred from continuing to trade after knowledge that he was so hopelessly insolvent that he would not be able to pay 5s. in the pound.

5842. Do you think that that would often be productive?—I think that if a trader knew that he would not be able to pay 5s. in the pound he would pull up very much sooner than he often does.

5843. I daresay you remember that sometimes judges have been reluctant to make that order for the payment of a sum, or to enter up judgment for a sum on the ground that they have said that it might be a millstone round the debtor's neck?—I do not think that it would be so.

5844. Now if I may pass on to No. 4, which is a subject which the federation of trades you represent is very much interested in, do you think that the existing provisions as to realising and administration are sufficient having particular regard to insolvencies among builders?—I think they are sufficient as they at present stand.

5846. Not ?—I think it not infrequently happens that in dealing with the assets of a builder that the freeholder imperils the sale as a going concern, or prejudices the composition which a debtor's friends might be disposed to bring in. If the assets are tampered with in the early stages of the bankruptcy it is not calculated to my mind to produce good results. If I might say so, there is no doubt that the building trade is a very particular one, and for trustees in bankruptcy to have to deal with building estates they want special knowledge. The creditors are undoubtedly benefited in the long run by that special knowledge which builders' trustees possess.

5847. As a matter of practice before the trustee is appointed it is common to have a special manager in a building case, is it not ?—Yes, or an agent. The official receiver appoints an agent, and then he deals only with that part of the case which he is recommended to do by the agent or special manager.

5848. Do you experience any special difficulty during the period which elapses between the receiving order and the other creditors appointing a creditors' trustee, in the management of the estate, and in keeping things going and preventing deterioration ?—Anything that is perishable it would be wise to get rid of, but there are very few goods of that sort in a building estate, I submit.

5849. But in practice if the houses are covered or only taken up to the first floor is work generally suspended, or does it go on ?—It is generally suspended in the case of bankruptcy.

5850. Our fifth subject of reference is that which relates to the after-acquired property of an undischarged bankrupt. Do you think it would be right that the subsequent creditors, if an undischarged bankrupt trades, should have a preference over the after-acquired goods ?—I certainly think so.

5851. And that transactions with an undischarged bankrupt should be protected ?—I think so.

5852. Of course, I suppose it has been your interest as trustee in the first bankruptcy to assert that title ?—It has been, but I do not think that it is right in principle. I certainly think that the creditors of the second bankruptcy should have a first charge upon any assets that the bankrupt might have, subject to my notion as to the compulsory judgment for 5s. in the £ being paid, and there I think the case of Cohen v. Mitchell comes in.

5853. Now what are your views on the question of subjecting married women to the bankruptcy laws ?—I think that any married woman carrying on trade should be liable to the bankruptcy laws just as the man is.

5854. Has it come before you in practice at all, the sort of losses to creditors which occur through married women not being subject to bankruptcy process ?—I think it happens sometimes in this way: that a man becomes bankrupt, and then his wife continues the business, employing him as a sort of servant, although he is practically the master of the position. She has no responsibility, and supposing the man fails again she cannot be made a bankrupt if the thing does not go on all right. I think if married women put themselves into competition with men in that way, they should be subject to the same disabilities.

5855. I see that you have in the written statement you have been good enough to furnish us with, dealt with Paragraph 7 which has not been very much touched upon by the witnesses who have come before us. Do you think that the present provision as to settlements should be extended at all in the interests of the general body of creditors ?—I think all settlements should be subject to Sect. 47 of the present Act.

5856. Ante-nuptial as well as post-nuptial ?—As well as post-nuptial.

5857. The point I am particularly interested in is as regards proving on covenants in a settlement. I think you would defer the proof under a settlement to the proofs of the ordinary trade creditors ?—Yes.

5858. Then in reference to deeds of arrangement, I should like if you would favour the committee with your views as to any alterations in the present system ?—I think with regard to deeds of arrangement that if some method could be adopted whereby they could be as operative as a resolution in bankruptcy, it would be very desirable. At present, as the law exists, a trustee is almost powerless to take any action under a deed until three months have expired. He can make no application for book debts—he can enforce no claim for book debts certainly, nor can he, without incurring a risk, very often, dispose of stock; and it does seem to me that if the deed of assignment could be made absolute on a majority of cash creditors and trade creditors—I would not have the one or the other to rule it—but if the majority of trade creditors and cash creditors came to the conclusion that a deed was the best thing, then I should suggest that it should be made immediately operative, and that they should not have to wait three months before they worked under it.

5859. Then what would you do for the dissentient creditors ?—Let them take the same position as they do now in bankruptcy.

5860. In bankruptcy they have three months within which they can petition, and if they petition the deed is upset ?—That is so. What I say is that the dissentients should be bound by the majority under the deed in the same way as they are bound by the appointment of a trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy is appointed by a majority in value and the same should apply under deeds of assignment, it seems to me.

5861. Would it not be necessary to take care that every creditor has knowledge of the meeting ?—Oh, certainly, and so I should have the same law observed, and that every creditor should have notice of the meeting, and should vote.

5862. Then what would be the practical step to take to ensure that each creditor has notice? Of course in a bankruptcy the official receiver sends out to the creditors mentioned in the debtor's statement ?—As a rule before any meeting of creditors is called, the solicitor to the debtor, or the accountant, in preparing the statement of affairs, has plenty of opportunity of ascertaining from the debtor's books, or from some other source a detailed list of the creditors, and either the solicitor or the accountant, making up the accounts, can give notice just as easily—that is commonly done now. There is scarcely a meeting of creditors which is called when there is a suggestion for a voluntary winding up without each creditor having had due notice of the meeting Official receivers frequently convene meetings of creditors before the statement of affairs is sworn to, and often a number of creditors do not receive notice of a first meeting convened under the Bankruptcy Act.

5863. Would you make the resolution binding on a creditor who, by some omission, has not had notice of it, or do you find that that does not often happen ?—It does not often happen, but I should make it binding certainly.

should like to see, as far as I am personally concerned, deeds of assignment made just as powerful, if possible, as bankruptcy, and that power should be given to the trustee to apply to the Court for guidance, or opinion.

5864 By the "Court" you mean the Bankruptcy Court ?—Yes, certainly.

5866. What would you do about any audit of accounts ?—Either by the committee of inspection, or, if the creditors desired it, by the Board of Trade. Let a committee of inspection be appointed from the body of creditors, and let the trustee submit his accounts to them for examination in the same way as he does now; let the final account be issued to the creditors just in the same way as, in the majority of cases, is now done.

5867. The last matter I wanted to ask you about was with reference to the rather special branch of commerce with which those whom you represent are connected. Perhaps you would just give us your views generally, with regard to any change in the law for the protection of those who are engaged in building societies in your own way ?—Take an ordinary building contract, and an ordinary builder. We will not speak of the speculative builder for the moment, but an ordinary building contract. There are in London a considerable number of men who pose as architects, but they are practically speculative builders. I have a case in my own mind which happened very recently, where one of these men took the lease of a house—an old lease just expiring in some thriving neighbourhood. He arranged with the freeholder to have it for the first year at a peppercorn rent, fixing the rent to be paid afterwards, and he undertook to build a house, or flats, or whatever it might be, upon that particular site. Then that same man enters into a contract, or invites builders to compete, and a contract is accepted by this architect on behalf of himself, or some syndicate. Concurrently with the acceptance of the contract the employer enters into some arrangement for a mortgage, some portion of which money is to be advanced as the building proceeds. As a rule, in most building contracts a clause is inserted for the retention of at least 20 per cent. of the amount of the contract for some six months, and sometimes a longer period after completion; 20 per cent. of the amount of the contract is retained. Now we will assume for the moment that the contract is one of £40,000. In the particular case I have in my mind is was one of £40,000. Therefore the retention money on that particular contract will be £2,000. Now it is within my own knowledge that the employer in that case sold the premises, lock, stock, and barrel. I do not think he has paid to this day the builder the balance of the retention money under the contract. Now, I think that any balance due to a contractor who has no power of ascertaining what his employer is doing with regard to financing the property should be a first charge on the property.

5868. And you would have to provide for that by legislation?—In some way I would protect the unhappy builder from being mulcted as he very often is, in large sums of money by reason of such transactions. Then with regard to the contracts which are used by many builders and which many impecunious builders will sign, they give to the freeholder and very often to the employer in the event of bankruptcy or stoppage an absolute right to all the materials and all the plant upon the site against the general body of creditors. Now, I should like to have that so altered that a builder should be protected in some way and that for the value of the materials upon the site and also for the plant which was upon the site he should be paid a proper sum by the employers or owners, and that they should not have power to take possession as they do now taking everything away from the builder, or in the case of bankruptcy from the creditors.

5870. Have you formulated in your own mind at all what kind of provision you would suggest in order to meet that state of things; would you provide that the builder who brings materials on the ground should for himself before he is insolvent and for his creditors after he is insolvent, have a charge in the nature of a lien?—Yes, that would be my idea.

5871 To prevail against the land owner?—To prevail against the land owner, and that the freeholder should not be allowed to take possession and sell everything just as he chooses without any reference to the claims of the people who supplied the goods.

5872. That would be, in fact, giving a lien practically in favour of the builders' merchants and people like them for the value of the materials they had themselves supplied?—Yes, exactly.

5873. Do you find in administering the estates of bankrupt builders that you are often met with a freeholder's successful claim which sweeps up the assets?——One has to acept it as it at present stands, but it seems to me the debtor enters into an agreement which gives the freeholder the power of taking whatever is on the site.

5874. And that is binding on the trustee, of course?—That is binding on the trustee, and it is not often that you will find many to fight these things, as the creditors are not often disposed to throw good money after bad.

5875. (Mr. Richardson.) Is your Federation composed of builders only, or of builders and merchants?—I think of builders only.

5876. I do not know whether you said quite whether you were in favour or not of the debtor coming up for discharge?—I do not think so, because I think the present disabilities are such that if a man does not come up for his discharge he cannot trade without giving notice of his being an undischarged bankrupt, and therefore cannot enter into any very large building speculations, and otherwise, if he goes on trading recklessly he comes in under Section 31.

5877. But is not the immense number of undischarged bankrupts who are in the country a great disadvantage and a menace to trade generally—some of whom, hundreds of whom, thousands of whom, may be bankrupts who really have done nothing wrong, and do not you think that it would be better that they should be compelled to come up in six months time after the official examination, and that discharges should be modified and altered. Now a discharge is usually for two years or three years. Do not you think that there should be a six months' deprivation of political rights or the imposition of disabilities of some kind?—I think the present disabilities are sufficient. If they are made much worse than they are it would amount almost to persecution. Any right-minded debtor, if one might use the term, would make an application in order to trade in business again if he meant to do what was right.

5878. But just think—do you think that any bankrupt cares a fig about being undischarged?—Oh, I think so.

5879. Why do not more apply then for discharge—they can trade again, cannot they?—They can trade by giving notice; do you mean without getting a discharge.

5880. Yes?—There is nothing to prevent them. A man must live, and a man can go on again.

5881. As regards deeds of arrangement you mean that a majority in value and in number should bind?—No, in value only.

5882. Do not you think that that would be rather a disadvantage, because very often one large creditor is able to swamp the majority?—I should have the majority in value of cash creditors, and the majority in value of trade creditors to carry the appointment.

5883. In value?—In value—not in number.

5884. Among trade creditors it happens very frequently that one trade creditor will pay a creditor more than half his total loss?—It does not very often happen in my experience—occasionally it happens so, but not often.

5885. You simply take the value in both cases?—I would take the value in cash and the value in trade.

5886. Would you limit the dissentient creditors' right to enforce bankruptcy to one month instead of three months, as at present?—My own feeling is that as soon as the meeting has taken place, and all the creditors that are known have been called together and have passed a resolution, it should become operative immediately as it is in bankruptcy, and that the registration should take place at once, and the deed should become absolute.

5887. Would you limit the right of the dissentient creditor to enforce bankruptcy to one month instead of three months ?—I would not give them the power they have now.

5888. With regard to the non-keeping of books, would you make it absolutely certain if a man had kept books, was able to keep books, and had ceased to keep books, that he should have some punishment such as fourteen days imprisonment ?—You mean to make it a misdemeanour if a man could keep books, and did not. Of course if he does not keep books, he can get them kept for him, but I do not think I would make it a misdemeanour.

5889. Not if he has kept books and kept them properly for years, and then ceased to keep them ?—If you could show that he had ceased to keep books in order to defraud his creditors, then I would make him subject to punishment of some sort.

5891. You think that the builder suffers more ?—I think that the builder suffers more, because as a rule, the builder can pay, and they do pay their merchants. There is a case I can give you now, where a man became bankrupt. He got into debt with a client of mine to the extent of £2,000. He paid £1,000 on account, and became bankrupt, and they only got 1s. for the rest of it because somebody else happened to come in and get the property.

5892. You are really stating the case of a shoddy sort of architect ?—The balance that the architect or owner retains under the contract for a period of six months or sometimes longer, amounts to 20 per cent. of the contract money. It does seem to me to be manifestly unfair to the builder that the employer can deal with the property by selling it, or in any way he chooses and that in the event of his becoming unable to pay the builder has to go without his money, although it is retained. Take, for instance, a place not 200 yards from here, where a large place is built. The builder puts on a lot of extra work and completes the contract; the company negotiates the security, and one fine morning a debenture holder walks in, although the poor unfortunate builder is owed £30,000. Why should the debenture holder walk in and take this builder's £30,000 ? I do not think there is a chance of getting a shilling of it.

5893. I am not disagreeing with you, but I also want to point out that the builder's merchant is more frequently the sufferer in a case of this kind, than the builder, so far as my knowledge goes of this transaction ?—All I can say in this case is that the builders' merchants have all been paid, and my client stands to lose £30,000.

5894. I know in that case it was so; the builders were a very eminent firm, but these sort of cases are more generally carried out by the freeholder, the solicitor, and an architect who are of bad repute. The builder joins in. Is it not in your experience that that often obtains ?—I have not much experience with bad lawyers I am glad to say, but I do feel very strongly that the builder should be in some way protected from losing money which he really is entitled to. Look how hard it is upon builders, for instance, if they happen to be losing money on a contract. They have got some thousands of pounds retained for possible defects which may not happen at all for six months after the owner has possession. I have had to do with some of the biggest builders in London and the conclusion I have come to is confirmed from the experience that I have had with their accounts that something ought to be done to protect them. They have only power to enforce a claim to rank for dividend, but in the case of a company the debenture holders walk in and take everything and the poor builder has to whistle for his balance.

5895. (Mr. Smith.) I suppose you consider the question of the debtor's conduct a matter between himself and his creditors ?—To a great extent.

5896. And not a matter for the Court to interfere with ?—I think in some cases the Court should interfere. In some cases where it is a question of reckless trading or anything of that sort the Court should interfere, but the Court does interfere now as a matter of fact.

5897. How would you ascertain those cases ?—At the present time the official receivers and the trustees both investigate as to conduct and upon their report the Court pronounces judgment.

5898. Do you think that is right ?—I think so.

5899. Why do you give the majority of creditors power to dispense with an investigation of this sort in the case of deeds of arrangement ?—I would allow them the power of investigation.

5900. You would dispense with any power in the Court to investigate ?—No I would not.

5901. Surely under a deed of arrangement ?—No, I would not.

5902. Then does your deed of arrangement imply that the matter should be investigated by the Court ?—Yes, subject to the wish of the creditors certainly. If the creditors wished the accounts under the deed of assignment to be examined by the Court I should say certainly let them be examined.

5903. Supposing one creditor wished it to be investigated by the Court ?—If it was really a genuine suggestion I should raise no objection to it personally.

5904. How would you ascertain that it was genuine ?—I suppose if a creditor really wanted to have the accounts of a trustee examined by the Court.

5905. (Chairman.) I think Mr. Smith means the conduct of the debtor.

5906. (Mr. Smith.) Supposing one creditor or a number of creditors—a minority of creditors—wished the debtor's conduct investigated by the Court, would you give them the power ?—Yes.

5907. (Chairman.) Under a deed ?—Yes, under a deed, certainly.

5908. (Mr. Smith.) Then you would give the Court power to punish for misconduct under a deed ?—Yes, as in bankruptcy.

5909. Punish for various offences such as non-keeping of books and trading with a knowledge of insolvency ?—Yes. I think I should be disposed to administer the Act just as you do in bankruptcy.

5910. Do not you do that at present ?—Not altogether.

5911. Cannot you do it at present under a clause which provides that a deed of assignment can be entered into after the receiving order has been made ?—As far as I know there is no power to bring the debtor's conduct under the notice of the Court under a deed of arrangement.

5912. But there is power under a receiving order to have the debtor examined and then to take it out of the hands of the court by a deed of arrangment after the receiving order and after the debtor's examination ?—By a composition or something of that sort do you mean ?

5913. No, by a deed of arrangement you can make any arrangement after the debtor has been examined before adjudication. Is not that sufficient, does not that meet your view ?—Yes, I think it would meet my view.

5914. And the present Act would meet your view ?—Yes, except that in so far as the points I have raised in reference to these other matters are concerned.

Mr. JOHN EVANS, called; and Examined.

5915. (Chairman.) I forget what you are ?—A builders' merchant.

5916. And I think you represent here one of the Material Trades Associations ?—Yes; the Liverpool Building Trades Association.

5917. Is that an association of builders' merchants ?—It is an association of builders' merchants.

20 Mar. 1907.

5918. That is of course composed of people who supply materials to builders ?—Yes.

5919. And I think that your association has considered the operation of the present bankruptcy laws as affecting builders, and have some suggestions to make for its reform ?—Yes ; we have been considering it for some time.

5920. Could you tell us in your own way what are the subjects of complaint and what are the reforms which you would desire us to recommend ?—Well, one thing of course we believe is that prevention is better than cure. The source of a great number of bankruptcies is bad building contracts. I am now speaking more particularly of speculative builders. It is the custom to take a piece of land from a landowner at a fixed price to build a number of houses on. There is no deposit paid on signing the contract and the conveyance is not given until the purchase money and the advances with interest are paid. The great objection that we have to those contracts is the power that is given to the landowner to seize all materials that are placed on the ground or on ground adjacent. This frequently induces unprincipled builders and builders without any capital to enter into the building trade. I have got a sample of the agreements here by me if you wish to look at them. The objection that we have to this class of builder is that he is a man without capital, he is a man without anything to lose. On the other hand he induces or increases competition for land. Land has gone up enormously in value through this unfair competition. I call it unfair competition because these men, who have nothing to lose, enter into competition with men who have capital, and thus force up the price of land to a very high figure, a figure that I consider is much too high.

5921. Now what is it exactly that you would regard as a mischief capable of cure ? People can buy what land they like or make what contracts they like. What would be your view of altering the law in the interests of protecting the class of traders whom you represent ?—I would suggest that the law should be altered so that the suppliers of building materials should have a lien on the buildings that are put up with their materials on the lines of the Mechanics Lien Law of Baltimore.

5922. That is a law that gives, practically, the builder a lien, for work that he has done, in respect of things on the ground ?—Yes ; and also gives the merchant a lien for the goods that he supplies

5923. And that would be a lien, enforceable for the benefit of the builder's creditors, on building materials, and that is your view of stopping the land speculator and the building speculator, is not it ?—Yes. It would make the landowners careful as to whom they would sell land. They would not, naturally, like to run this risk, they would sell land then to builders who had capital to pay for it. My experience is, and it extends over thirty years, that where builders take up the title, where they pay for the land it is very seldom that they fail. In any case if they do fail there is a tangible asset for the traders generally, in the land, and the asset has not been frittered away. Now, under the present arrangement, an unprincipled landowner, if he is dissatisfied with the way in which the builder carries on his work, steps in and takes possession of the land. There was a case at the Liverpool Assizes not long ago, in 1904, it was, or in 1903, before Mr. Justice Jelf. The landowner stepped in and took possession of some property in Liscard, Cheshire. The date of the contract had not expired, and there was sufficient proof to our mind that the builder was well within his contract. Further, the landowner took possession and the builder took action against the landowner, but failed in his action. This is how this letter is worded:—"Without hearing our witnesses," that is what the builder says, "or even bringing our case before the special jury, his lordship decided that the defendants were within their legal rights unless we could show that they, the landowners, were dishonest in their action." So the builder failed in the action.

5924. Did he lose his money ?—He lost his money and the creditors lost their money. I do not think there was a penny dividend.

5925. Who went bankrupt in that case ?—The builder, and the landowner got the benefit of his labour, the benefit of our materials and paid very little for them, just the amount of the advances he had made.

5926. Can you tell me for the benefit of the Committee whether, in your experience, there have been heavy losses to creditors in the building materials trade from the sweeping away of all the assets on the ground under the building contract by the building owner ?—Yes. I have a case here in the Birkenhead Court. The estimated value of the surplus was £2,512 16s. 5d., and after the fully secured creditors had been paid, there was not a penny dividend got out of that estate.

5927. Was that because all the work and materials were practically taken possession of by the building owner ?—Yes. There is another case in which I was a creditor for £300. I have not got the number, but it was a case that came before the Birkenhead Court. This man owed altogether about £4,000. On paper—on the statement that he had prepared—there was a surplus after paying not only the secured creditors, but the unsecured creditors of something like £1,200. There were loose materials on the ground which the trustee in bankruptcy, after taking counsel's opinion, took possession of, and sold for £300 odd. The landowner contested his claim to the materials and succeeded. The Committee of Inspection decided to go to appeal. We failed. We did not get a penny out of that estate. The landowner made a clean sweep of everything. And the landowner in that case, I am sorry to say, was a dummy for a firm of solicitors.

5928. And as I understand, what you would seek to enforce is a law which would give you practically a lien upon everything that you bring on the ground instead of the landowner getting it ?—Yes.

5929. Have there been in late years many bankruptcies of builders in the district that you are connected with ?—A great number.

5930. And small dividends paid ?—Very small dividends indeed, especially when they go into bankruptcy, but I will come to that point later on.

5931. Well, if you kindly would, perhaps you would just tell us what you were going to say upon that ?—My experience is that we get very much better results from compositions, from deeds of arrangement, than we get from bankruptcy. One thing that militates against us is that once an estate goes into bankruptcy the landowner as I said before, sweeps everything before him, if the title has not been taken up, and not only that, but the mortgagees call in their mortgages so that it gives us no chance whatever of getting anything out of those estates. So we do all we can to prevent a man who is in difficulties even committing an act of bankruptcy. You will understand my point.

5932. (Chairman.) I quite follow it.

5934. You do that without any deed ?—We have done some of them without any deed ; others we do with a deed.

5935. Would you be in favour, as far as your experience goes, of the present provision as to deeds of arrangement continuing unaltered, or would you be in favour of any alteration in them, or have you not considered that ?—We think that the deed of arrangement ought to become absolute—that it should not be in the power of any one creditor to make a man a bankrupt within three months.

5936. Do you find among the debtors that you deal with that there are often other creditors besides those for building materials—creditors for wages, the architect, and so forth ?—Not very often.

5937. You do not have the intervention of the moneylender do you ?—No, very seldom.

5939. If you please ?—I understand, and you legal gentlemen will understand better, that a trustee in bankruptcy has twelve months in which to deal with leases. I think it would be a very great advantage if that were extended to mortgages and charges. We find that there is a great deal of money lost by forced sales. Unprincipled owners, when they take possession, have generally friends or dummies quite ready to take up property at a knock down price. It would give creditors a chance to dispose of that property if they had twelve months, the same as is granted with leases. I hope the Commissioners can see their way clear to make a special note of that. The thing is, in principle, in force with leases, and why should not it be extended to mortgages and charges in general.

5940. And what was the other point you wanted to tell us ?—This is rather outside my province, I did not think of it, well, not before yesterday, so we gave no notice of it. The other gentleman referred to much the same thing, the power that architects have to withhold certificates, and to act as their own arbitrators. I do not think it should be in the power of any man to act as his own arbitrator.

5941. I am afraid that that perhaps goes a little beyond the scope of our inquiry ?—Yes; perhaps so. Another point that I quite agree with the other gentleman about, is as to majorities binding minorities. My experience is that very often one creditor has a spite against the debtor. He may be only a creditor for a very small amount, but yet he has the power to make that man a bankrupt, and he avails himself of it. I have known cases where a great deal of money has been lost in that way. I have a case here, No. 58 of 1901, Liverpool. The estimated surplus in that estate was £3,714, and the net surplus was £1,570. It was arranged under a deed of arrangement that the creditors should get 10s. in the £. A creditor who had not been disclosed sprung upon the trustee under this deed of arrangement, and made the debtor a bankrupt. There was not 1d. got out of that estate. The mortgagees called their mortgages in, and the landowner stepped in and took what materials were on the ground and what houses were uncompleted.

5942. So you would restrict the power of the creditor who stands out to bring an estate into bankruptcy, contrary to the wishes of the majority; that is what it comes to ?—Yes. And another matter is that, I think, in case of bankruptcy the conduct of every bankrupt should be brought before the court whether he applies for his discharge or not.

5943. (Mr. Smith.) Do you think that the conduct of every debtor under a deed of arrangement should be brought before the court ?—I think it would be advisable.

5944. I am not quite sure whether I understand this suggestion that the lien applies not only to the goods on the ground, but to the land itself. Is that your suggestion ?—That is how it is in this law, but I am afraid that as land is looked upon as sacred in this country——

5945. You do not go as far as that ?—I do not go as far as that; I should like to go that far.

5946. I daresay ?—I do not see that the landowner has any more right to his land than I have to my materials.

5947. How would you enforce the lien in the case of a building which has already been erected ?—We would give notice to the landowner.

5948. But what then ? How would you enforce it, how would the creditor enforce it then ?—It becomes a charge on the property.

5949. A charge on the land ?—A charge on the land, and everything that is on the land, it becomes a charge.

5950. Then you do propose that the creditor should have a charge upon the land ?—I should say so, and I think it would be advantageous to the building trade in the long run, because it would get more.

5951. But not to the landlord ?—Oh, not to the landowner; the price of his land would not go up so quickly as it does now.

5952. Suppose that the builder failed when he had undertaken to build a house or a building of some sort on the land, and it was only half built, would you give a lien to the creditor at all ?—Yes.

5953. For the materials and the cost of it which he could enforce by sale of the house ?—Yes, he would rank pari passu with the other creditors, and the creditors would rank alike. He and the landowner under this law, as I understand it, would be on the same footing.

5954. Yes; but he would have an absolute right of priority over the landlord, as it seems to me ?—No; not priority—equal right. The landlord and myself, if I had a lien, would be on an equal footing—would be creditors on an equal footing.

5955. I am afraid I do not understand it very much, but I do not know that it is a practical question, or is likely to be one, and I will not pursue it.

5956. (Mr. Addison.) I do rather want to understand your lien. Suppose you have a piece of land on which you employ a builder to build a house, and you pay him instalments as he goes along, what concern is it of yours, whether he does or does not get his building materials on credit or not ? What have you got to do with where he gets his materials from, or whether the people are wise enough not to supply him without cash, or if they are so unwise as to supply him without cash. You have asked him to build a house on your land for you, and you pay him as he goes along ?—Yes.

5957. Why should the tradesmen who supply him on credit, which they can do or not do as they please, have a lien on that house for which you, we will say, have been paying as the work went on ?—I get the benefit.

5958. Would you mind answering that question ?—Well, if I were the landowner I should be very careful.

5959. I am supposing certain facts; you know that you employ a builder to build a house on a piece of land for you and pay him as he goes along ?—Yes.

5960. Why should I, who supply him with goods on credit, have a lien upon that house and equally, if I say so, upon the land on which it is built ?—Because the materials have gone into the house..

5961. That is the ground on which you would put it ?—Yes.

5962. All right, I understand it; I need not trouble you further.

5963. (Mr. Richardson.) I take it that the American law, this one to which you refer—I have not seen the whole of the Act—says to the landowner "You must take care that whoever you employ to build on land pays for the material that he puts upon it" ?—That is so.

5964. The law says that ?—That is so.

5965. The law says to the landowner: "You must see that you give your building contract to men who have money to pay for the goods that they use in the building" ?—Yes.

5966. Otherwise the landowner realises that he stands to lose ?—Yes; that is so.

5967. I take it that that is the effect of that law ?—Yes; that is so.

5968. Is your association confined to Liverpool, or is it a national one ?—No, Liverpool and South-West Lancashire. It takes in South-West Lancashire, Cheshire and North Wales.

5969. May I ask if it is your experience, or do you know, that such transactions take place in nearly every large town in the country ?—I believe that it is so. My friend Mr. Radcliffe will give you his evidence, and I think his experience is much the same as mine.

5970. Is it not a fact that this very frequently happens, that the landowner helps the shoddy builder to begin with to pay for a certain quantity of materials and that then the traders come along and let him have goods on credit believing him to be a sound man, and that instead of having material on the ground for half-a-dozen houses which are in course of erection, the builder has on the ground bricks perhaps for twenty houses, and that the landowner takes the whole of them ?—Yes ; they give him a good start, or assist him to make a good show.

5971. Would your association be satisfied if the law said that the freeholder should only be able to take materials to finish the houses that were a storey high or something of that sort, and that the rest of the material should go to the general body of the creditor s estate—would you be satisfied with that ?—No, my idea is, as I said before, that the land is looked upon as sacred in this country. Personally, I am now speaking personally, I should be willing to let the landowner be secured for his rent to the value of the land if the builder has made that land of less value. Gentlemen that are practical in the building trade can quite imagine that, will understand that—that it is possible for the builder to make the land of less value up to a certain point. I would make the landowner secure to the value of the land only, but I would make it impossible for him to touch anything that comes on the land, property that is deposited on the land not attached to the freehold.

5972. With reference to deeds of arrangement I would just like to have your reply in evidence, you would make it absolutely valid a majority in value and number or would you take value only ?—In value only.

5973. Not value and number ?—No, I would prefer value only.

5974. And would you limit the right of the dissenting creditor to one month instead of the three months ?—I think the deed ought to become absolute.

5975. At once ?—At once.

5976. You would not give a month ?—I would not give any more ; I would prefer to make it even shorter than that.

5977. (Mr Smith.) I would like to understand this point. You put a question, I think, before about that. I understand the witness to say that they would make the resolution of the majority binding on the minority ?—Yes.

Mr. William Radcliffe, called ; and Examined.

20 Mar. 1907.

5978. I think that you have come as representing the Manchester and District Builders' Merchants Association ? Yes.

5979. Is that a very large association ?—It has a membership of thirty-four.

5980. Thirty-four firms ?—Thirty-four different firms.

5981. You have been present at the examination of the preceding witnesses and so, of course, I will not ask you to go over any ground which has been covered by them ; but perhaps you can tell us shortly whether you agree with Mr. Evans in what he has been telling us ?—In the main.

5982. Then, perhaps, you could just favour the Committee in your own way with any additional point or points that you do not agree with him upon, taking it that the Committee have had a note of your evidence ?—Yes.

5983. Perhaps you could in your own way give us it, so as not to detain you any longer than necessary ?—There is one case in point that I would like to refer to where I was a creditor of a firm of builders in the speculative line two years ago. We had given the builder credit, he was financed by a solicitor and his accounts were paid regularly for something like eighteen months. That would be three years ago. At the end of that eighteen months he had a little unpleasantness with the solicitor and he was paid out with £1,500. He goes three miles away to another plot of ground with this £1,500. Naturally the people who had given him credit and supplied him so largely and liberally before, took him on again. He went on for about nine months but gradually, after the first two or three months, he began to fall short and found that he could not keep up his payments. The creditors, knowing how well he had kept his payments up previously, had patience with him and he told them that in another month's time he would have a very large amount to draw from the financier. Those amounts were never forthcoming. He went so far as to say to the financier: "I have not covered half this land yet and I shall be able to make a profit of at least £3,000. I will forego £1,000 of that profit which I would make on the additional price of the land from what I took it at in the first instance." Thereupon there are two mortgages entered into (£400 each) but the poor fellow only gets £180 from them. That is all he gets out of this £800 from the mortgages. Of course it was simply tightening the grip round the man's throat all the time and eventually he was obliged to call his creditors together. The financier gave him notice that he would foreclose in December—I forget what was the exact date but some day in the latter part of December. After giving three days' notice there is a sale by auction at a certain licensed house in Manchester and the property is sold to a dummy for £5,000. The mortgage was for £4,800 and the charge was £5,000. It was knocked down to a dummy who was three-parts drunk. Since then this man with a little assistance from the creditors has been fighting the people, who took forcible possession and he has gone before the registrar in Manchester. It has been adjourned I should think something like nine months. They tried by force of circumstances to put the man entirely out of court. When the case came on the defendants pleaded that the sale was an invalid one but before the case come to that point they withdrew that entirely and it was sent down for the damages to be assessed. That was a case in which I was a creditor for £125. The solicitor who was really finding the money is one of the most respectable solicitors in Manchester. I give you that as a special case but I could give you hundreds of cases. I give it to you, however, as a particular one to show you how people in good faith, and believing there is one of the most respectable financiers finding the money, supply credit and are let down simply because under the building contract one clause states that if the builder does not proceed with due diligence certain results will follow. Well, of course, it is elastic—very elastic indeed. I would like to know where a man is going to start and going to end as regards those words "with due diligence." This man had always used due diligence and he was a man who had got on with his work as well as anyone ever could in the ordinary course of business. In the early part of his history he never failed to pay his accounts every month. I am speaking from my own experience of the man. I could give you chapter and verse for this case. I admit to you that the man was an ignorant man, but he was an honest man, though ignorant of legal matters and legal phrases ; but he actually assigned for £1,000 all his profit so as to be able to handle his money quickly and pay his accounts. He executed two mortgages in three weeks' time after he had made this offer to his financiers and he got about £180, I think it was, out of two mortgages for £400 each. He has never seen a penny piece of the rest of that money. The registrar has called for accounts and this has been going on for eight or nine months and is not finished up yet.

5984. (Chairman.) Did the case go into bankruptcy ?—It did not. We did not press it because we knew the man was always honest, and we knew that he intended to pay his accounts, and would pay them. The man had paid every penny he had got on his advances.

5985. Do you take the same view as the preceding gentlemen, that there should be some kind of law of lien established ?—I do certainly think that something should be done to try and prevent the undue increase in the value of land, or the undue value which is put upon it, purely a fictitious one under such circumstances as I have described. I have in my own mind cases. I know of instances of aldermen who sit at the council table in the Corporation of Manchester who have been concerned in transactions of the kind where they have put up dummies to carry out their schemes. They have used young men who have been foremen in different departments of the building trade for carrying out their objects. They enable them to go on so far in building but by the time they put the slates on the roof they begin to put the grip round their throats, and to take from them what they have given to them. They cannot get advances from anyone else, and they are entirely at their mercy. On a contract of about £1,600, say for about a dozen houses, there will very likely be £300 or £400 worth of loose materials on the job, and that is seized; and the creditors who have supplied it do not get a penny because no one will take the estate up, and throw good money after bad. Their materials have gone, and they have to whistle for their money because they will never get it back again.

5986. Do you find that the builders in those cases have failed without dividends ?—Quite a number I could give you of them who have done so.

5987. May I see a list ?—Yes, I could give you hundreds.

5988. (Mr. Addison.) Is this quite within the scope of our inquiry ?

5989. (Chairman.) It naturally occurred to me that it was not. I do not think that it is a matter we can go into in any considerable detail, but still it may be useful to hear the grievances of gentlemen. With regard to this gentleman I was not quite sure——

5990. (Mr. Addison.) What his evidence would be ?

5991. (Chairman.) No, but I think from him and the other witnesses we have sufficient of the views of the association. I do not know whether any other member of the Committee would wish to ask the witness any questions.

5992. (Witness.) If you would pardon me I would just like to ask one question. I quite see from your remarks, sir, that it may be a little outside the powers of this Committee, but still pardon me just saying a word as representing our association which is one that has been at work for a very, very long time trying to better our position. We sit there month after month with that object. If the amendment of the bankruptcy laws cannot result in protecting the public by adopting the lien in the way I have suggested, is it possible to suggest anything else ?

5993. (Chairman.) We are only asked to report upon certain questions, and some of the considerations to which you and Mr. Evans have directed our attention, although extremely interesting and useful, are not quite within what we have to do, though we are very glad to have heard what you have had to say, and we shall be able to pick out from what you have been good enough to favour us with something which will help us in our report.

5994. (Witness.) I was just going to say one or two words with reference to the fictitious value which is given to land. It may be a little outside of this inquiry.

5995. (Chairman.) I am afraid it is outside.

5996. (Witness.) It is outside, but let me say this: in one case land is let at £5 an acre, and if you take that at twenty-five years purchase nominal, that is £125 an acre at twenty-five years purchase. Now this land actually goes up to something like £1,500. That I think bears on that particular point that you should give security to the landowner to the value of his land, and in our opinion if you do that it ought to be sufficient.

5997. (Chairman.) Yes, I think we follow that point.

5998. (Witness.) I thought I would just like to point it out.

5999–6001. (Chairman.) We have received from the Associated Chambers of Commerce a resolution unanimously adopted at the meeting of the association as representing 109 chambers of commerce:—

"That in the opinion of this association great harm is at present caused to public commercial morality by the frauds that are exposed in our bankruptcy courts without the same being followed by any adequate punishment.

"That the bankruptcy law should be altered in the spirit of putting upon the person seeking relief from his liabilities through the bankruptcy courts, the onus of showing how his losses have occurred, and that they were due to misfortune. To secure this it should be made a penal offence:—(1) To have traded without having kept proper books of account. (2) To fail to give satisfactory account of the loss of any substantial portion of his estate. (3) To commence trading again in the name of his wife, or in any other way without first obtaining his discharge.

"Also that the present penal clauses under Section 11 of the Debtors' Act, 1869, for fraud, be made a reality by doing away with the four months limit within which offences must occur."

It is a very important resolution, and I think it would be desirable to put it on our minutes.

THIRTY-THIRD DAY.

Wednesday, 10th April, 1907.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

GEORGE M. CHAMBERLIN, Esq., D.L., J.P.
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C. B.

[H. E. G. BURLS, Esq. (for the Secretary).

Mr. GABRIEL ASTOUL, called; and Examined.

6002. (Chairman.) I think that you are counsel to the French Embassy here ?—Yes.

6003. And so I think I may presume that besides being acquainted, of course, with French law, you have some knowledge of our legal system ?—Yes, I have some knowledge of it.

6004. I mean you practice here in this country regularly ?—Yes; that is true, although I am not an English solicitor or barrister, but of course I have acquired some knowledge of the English law.

6005. Now I daresay you are aware that this Committee has been appointed by the Board of Trade to inquire into and report on the effect of the insolvency laws which prevail here ?—Yes.

6006. And, particularly, with respect to questions which relate to prevention of frauds by debtors, and commercial misconduct ?—Yes.

Mr. Gabriel Astoul.

6007. The Committee are anxious to have some information as to the law and procedure in the Republic of France with respect to some matters on which they have to report. We have already had the advantage of learning what the law is in Germany. Our object is to see whether we can amend our laws by reference to the laws of those countries ?—Quite so.

6008. Now the first question I wish to ask you to be kind enough to favour us with your evidence upon is, what are the courts in France that have jurisdiction over insolvent debtors ?—In order to answer that question I must first of all point out that in France, traders only can be made bankrupt, and traders are subject to the jurisdiction of particular courts which are called Tribunaux de Commerce, and those courts, of course, deal generally with all questions arising between traders, between litigant traders, and, at the same time, they are the courts which have jurisdiction over such of them as become insolvent.

6009. And then is their jurisdiction local ?—Yes, there are a great number of those courts in France.

6010. And then when a man becomes insolvent, what proceedings are taken to sequestrate his estate and inquire into his commercial dealings ?—When a man becomes insolvent it is his duty to file his own petition as you would say in this country, that is to say to make a declaration that he is insolvent, that he has suspended his payments. The law requires him to do this within fifteen days of his having become insolvent, but if he fails to do it, then any creditor, whatever may be the amount of his claim, may present a petition against him, or even the court may, on its own motion, adjudicate him bankrupt. The result of the petition presented by the debtor himself, or of a petition presented by any creditor, is that the court makes an order adjudicating the debtor a bankrupt, and the order appoints what we call a syndic, who is really the equivalent either of the Receiver or of the Trustee ; and the main effect of the adjudication in bankruptcy is that the debtor becomes divested of the whole of his property which vests in the syndic or Trustee.

6011. Then does the syndic sell the property ?—There are several stages to be considered in bankruptcy proceedings. The first stage is devoted to the ascertainment on the one hand of the assets, and on the other hand, of the liabilities. For the purpose of ascertaining the assets the syndic of course takes possession of all the property of the debtor and of all his books, inquiring into his affairs and calling upon the debtor to supply him with information as to the state of his affairs. And then, as regards ascertaining liabilities, the procedure is to call upon creditors both by means of direct notices and by means of advertisements in the papers to come forward and prove their claims.

6012. And then is there anything like a distribution of the money ?—Yes. I was coming to that. When the assets on the one hand and the liabilities on the other hand have been ascertained—when all creditors have proved their claims, which they must do within a certain time, then a meeting of creditors is convened, and the object of that meeting is to decide what will be the result of the proceedings. I mean the bankruptcy proceedings may have three different results, there may be either what is called a concordat simple or a concordat par abandon d'actif, or again union.

6013. (Mr. Chamberlin.) You said convened the creditors in a "certain time" ?—I said the creditors must prove their claims in a certain time.

6014. Is there any definition of the time ?—It is according to the place where the creditors reside.

6015. Three months or anything of that sort ?—It may extend over a longer period than three months. I said that the order of the adjudication of bankruptcy appoints a trustee or syndic, but then within fifteen days of the date of the order the creditors must be convened a first time in order to pass a resolution as to whether they approve of the appointment of the trustee, or whether they wish another trustee to be appointed in his place.

6016. (Chairman.) Does the court appoint the trustee ?—Yes, in the first instance. And then, within fifteen days, the creditors are convened for the purpose of expressing an opinion as to whether any other trustee should be appointed, and if the creditors approve of the appointment, then nothing more is required ; but if they disapprove, then the matter must be brought before the court, and the court can exercise its discretion as to whether any other trustee shall be appointed or not. When the court has come to a decision on that point, then all creditors who have not yet proved are forthwith given notice to do so. I must give all those explanations to answer your question. The time given to creditors to prove their claims is twenty days from the date of the advertisements inserted in the papers after the final appointment of the trustee. The creditors who reside abroad, or who reside in France beyond a certain radius, are given an extension of time.

6017. Then the creditors themselves do not appoint the trustee, they can only object ?—No ; they can only object or express an opinion. The appointment always rests with the court.

6019. (Chairman.) Then when a trustee has got into possession, and the creditors have proved their claims, what is the next step ?—When the creditors have proved their claims, or when the time for proving their claims has expired, the creditors are convened for the purpose of deciding whether a concordat ought to be given to the debtor. The concordat is an agreement between the debtor and his creditors—an agreement the effect of which generally is to grant the debtor a certain time in which to discharge his liabilities, and also an agreement by which the creditors agree to take a certain proportion of their claims in full settlement.

6020. (Chairman.) A composition ?—Yes, a sort of composition.

6021. And then what is the difference between a concordat simple and a concordat par abandon d'actif ?—The difference between the concordat simple and concordat par abandon d'actif is that when a concordat simple has been granted to the debtor, then he becomes a free man again, that is to say, all his property revests in him. He recovers full control of his affairs subject only to his carrying out the terms of the concordat, the terms of the arrangement ; whereas in the concordat par abandon d'actif the debtor assigns all his property to his creditors in consideration of his obtaining his discharge. And then the third procedure is called union, and that takes place when the creditors refuse to grant to the debtor either a concordat simple, or concordat par abandon d'actif, and then the procedure is that the trustee must realise the property of the debtor and must distribute it amongst all the creditors. When there is union the debtor never gets any discharge until his debts are paid in full.

6022. And which is the next procedure ; is it more common for it to proceed by union or the other ?—No, I think in the majority of cases there is the concordat, but, of course, that depends very much on the conduct of the debtor.

6023. Then for the purpose of concordat do the creditors vote equally or do they vote according to the amount of their claims ?—There are two requirements ; the concordat must be voted by a majority of creditors ; that majority must represent two-thirds of the value of the claims. And further the concordat must always be approved by the Court.

6024. (Mr. Smith.) Is that two-thirds of the value of those present at the meeting or of all the creditors ?—Of all the creditors whose claims have been proved.

6025. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Have those trustees you have mentioned specially, if they are of a professional class, to give any security or any guarantee ?—No ; they have not any guarantee to give, but all moneys received by them must be forthwith paid into Court—that is, paid into a Government establishment, which is called the Caisse des Dépôts et Consignations. In Paris, however, and other large towns, although the law does not require it, the professional trustees or syndics de faillites, who form a special body, have created a guarantee fund to which every member must subscribe on being admitted.

6026. Is there any procedure for punishing debtors ?—Yes, certainly.

6027. Could you tell us what it is ?—There are two classes of offences which are punishable ; some of them are under the general heading banqueroute simple (simple bankruptcy). The word "banqueroute" is really not an equivalent of the English word "bankruptcy." The true equivalent of the word "bankruptcy" is faillite.

The word "banqueroute" itself implies an offence; some of the offences come under the general head of banqueroute simple; and the more serious offences are described as banqueroute frauduleuse (fraudulent bankruptcy). There are a great many offences which may come within the first description, that of simple bankruptcy, and there a distinction must be drawn between certain cases in which the debtor must necessarily be punished if the facts are proved, and other cases where it is in the discretion of the Court to punish him or not. The cases where the debtor is necessarily punished are, in the first place, where he has been extravagant in his personal and household expenses. In the second place where he has incurred serious losses through gambling or speculation. In the third place where in order to stave off bankruptcy he has purchased goods on credit and resold them below value, or has contracted onerous loans, or has resorted to other ruinous methods of obtaining funds. And in the fourth place where after suspending payments he has given undue preference to one creditor to the prejudice of the others. And then there are a certain number of cases where it is optional for the Court to punish the debtor. One of them is where the debtor has without consideration incurred large liabilities for the benefit of other persons. Another case is where he has been adjudicated a bankrupt a second time after failing to perform his obligations under a previous concordat. Other cases are where he has not filed his own petition within fifteen days as required by law; where he has without reasonable cause failed to attend the trustee or the Court when required to do so; and lastly where he has failed to keep proper books of account. All those cases come within the description of simple bankruptcy, banqueroute simple, and the punishment may vary between one month and two years' imprisonment.

6028. Connected with that subject is there any definite provision of the law specifying what books a trader ought to keep ?—Oh, yes.

6029. Is that in the Code de Commerce ?—Yes, it is. It gives a list of the books which must be kept by traders. There is first of all a journal—I believe that is the usual expression—or day book. And then a copy letter book, and lastly a book where balance sheets are recorded.

6030. Is not that generally called a private ledger ?—I think so. These are really the only books which are compulsory.

6031. Would you mind telling me what the Article of the Code is that they are to be kept under ?—Yes; it is Articles 8 to 17 of the Code de Commerce.

6032. Is that the original Code Napoleon ?—That is one of the codes enacted under Napoleon.

6033. You were going on to tell us the nature of the banqueroute frauduleuse ?—The banqueroute frauduleuse includes more serious offences against the bankruptcy laws. A debtor is guilty of banqueroute frauduleuse where he has removed his books or removed or concealed his assets or any part thereof, or, again, where either in his books or by means of any writing he has fraudulently admitted liability for certain sums which he really did not owe—fictitious debts.

6034. Is that about all of them ?—That is the only definition of fraudulent bankruptcy, yes. All the other offences come within the banqueroute simple—the punishment for fraudulent bankruptcy is more serious.

6035. What is the punishment ?—It is travaux forcés. I think the travaux forcés may be compared to penal servitude in this country and then it may be anything from five to twenty years.

6036. Is the experience in France that the making of those banqueroute simple offences punishable, that that acts as a deterrent ?—I think so—I think it does.

6037. And are cheating offences common—have people to be prosecuted often for them ?—I do not think there are very many prosecutions for that class of offences.

6038. And then is the punishment inflicted by the criminal tribunals or by the Tribunal de Commerce ?—Not by the Tribunal de Commerce, by the Criminal Courts.

6039. And then does the public prosecutor bring the offence before the Criminal Courts ?—Yes; in most cases. He can do so really in all cases, but in some cases the creditors themselves may prosecute.

6040. Oh, they may prosecute ?—In the case of certain minor offences the creditors may prosecute personally, but in all cases the public prosecutor may take up the prosecution.

6041. And is there any system by which the Tribunal de Commerce reports to the Procureur ?—Yes. It is really the duty of the syndic, of the trustee, to report to the Procureur of the Republic, but the syndic, I do not think I mentioned it, himself acts under the supervision of a member of the Court who is called the Juge Commissaire. The Juge Commissaire is a Judge who is specially deputed by the Court to supervise the conduct of the proceedings by the syndic. In certain cases the syndic has to obtain his sanction.

6042. If the union takes place during the period that elapses before the debtor pays his debts in full, if he ever does so, does he retain any property that he acquires, or does his property go to his creditors ?—Where there is union all his property, both present and after-acquired belongs to his creditors, but as regards after-acquired, property if the debtor has acquired any other property by carrying on business although he is bankrupt, which there is nothing to prevent him from doing, that property only goes to his creditors subject to the payment of the debts which he may have contracted in his new business.

6043. Could you say whether there are many debtors who are carrying on business whose affairs have gone into union and who are carrying on new business ?—I do not think there are a good many of them because a man who has failed to obtain a concordat really cannot trade anywhere. It is a matter of practical impossibility in most cases.

6044. To get credit ?—To get credit and to establish or set up any other business.

6045. Is there any other system by which bankruptcies are published so that traders know who a man is ?—Oh yes.

6046. What is it, are there official publications ?—Yes, and further all bankruptcies are recorded at the registry of the court, and anybody can inspect the index there.

6047. That is of the local court ?—Yes.

6048. Has each departement a local court, or are they in the big towns ?—They are generally in the larger towns There may be several courts in one departement.

6049. And is there any punishment in France for trading under an assumed name, now, like a man trading in his wife's name, as is done here sometimes ?—Yes, it is not necessarily criminal to trade under an assumed name, but it is very dangerous, because it may very easily lead to a prosecution for escroquerie, that is, obtaining money by false pretences, but it is not necessarily criminal. There is one thing that is absolutely forbidden and expressly forbidden, and that is for a man to trade under the style of a firm, implying that he is in partnership with others, which, I think, is a very common thing in this country.

6050. (Chairman.) Yes, it is ?—That is expressly forbidden by law.

6051. (Mr. Smith.) In the case of bankrupts ?—No, it is a general prohibition; no man is allowed to trade under a style implying that he is in partnership with others, when he is really carrying on business on his own account.

6052. (Mr. Richardson.) You have registration of firms, firms' names have to be registered ?—Yes.

6053. That prevents it ?—Oh yes.

6054. (Chairman.) Then would there be anything to prevent a bankrupt who has not obtained a concordat from going to any part of the country and changing his name and trading: that is a mischief which has occurred here ?—Really it is not legal for any one to change his name, but at the same time I cannot say that it would necessarily be treated as a criminal act. It would raise a presumption of fraud.

6055. Is there any special provision with regard to married women. Can they be made bankrupt like other people ?—Married women can be made bankrupt when they trade on their own account, which they cannot do in any case without the consent of their husbands, but when a married woman is trading with the consent of her husband, she can be made bankrupt just as any other trader.

6056. And then what property is taken for the bankruptcy; only her own property ?—Yes, only her own property, except that in certain cases the husband may be responsible to a certain extent for her debts. I say in certain cases—that depends very much on the nature of the marriage contract between her and her husband, but third parties—the public—can always know whether there is a marriage contract—a special marriage contract between the husband and wife. The marriage contracts of traders must be deposited in a public office for the inspection of any parties who have to deal with the husband or wife.

6057. Then the last thing I wanted to trouble you about was on page 3. I ask you is there any system by which debtors make an agreement with their creditors without the intervention of the Tribunal de Commerce ?—That may be done, but it is very infrequent.

6058. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I should like to ask what class of imprisonment a debtor would get—would he be classed with the criminals ; would there be any distinction between a man who was a fraudulent debtor and a man who had committed a robbery ?—There is no distinction.

6059. You speak about speculating as an offence ?—Yes.

6060. Would that be a man speculating outside his own business, or would a man be punished for speculating in his own business and the speculation going against him ? I do not know whether you follow ?—Yes, I think so.

6061. I mean a man may speculate—for instance, in England they do such things, on the Stock Exchange ?—Yes.

6062. And they very often lose their money; but a man who is a sugar merchant and speculates in sugar, if that speculation goes wrong—would that be an offence punishable ?—If it is within his business I do not think that it would be punishable.

6063. One question I should like to ask you about—the keeping of books. The books that you have spoken to us about are books which would only be kept in this country by people who are in a large way of business. You speak about a "General" book—I suppose that would be what we call a day book or a private ledger ? There are thousands of small traders—shopkeepers in this country—who think they are doing something very wonderful if who keep even a cash book ?—I do not know whether, the expression "private ledger" conveys the French equivalent of livre d'inventaire.

6064. Would there be entered in that all the purchases they made ?—No.

6065. (Mr. Richardson.) It is a yearly balance ?—It is a book of balance sheets, so that I do not think that "private ledger" conveys exactly the meaning.

6066. (Mr. Chamberlin.) But of course there are a large number of small tradesmen in your country. Are they expected to keep these rather high class finance books ?—They are all expected to do it.

6067. If they do not do it they are punished ?—Yes, or they may be punished. It is one of the cases in which it is open for the court to punish or not. The court has a certain amount of discretion in these cases. No doubt in many cases it would be very hard to punish a very small trader for not keeping proper books.

6068. One of the books you say they are supposed to keep is a copy letter book. I take it that there is not one in fifty of the shopkeepers in England who think about keeping a copy letter book, but you say they have to keep one in France ?—Yes, that is a legal requirement, but I may point out that that is a case in which the court may exercise its discretion as to whether the debtor should be punished or not for not keeping a copy letter book.

6069. (Mr. Richardson.) In Paris are the trustees always solicitors, or do they generally understand the business that they have to deal with ?—In Paris the trustees are never solicitors—no, they are a separate class of people.

6070. I suppose there are certain men for certain businesses. For the brush business you would probably have one or two trustees who understand the brush and hardware trade ?—No, I do not think so—they are professional men although they are not solicitors, but it is not required that they should have any special knowledge of a particular business.

6071. (Mr. Chamberlin.) They would be men acquainted with figures, I suppose ?—Yes, no doubt.

6072. (Mr. Richardson.) Can you tell us what is the average cost of bankruptcy proceedings in France ?—That, I am afraid, I could not tell you.

6073. You have no idea as to whether they are more costly than under our own system or not ?—My impression is that it is less costly than in this country, but I cannot express any definite opinion on that point.

6074. You have no figures as to what is the average cost ?—No, I suppose it may vary considerably.

6075. You have no idea of the general cost at all—are there any particular fees to be paid to the Court ?—There are certain fees, but the Court fees are very low.

6076. Lower than ours do you mean ?—Oh yes

6077. I have always been under the impression that the non-keeping of books in France was attended with a certain punishment—that if they did not keep books they were punished to some degree, but it seems not ?—No, not necessarily.

6079. You have really a registration of firms ?—Yes.

6080. Every firm trading in France must register the names of the proprietors of it ?—That is to say all agreements or deeds of partnership must be registered.

6081. Yes, but here boot makers, for instance, may put up for their style "The Wearwell Boot Company," and photographers may put up "The Take Well and Pretty Photographic Company," but there are no such names as "Take Well and Pretty" in fact ; they are only assumed names for the purposes of the business, and creditors have to find out, as best they can, who are the proprietors of such businesses with these fancy names. In France that is not possible ?—No, it is not possible.

6082. They must register the names ?—Yes, they must register the names. Further, it is not possible for people who trade in partnership to include in the name of the firm the name of a person who is not actually a partner.

6083. So that prevents really a bankrupt in the third degree from commencing business again in any part of the country ?—Yes.

6084. Because he must register his name if he moves from Paris to Lyons. If he assumed a different name in Lyons he would have to register it ?—Yes, the trader who is not in partnership with others need not register his name, but only partnerships must be registered.

6085. Then I take it that if a trader failed in Paris and went to another place and commenced business under another name that there would be absolutely no excuse for him, and that he would be punished ?—He would very probably be punished.

6086. If he was a bankrupt in the third degree, and went from one town to another, and some creditor discovered that he was running a business in that town under another name, I take it that there would be nothing for it but imprisonment for him ?—Very probably, but that would not be an offence against the bankruptcy laws. That would come within the definition of escroquerie, the definition of which is obtaining goods, money, or credit by false pretences. The assumption of another name would be a false pretence

6087. Anyhow, the two work together ?—Yes

6088. And prevent the bankrupt in the third degree from being able to start again until he has satisfied his creditors ?—Yes.

6089. (Mr. Smith). Is there any definition of "Trading" in the French law ?—Yes, but it is rather a difficult definition to give.

6090. You could not give a general idea? What I want to know is whether it includes everybody who carries on business small or large. Would it include, for instance, what we call a business carried on by a costermonger—a man who carries a barrow through the streets and sells goods from it?—Yes, he would be a trader, but he would not be expected to keep books.

6091. You would not expect him to keep books?—No.

6092. On what principle, then, does the Court exercise its discretion in dealing with the keeping of books. I suppose it would look at it from a commercial point of view?—Yes, from a commercial point of view.

6093. As to whether it was usual?—Yes.

6094. In the particular trade?—Yes.

6095. But the Court is not fettered by law, is it, in the exercise of that discretion as to whether it would punish for the non-keeping of books. You see, if one of these small traders came before our Court the Judge, I take it, would have to refer to the Bankruptcy laws and would have to say that the man must keep these books and be subject to the penalty, and he would have to inflict the penalty?—Yes, but there is no such stringent provision in France.

6096. But I am asking on what principle would the Court exercise its discretionary power. Would it say "Is this usual. If it is not usual in such and such a class of business to keep books then we shall say it is not a crime not to keep them"; or on what other principle can you suggest it is done? The difficulty is the finding of a principle on which the Court could act?—Quite so, but I do not think that the Court would be guided entirely by custom. The court would consider whether the business is important enough or is large enough, or whether the business is too small.

6097. The Court would take the element of the size of business into account?—Yes; it is difficult to draw the line, but there are certainly cases—you mentioned the case of a costermonger, and in such cases I have absolutely no hesitation in saying that the bankrupt would not be punished.

6098. But there is no limit fixed by law?—There is absolutely no limit.

6099. It has been suggested here that certain offences should only apply where the amount of the debts were so much—£200 or £300?—Yes.

6100. There is nothing of that sort?—Oh, no, there is nothing of that sort.

6101. You said there is nothing to prevent the bankrupt carrying on business while he is a bankrupt. Has he to give any notice to his creditors as to his condition?—No.

6102. It is the duty of the person who deals with him to inquire?—Yes.

6103. Then with regard to the cases and arrangements between creditors outside the control of the bankruptcy law, you said that those were infrequent?—Yes, very infrequent.

6104. But they do sometimes take place?—Yes.

6105. Can the majority of the creditors bind the minority?—In such cases no. In such a case no such agreement is effectual.

6106. That is quite unknown?—That is quite unknown—no such agreement is effectual unless all the creditors concur in it.

6107. Yes, I thought so. The only other question I have to ask you is with regard to the registration of names. You say that every firm is required to register the names of its partners?—Yes.

6108. That applies to all persons carrying on trade, whether in a large or small way—whether in a high position or a low one?—Yes.

6109. Can you tell me whether that has given rise to any complaint or any grumbling on the part of any commercial bodies or men—do they complain that it is fettering business?—Oh, no.

6110. It has been suggested in this country that a reason for not compelling the registration of firms is that it would interfere too much with private business?—I have never heard of any such complaint.

6111. A house like Rothschild's, for instance, if carried on under a firm name would have to register like any others?—Certainly. I do not think there has ever been any complaint.

Mr. Gabriel Astoul.

10 Apr. 1907.

6112. (Mr. Chamberlin.) There are people in this country who press that every trader should keep books of account whether small or large?—Yes.

6113. We have been told that in France that state of things exists, but I understand from what you say that the Court would take into account the class of business?—Yes.

6114. And that therefore they would be the judges whether it should be punishable or not, if a man has kept books or not?—Yes, but I might add that I think that only in the case of very small traders would the bankrupts be excused for not keeping books.

6115. (Chairman.) Is there any limit to the amount of debts a man must owe before he can become a bankrupt?—No, there is no such limit.

6116. There is no £50?—No.

6117. Could you tell me which is the provision of the Code which defines what books a man must keep?—Yes. Art. 8 to 17, I think, of the Code de Commerce.

6118. I do not know whether there was any point which we have not put to you upon which you think you could help us in our inquiry. Our inquiry is for the purpose of finding out the weak spots in our own system, and what we can derive from other systems to make ourselves better. I do not know whether there is anything that we have not asked you about that you think you could help us upon. As I gather, you think that we can strengthen our system by making these matters, which now are not punishable, punishable like gambling and speculation?—Yes, but the systems are so very different that it is difficult to express any opinion as to whether there are any points which might be usefully borrowed from our legislation.

6119. Perhaps we may take this, that the result of the legislation in France is that you are not flooded in that country with a very large number of undischarged bankrupts?—Yes; it is a general complaint in this country?

6120. Very general. You do not suffer from it in France?—No, I do not think so, not to that extent.

6121. (Mr. Smith.) Are bankrupts discharged by the Courts in France?

6122. (Chairman.) No. I think what M. Astoul said was that in the large majority of honest cases there is either the concordat simple or the concordat par abandon d'actif?—Yes.

6123. (Mr. Smith.) Are we to have it that the large majority are honest cases?

6124. (Chairman.) As regards the others there are not very many of them.

6125. (Mr. Richardson.) The third degree are always undischarged, are they not?

6126. (Witness.) Yes, they are always undischarged.

6127. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Until they have paid in full?—Yes.

6128. (Mr. Smith.) Are there a large number of such bankrupts trading throughout the country?—I do not think there is a very large number of them trading again; it would be very difficult for them to obtain any credit.

6129. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Is the working of the bankruptcy law in France considered by the people themselves as very harsh?—No, it is not considered very harsh, especially since 1889 when the law was amended. The law was amended so as to place debtors who filed their own petition within the time required by law in a more favourable position than they were before. Debtors who comply with the requirements of the law obtain the benefit of the liquidation judiciaire, which is judicial liquidation. Judicial liquidation may be said to be mitigated bankruptcy. The great difference between the two systems—judicial liquidation and bankruptcy—is that the debtor is not divested of all his property in judicial liquidation as in the case of bankruptcy. The Court, instead of appointing a trustee, appoints a liquidator who, instead of taking possession of all the assets of the debtor, assists him in the management of his affairs up to the point where the creditors have to decide whether a concordat should be granted or not. If no concordat is granted, the proceedings are or may be converted into ordinary bankruptcy proceedings ; but if a concordat is granted, then the result is the same as in ordinary bankruptcy.

6130. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I asked that question because in this country, although there is a certain section of the public which thinks that debtors are treated too easily in England, yet there also is another section which is very much afraid of going too far in the way of imprisonment for debt. That is my reason for asking as to the feeling of the working of the bankruptcy law in your country, as to whether it is considered to be harsh or not ?—It is not considered nowadays to be harsh.

6131. (Chairman.) Is there anything to prevent an undischarged bankrupt, a bankrupt in the third degree from becoming a member of a société anonyme, which I take it represents our company ? I mean we have the evil of the bankrupt turning himself into what we call a one-man company ?—Yes, it would be much more difficult in France to form one-man companies than in this country. Companies are formed in quite a different manner to what they are in this country. I understand that as soon as people meet together in this country and subscribe one share they at once can form themselves into a company, but in France it is necessary for all the capital to be subscribed. Before the company can be registered and brought out it is necessary for the whole of the capital to be subscribed and at least one-fourth of it to be actually paid up. The case of one-man companies is certainly far less frequent in France than it is in this country.

6132. (Mr. Richardson.) As to the judicial arrangements you spoke of—do they all eventually come to bankruptcy, or will that official sometimes clear a man ?—The proceedings are not necessarily converted into bankruptcy.

6133. They are not ?—No.

6134. If a trader is in difficulty he can call in an official administrator ?—If he really becomes insolvent he can, provided he does so within the requisite time, filing his own petition and asking for a judicial liquidator to be appointed. Then the duties of the liquidator appointed by the Court are very much the same as those of a trustee, except that the debtor is not divested of his property He acts in conjunction with the liquidator and the liquidator assists him up to a point where the creditors are called upon to decide whether the debtor should be granted a concordat or not.

6135. Up to a point where the creditors may be satisfied with the liquidator's arrangement, or it may go into bankruptcy ?—It is not the liquidator's arrangement.

6136. You say they do not all go to bankruptcy, these cases ?—No.

6137. The liquidator, I take it, arranges with the creditors and clears the debtor in some cases ?—That is to say, the liquidator, in conjunction with the debtor, presents to the creditors a scheme of arrangement that is a scheme of concordat. The concordat really means an arrangement or an agreement, and if that concordat is accepted by the creditors then the proceedings are at an end. If, on the other hand, the scheme is rejected then there is a union.

6138. That is really like our deeds of arrangement with a provision for the supervision of the Court ?—Yes.

6139. The judicial liquidator makes an agreement with the creditors, when the creditors agree to a certain proportion of the money and then there are no further proceedings in bankruptcy ?—Yes.

6140. It is very much like our deeds of arrangement, only it has the cognisance of the Court ?—Yes.

6141. Who pays the judicial liquidator ?—But I may say that an ordinary concordat, that the concordat in ordinary bankruptcy proceedings has really the same effect. It there amounts to a deed of arrangement made under the supervision of the Court.

6142. Yes, but the one will be more costly than the other, will it not ?—Yes, no doubt.

6143. The bankruptcy proceedings will be more costly than the judicial arrangement ?—Yes.

6144. Who pays the officer under this judicial arrangement—does his pay come out of the estate ?—Yes.

6145. There are certain Government fees to be paid to the judicial administrator ?—Yes; that is, he is allowed a salary by the Court.

6146. He cannot charge what he likes ?—No, he cannot, it is under the supervision of the court.

6149. (Mr. Smith.) But that official liquidator acts on his own discretion, I suppose ?—Yes.

6150. He does not take his orders from the creditors, does he ?—He must consult the creditors in certain cases, just as the trustee must consult the creditors, for instance, for the purpose of selling the property of the debtor.

6151. Mr. Richardson suggested that this procedure was analogous to the deeds of arrangement in this country. Do you admit that in any way ?—I am not sure that I follow.

6152. (Mr. Smith.) I fail to see the analogy myself.

6153. (Chairman.) It is like a scheme of arrangement.

6154. (Mr. Smith.) Yes, a scheme of arrangement under the Bankruptcy Act—is that what is meant.

6155. (Chairman.) Mr. Richardson did not mean to imply that there was attached to it the incidents which are attached to our deeds of arrangement, e.g., that the deed is null and void if a petition in bankruptcy is filed.

6156. (Mr. Smith.) Or that it can be made binding by the majority on the minority.

6157. (Mr. Richardson.) I mean that it is an analogous arrangement which the debtor may make outside actual bankruptcy proceedings.

6158. (Mr. Smith.) The arrangement is not analogous to it in this country, with regard to which it has been suggested that the majority should bind the minority.

6159. (Chairman.) The deed starts in its legal aspect in a trust created by the debtor.

6160. (Mr. Richardson.) So does this, in a sense.

6161. (Chairman.) No, I do not think so.

6162. (Mr. Richardson.) The debtor goes to the Court and he gets a judicial liquidator to assist him and the creditors are called together. The judicial liquidator I take it, proposes a scheme to the creditors. (To the Witness.) Is that so ?

6163. (Witness.) The scheme is really proposed by the debtor himself.

6164. And the creditors have the opportunity of accepting it or not ?—Quite so.

6165. And if there is a majority accepting is it carried through ?—The rule is the same as in an ordinary bankruptcy. The scheme in order to be binding must be accepted by a majority of the creditors, representing two-thirds of the value. Really the proceedings in an ordinary bankruptcy and in liquidation judiciaire are very similar, only the powers of the judicial liquidator are not so full as those of the trustee. The trustee takes possession of the whole of the assets and can act independently of the debtor, whereas in the case of the judicial liquidation the debtor does not lose all control of his affairs. He continues to manage his affairs with the assistance of the judicial liquidator.

6166. With regard to the judicial liquidator, does it invariably or frequently happen that the arrangements he makes only permit of a portion of the debts being paid, say 15s. in the pound ?—Yes.

6167. Does that obtain ?—Yes.

6168. Does he make arrangements of that kind ?—Oh, certainly.

6169. He does ?—Yes.

6170. If a creditor has agreed to accept 15s. in the pound is the debtor absolutely free afterwards from that creditor—the creditor cannot come upon him for the 5s. afterwards ?—No, not at all.

6171. He has accepted that in full ?—Yes.

6172. (Mr. Richardson.) That is on the lines of our deed of arrangement, you see.

6173. (Mr. Smith.) Yes, but the initiation of the whole is entirely different. I object to that statement that there is any analogy, because the initiation is entirely different. In the one case the Court appoints——

6174. (Mr. Richardson.) I do not care about the initiation. What I care for is what is arrived at. It is a system by which a debtor may by paying a portion of his debts secure freedom by way of a deed of arrangement.

6175. (Mr. Smith.) I raise no objection to Mr. Richardson expressing an opinion, but I do not wish that to be taken as the opinion of the witness.

6176. (Chairman.) I think it is a matter for the Committee to discuss hereafter, Mr. Richardson.

6177. (Mr. Richardson.) Quite so.

6178. (Witness.) I do not know whether I have made myself very clear, but a judicial liquidation and an actual bankruptcy may have the same result—both may lead to either a general concordat or to a union.

Mr. Gabriel Astoul.

6179. (Mr. Smith.) But in the case of misconduct supposing they wanted to investigate the conduct of the debtor, would that be possible ?—Certainly, and if the debtor was found to have behaved badly the proceedings are converted into actual bankruptcy proceedings.

6180. Supposing some creditor wanted to inquire into some particular transaction of a fraudulent character, how would he proceed ? In bankruptcy proceedings in England we have a public examination of the debtor ?—There is no such thing in France, except that the debtor is required to attend certain meetings of the creditors and there he may be asked certain questions.

6181. And the creditor, I suppose, could go to the Court ?—And then the creditor may go to the Court if the creditor has reason to believe that the debtor has behaved improperly. He may apply to the court for the proceedings for the judicial liquidation to be converted into bankruptcy proceedings.

6182. That distinguishes the proceedings, then, from the case of a deed of arrangement in this country, where there is no such power—there is no power to go to the Court to upset the deed of arrangement on the ground that it was obtained improperly ?—No.

6183. There is a power on the part of creditors to present a petition in bankruptcy ?—But not after an arrangement has been accepted in France.

6184. And a dissenting creditor who has not accepted it can still go to the Court and obtain a petition ?—In France the arrangement is always subject to the approval of the Court.

6185. (Mr. Richardson.) That is in France ?—Yes.

THIRTY-FOURTH DAY.

Wednesday, 17th April, 1907.

PRESENT.

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. B. PEAT, Esq.
W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
H. E. G. BURLS, Esq. (for the Secretary).

Mr. JAMES CLARKSON, called; and Examined.

6186. I think you are a solicitor of some years' standing, carrying on business at Halifax ?—Yes.

6187. And I think you represent the Halifax Incorporated Chamber of Commerce ?—I do. I am the honorary solicitor to that body.

6188. And the questions which this Committee has to deal with have been enquired into and considered by that Chamber ?—They have, all those questions.

6189. And I think in doing so you have co-operated with them and know their views ?—Yes, I do intimately.

6190. May the Committee take it that the Report which has been prepared represents the considered opinion of that Chamber ?—It does.

6191. May I ask what is the constitution of the Chamber, I mean in its representative aspect ?—It is registered under the Companies Act. It consists of 172 members representing all the largest trading and commercial concerns of the borough of Halifax and the surrounding district, and it has upon its council representatives of other bodies, tradesmen's associations, to the number, I think, of nine—nine other institutions who have representatives on our council, so that it is a thoroughly representative body of the whole district.

6192. Now the first question that this Committee has to deal with is the present state of the law in relation to the imposition of punishments and disabilities upon a bankrupt, and particularly whether the conduct of a bankrupt should be brought before the court for consideration in every case ?—Yes; it has been considered, and my Chamber are very strongly of opinion that every bankrupt, as distinguished from a debtor under a voluntary arrangement, should be brought before the court for examination whether he applies for his discharge or not. And they also think that the Official Receiver should as soon as possible after the public examination is closed make a report whilst the circumstances are fresh in his mind, and specially pointing out whether the bankrupt has kept proper books of account, and as to the bankrupt's conduct generally, so that it may be seen whether he has carried on his business in a fair way and without negligence or recklessness or fraud.

6193. We have the advantage of the fact that you are familiar with the practice. You would have the report put upon the file ?—Yes, put on the file of the court so that it may be accessible to every creditor.

6194. Have you at all considered at what sort of date after the conclusion of the public examination you would have the bankrupt's conduct considered ? Six months has been suggested to the Committee in some instances and in some nine months ?—Certainly six months. My Chamber would be in favour of the very earliest possible date.

17 Apr. 1907.

6195. It has been suggested that some time should be given to see how the realisation might work out ?—That might cause very considerable delay.

6196. The second question really resolves itself, to a great extent, into this : whether the penalty and disabilities which can be imposed upon a bankrupt when his discharge comes up for consideration should be strengthened ?—Yes. My Chamber would distinguish in the conduct of the debtor whether he has been merely negligent, or whether he has been reckless or whether he has been fraudulent, and they would make a graduated scale of punishment to meet each particular case. If he was simply negligent then he should not have his discharge until he had paid at least 6s. 8d. in the £. If he had been reckless in his trading or had failed to keep proper books of account such as are usual in his business, then the discharge should be suspended for not less than five years. If he has been found to be fraudulent in the course of his business his discharge should be suspended for ten years, and the bankrupt's conduct should be reported to the public prosecutor with a view to punishment. Then my Chamber also considered that it should be made a penal offence for any bankrupt or insolvent debtor to trade, or incur liabilities before he has obtained his discharge, whether he traded by himself or in partnership, or by a nominee, or by any ascertainable method whatever. They know that the practice extensively prevails of bankrupts entering into business either by a nominee or through their wives.

6197. And that you would make punishable ?—Yes.

6198. You agree with Mr. Hansell in that, evidently. Does it embarrass you if I put you a question upon this which does not exactly arise from your proof ?—Not at all.

6199. Do you ever prosecute ?—Yes. I should think probably during the last twenty-five or thirty years I should have had probably twelve to fifteen prosecutions.

6200. I was going to ask you whether you thought there should be any discretion in the public prosecutor or his agent, after the court has made an order to prosecute. It has been represented to us that sometimes the facts appear in a different aspect when you actually come to prepare for a criminal prosecution ?—My experience has been this, that in some cases where prosecution has been ordered in respect of several offences and I have not been able to get sufficient evidence, or some evidence has fallen to the ground or not been considered enough, I have reported it to the public prosecutor and he has directed me not to proceed with that particular charge.

6201. He has taken upon himself to do that ?—Yes.

6202. He has given evidence, or rather his representative has given evidence, before us that he thought he should have that discretion in every case ?—I believe he has assumed it.

6203. I will not trouble you with No. 3 ?—The Act of course was passed last year.

6204. No. 4, if I might put it to you, the real question that we have to deal with rather is a suggestion that in particular cases there should be a speedier realisation, I mean realisation at once ?—Yes.

6205. I see your Chamber considered that the thing should be rather left as it is. I mean that it should be for the creditors ?—Yes, that is so. In some cases it would be a business in our district for disposal, and in a case like that the creditors always desire to have a voice in the matter.

6206. And you do not think that a business suffers by the necessary delay that there is in dealing with the creditors ?—I do not think so. I have known cases in which a business has been brought round.

6207. Of course, you are aware of the difficulties that have arisen about the operation of the law as to after-acquired property devolving on the trustee in bankruptcy to the prejudice of creditors after bankruptcy ?—I am.

6208. What is the view of your Chamber as to that ?—They take the view very strongly that after-acquired property should be applied first in payment of creditors for value since the bankruptcy, and if this could not be brought about, then they think the assets should be divided between all the creditors, the dividends paid to the first creditors being first deducted.

6209. So as to bring them all on a level ?—So as to bring them all on a level.

6210. Then what is your view as to bringing real estate into line with personal estate ? Under the decision in Cohen v. Mitchell you would protect all transactions ?—Yes. This renders it of course desirable to protect all transactions whether relating to realty or personalty, provided there has been no notice of bankruptcy and the matter is a boná-fide one. It is strongly recommended, however, that there should be one Central Office for the United Kingdom for registration of all charges and incumbrances, including bankruptcies, so that a search in that office would be sufficient. I have in my mind a case in which the purchaser had to pay over again £300, a deposit which he had paid to an undischarged bankrupt.

6211. Had to pay it over again to the trustee ?—Yes.

6212. Now we have had a great deal of evidence one way and another with reference to married women, as to whether they should be made subject to the bankruptcy laws or not ?—My Chamber take a very strong view on this, and they say that women should be placed on the same footing as men before the law of bankruptcy, whether they are traders or not.

6213. Perhaps I might put a question to you which I think would be put by one of our members who is absent. Have you considered the effect of what one may call the family view of that, that the husband would necessarily have to pay the debts incurred by his wife because he could not, having regard to his family, his children and everything, allow his wife to be bankrupt and perhaps sent to prison ?—It would be exceedingly difficult I am aware to provide for every case, but taking everything all round it is well known of course that at present very great frauds are being committed on the trading community by married women who can evade the law of bankruptcy.

6215. Then do you think that the law relating to marriage settlements and the avoidance of them and so on requires any amendment ?—Yes, there again, with the exception of ante-nuptial settlements, we go on to express our opinion that trustees of those settlements who may have lent moneys for the purpose of trading should not be able to claim in competition with ordinary creditors for value.

6217. And then I think you would also recommend that all post nuptial settlements should be registered ?—Yes ; that is so.

6218. Now a very important question that we have to deal with is that relating to voluntary deeds of arrangement, and I daresay you will observe that the exact terms of reference are : " Whether the provisions of the laws relating to voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors should be amended so as to place the debtor and the trustee under any such arrangement or composition, and the terms and conditions of the arrangement or composition, more under control, and provide for official audits of the trustee's accounts, and official control over the assets in his hands." You will see that that raises two very important branches of the question, whether the law should be left as it is, as some people advocate, or whether the law should provide more control ?—My chamber is distinctly of opinion that there should be more control in order that the Court may have in case of fraud more authority over them. They recommend that all voluntary arrangements and compositions should come under the Bankruptcy law, but would leave the practical management to the creditors and trustees unless the creditors request the Court to take a dilatory or negligent or defaulting trustee in hand. And my chamber go on to say that the Court should have the power to say whether there shall be a composition, or arrangement, or liquidation, without public examination. The Court shall, however, have the power, despite the decision of the creditors to the contrary, to order bankruptcy if on the report of the Official Receiver there is believed to have been on the part of the debtor fraud which the creditors are disposed to overlook. The creditors in all cases where bankruptcy does not ensue should have power by a majority of two-thirds in number to grant the debtor's discharge. The creditors, by resolution of a majority in number, should have the right to report the debtor under a voluntary assignment or composition to the Court as guilty of negligence in trading, of not keeping proper books of account, recklessness in trading, or fraud, whereupon the debtor should undergo public examination, and be liable to the same provisions as in bankruptcy. Trustees' accounts should be officially audited. All bills of costs of trustees or solicitors should be taxed, and trustees in every case should furnish security.

6219. Dealing with the last paragraph first; have you yourself thought out at all to whom security should be given?—Yes, my experience is that the guarantee offices are the best means of securing this.

6220. The guarantee offices under bankruptcy give the security to the Financial Secretary of the Board of Trade. To whom would you give security under a voluntary deed of assignment?—To the Registrar of the Court in each district.

6221. And then you would make the trustees' bills of costs taxable, I see?—I would make them taxable—in fact the same law as the law of bankruptcy would apply in those cases with the exceptions mentioned, such as creditors having the power to dispense with public examination, and also having the power to grant discharges. In other respects the cases of insolvency would follow the ordinary bankruptcy practice.

6222. The point I had in my mind was that the trustee in bankruptcy has his remuneration voted which covers at any rate personal charges. Now would you say that the Registrar was to tax the amount—to borrow a term from your profession—of the profit costs of the trustee?—There would have to be some means of fixing the remuneration, if the creditors do not fix it, and in that case the Registrar would be the proper person to do it.

6223. And then by the official audit would you mean an audit by the Board of Trade?—Yes; by the Board of Trade in the same way as under the present law.

6224. With the trustees?—Yes.

6225. In that paragraph stating that the creditors should have the right to report the debtor under a voluntary assignment, would not that be rather to keep him in the court, so that he is not a free man quite after the deed has been accepted?—I would put some limit on the time within which the Report might be made.

6226. Because I mean the object of the voluntary arrangement is rather to get the debtor free?—Yes; that is so.

6227. And you would be rather keeping him under the tutelage of the Court?—I agree that it would be somewhat of a hardship upon him if some limit were not fixed.

6228. Passing to No. 9, if I might deal with that specifically, our first question is whether assignments of book debts ought to be registered?—Yes. My chamber is very strongly of opinion that general assignments but not particular assignments of book debts should be registered.

6229. You do not think that that would hamper people at all?—I do not think so. I think the present law has a tendency to work gross injustice to creditors generally, because this general assignment may include not only the present debts but all future debts.

6230. We have had a good deal of conflicting evidence on this subject, I mean as to the facts. It has been represented to us by people of experience that there are very few of those assignments, and it has been represented by people of experience that there are a great many, but would you tell me what your experience is; have you often come across them?—No, I have not often come across them, I have come across them on a few occasions within thirty years. I have before me a case where it did happen and where something like £10,000 of assets were swept off under one of those general assignments by a relative.

6231. Passing on to the other one on which we have also had, I think I may say, a great deal of conflicting evidence, and that is whether hiring agreements, and other forms of security which one may take as the hire purchase agreements should be registered?—My chamber have taken the view that those should be registered so that creditors can ascertain for themselves how they stand when dealing with any person.

6232. Might I ask you, would you exclude hire purchase agreements for very small amounts, such as for not more than £30, so as to prevent unnecessary overcrowding of the register, because it is suggested that there are something like 2,000,000 of these kind of documents?—There would be a very large umber, but I would hardly see my way to exclude any, because the small hire-purchase agreements affect a very large number of small traders.

6233. Do you think that the hire purchase system from your experience in your district works hardly on poor people, that they have to pay exorbitant prices?—In some cases; of course they do not all come to light. We only see occasionally a case in the courts in which there is considerable hardship in connection with these hire purchase agreements.

6234. I see that your chamber would suggest that registers should be kept in the County Court districts so that they might be readily consulted?—That is the view of my Chamber.

6236. But what I meant was this: Is there any practical difficulty in having to send the deed up to London to be registered? Does that cause any additional expense?—A little, but not much.

6237. As I understand, the broad result of your chamber's views is that realisation and distribution should be left as much as possible in the hands of creditors and the conduct in the hands of the officials of the Court?—Yes, that is so.

6238. And then I see that you have a valuable suggestion at the end with reference to the punishment of bankrupts who have infringed the criminal law?—Yes, they recommend that the period of four months should be extended to twelve under the Debtors Act of 1869.

6239. And then you would give further powers to the Judge of the Bankruptcy Court?—Yes.

6240. Or to the court of summary jurisdiction to punish?—Yes. It appears to my chamber to be rather a clumsy method, the present one, of prosecuting fraudulent debtors. In some cases, perhaps, the offences are not very very serious and at present the courts of summary jurisdiction have power to punish in very much more serious offences than those.

6241. You do not think that the composition of a court of summary jurisdiction—magistrates—would offer any difficulty in dealing with debtors' cases?—The composition of local benches is not always everything that one can desire, but I do not know of any better tribunal that I can suggest.

6243. But are not there some 70,000 in the country who are undischarged?—Yes, I think that is so. I think it is a pity that it should be so. These men, of course, are under a disability. They must, before they incur any debt of £20 and upwards, make known the fact that they are undischarged.

6244. Would your chamber be inclined to include in that term (that the bankrupt should remain undischarged), that he should be under civil disabilities as well ?—I hardly think they would go as far as that ; that would be a terrible thing.

6245. You advocate five years for dealing unfairly, or fraudulently, or something of that kind ?—Yes.

6246. Do not you think in such a case if a man has been guilty of fraud that he should have his civil abilities taken from him during the times he remains undischarged ?—Of course it is only an extension of the principle, I fully agree.

6247. I daresay your experience in the matter of book-keeping is this : That great numbers of them have kept their books well for a series of years and then have ceased to keep them or continued to keep them in such a manner that the trustee has had no possible means of tracing their transactions during the last twelve months or so ?—Yes, I have had experience of that. I think that is a very common evil.

6248. Do not you think that the object of the bankrupt or debtor is to cover fraudulent transactions ?—Yes.

6249. Would you not, or your chamber, in such a case be in favour of certain punishment being inflicted on traders who deal in that fashion ?—Yes.

6250. That there should be imprisonment, say, for fourteen days where a man had ceased to keep his books, undoubtedly for the purpose of concealing fraudulent transactions ?—Where a state of circumstances like that existed my chamber would go the length of saying that the bankrupt should be criminally punished. They have in the past moved in this matter before the Associated Chambers, and carried a resolution that bankrupts should be amenable to some punishment if they failed to keep proper books of account.

6251. But in cases not punished by imprisonment do not you think that civil disabilities as well as the suspension of the discharge should go together ?—It would have a very great deterrent effect, no doubt.

6252. (Chairman.) There are a great many civil disabilities now.

6253. (Mr. Richardson.) Yes.

6254. (Chairman.) You mean the stoppage of the right to vote ?

6256. (Witness.) Practically treating him as an outlaw.

6257. (Mr. Richardson.) In Clause 5 I take it that with regard to the compositions and voluntary arrangements when you say the creditors should have the power to decide you mean a considerable majority, I presume ?—Two-thirds should bind the minority.

6258. In value and number ?—Yes.

6259. In value and number both ?—Well, the old arrangement was in value only, and my chamber would still be of the same opinion that there should be two-thirds in value.

6260. And not number ?—No.

6261. Is there not a possibility if you have only value, of one creditor or two creditors being able to deal as they like ?—There is that possibility, but we also state that where there is any attempt to work oppression by the majority that then there may be resort to the Court.

6262. Then there is just one more question. At the present time the limit for a dissenting creditor to object to a deed of arrangement is three months ?—Yes.

6263. Is your chamber in favour of reducing that to one month ? Do not you think that one month would be sufficient for a creditor to object to a deed of arrangement so as to permit the trustee more speedily realizing an estate ?—I should see no objection to that. Of course it cuts both ways. You have the right to found an objection in bankruptcy upon that assignment if you think fit.

6264. But now the time is three months ?—Yes, it is.

6265. Would you not be in favour of one month ?—I should not see any objection to that at all. I think it would help to a more speedy administration of the estate.

6266. You believe that any creditor should in a month have had ample time to say whether he will accept ?—Certainly, I quite agree.

6267. One more question with regard to the registration of assignments of book debts. Do you find that the practice of assigning book debts is growing ?—I can hardly say that as to general assignments. As to particular assignments I should say that they are being looked after quite as actively as ever they were.

6268. (Mr. Peat.) There are three classes of bankrupts to which you refer : the negligent, the reckless, and the fraudulent ?—Yes.

6269. And I think there might be a fourth class—the honest ?—We have said nothing about him.

6270. He is such a rara avis ?—Because we consider that the present law is fairly satisfactory, as it allows him to have his discharge if his bankruptcy has been brought about by no fault of his own.

6272. At present reckless trading is punished. The negligent gentleman, you say, is careless in recording liabilities. I am afraid I should call that reckless, and I think so would other people. A fraudulent case is easy to decide, but negligence and recklessness are on a line which is very uncertain, and if you would define them it would be interesting ?—No doubt they would be very difficult to separate, but I think there is a fairly clear line of demarcation between negligence and recklessness.

6273. In the incurring of liabilities, a man who is careless in doing so, do not you describe him as reckless ?—Yes. I should think that that was more like recklessness than negligence.

6274. You are referring to the fact that a gentleman is negligent in his business if he is careless in incurring liabilities. I do not think you need labour the matter further, I thought you might have some additional line which would be very easy of ascertainment, but I am afraid you have not. Passing from that I will come to hiring agreements. I think your view is that hiring agreements should be registered as regards any property in a man's business. Is not that so ?—Yes.

6275. Not necessarily the furniture of his house, not necessarily matters outside his business, but your view is, or your chamber's view is, that matters in his business which he hires should be registered. Is that your view ?—I think they do not make that distinction, do they ?

6276. I have some sort of recollection that that was so ?—It is No. 9. Of course they would be limited in the case of private residences—necessarily limited to such things as furniture, musical instruments, and possibly also to wearing apparel ; to pictures and works of art, though I never heard of any of those. The most usual are those relating to furniture.

6277. I do not think you specifically say whether you would register ?—I think the view of my chamber would be that all those things should be registered so that creditors, whether actually in trade or not, would know where they were. At present there are one or two well-known trades where the custom is established and is recognised by the courts, such as the furniture trades, as shown by the case of in re Crawcour.

6278. Then it is your view that furniture should not be registered ?—I think that all ought to be registered.

6279. All ought to be registered ?—All hire and purchase agreements ought to be registered.

6280. Whether the subject matter is one connected with the trade of the person, or with him in his individual capacity ?—Yes.

6281. And you are also of opinion that up to any amount or down to any amount it should be registered ?—Yes, I would make no distinction.

6282. So that you would have—as I put to one of the previous witnesses—to enquire as to its being registered, if it was under a hiring agreement ?—It would require no doubt a very large staff to do that, but people would know better who to trust and who to give credit to.

6283. I will take you to one or two other cases—it is very common, for instance to hire a steamship ?—Yes.

6284. That has been a very common thing for a period of years ?—Yes.

6285. How would you register that ?—I should have it registered under the Shipping Acts.

6286. Then it is very customary to hire a colliery with all the machinery attached to it from the landlord ?—They go in for registering all those things in our county although they do not all over England. Any machinery would be registered.

6287. The machinery which belongs to the landlord, would you have that specified and registered ?—Yes, if it were on hire purchase

6288. And so with a mill in which the landlord let the power ?—Yes, that is essential and necessary, especially in our district.

6289. In your district you have a great deal of it ?—Yes.

6290. Are you also accustomed to traders, for instance, hiring 100 or 1,000 waggons with which to carry on their business ?—Yes—well, I will not say the number, but we are accustomed in our district to, and we know of, the hire of waggons.

6291. And those you would all register ?—Yes, we would have them all registered.

6292. You referred to the question of discharge—that a bankrupt's discharge should be suspended for a long period of years. How would a bankrupt live unless he had some mode by which he could be put into possession of a means of subsistence ?—At present the Court makes him an allowance out of his income.

6293. Only where he is of assistance to his estate, but they do not where he has no estate ?—Oh yes, they do. I know it of my own knowledge that he has also a certain portion of his income allowed him.

6294. I am referring to a bankrupt who is a business man. I am aware if he has £1,000 a year as a pension that he has an allowance, but in the case of a trader, if he does not pay 6s. 8d. he might be suspended for a very long time, and if he does not pay something else he might be suspended for another long time. Have you considered how that poor man would live ?—Yes, he has been unfortunate. He would have to take the consequences of his misfortune. He could not expect to be living in the same way as he did previously.

6295. Do you know of any means by which he could live ?—He would have to take a position as manager or something of that kind so as to earn an income.

6296. Would it also meet your view or the view of your association, that the bankrupt should come up for consideration of his conduct and that the Court should give him his discharge unless he has been fraudulent, subject to a judgment against him for a specific amount. The effect of that would be that the man would be in a position to earn his living. Of course, he would begin with a debt upon him, but he would be in a position to do something to earn his living ?—No, I do not think my chamber would take that view. They are strongly of opinion the other way. They considered this particular clause and the answers they gave to it they considered at length and that was their deliberate opinion.

6297. Now your chamber also has come to the conclusion that the bankrupt should not be allowed to trade personally or through his wife, or through any ascertainable means ?—Yes.

6298. That is your view ?—Yes, it is so.

6299. Therefore, there again his means of livelihood are curtailed ?—Yes, considerably curtailed—that is one of the consequences of bankruptcy.

6300. Have you found that a bankrupt becomes manager for his wife, or for some relation at a remuneration, say, of 90 per cent. of the profits ?—No, I cannot say that I actually know what the percentage of profits or the remuneration has been, but I certainly have known of a business being carried on in the same way, by a man who has failed, under another name.

6301. But would you prohibit that bankrupt from carrying on that business upon the basis that he was not paid £5 a week, but that he was paid a certain proportion of the profits—that his remuneration should depend on his efforts ?—I think that that would be a proper way to remunerate him. My chamber's answer is, of course, that the business should not be carried on by the bankrupt himself.

6302. But it is not now, if you will forgive me saying so—the business is started by a nominee ?—Yes, that is so.

6303. Who employs the bankrupt and the bankrupt as a rule in such cases takes a very large proportion of the profit ?—Practically the whole of it.

6304. You may say practically—it is himself who is in the business ?—Yes.

6305. But while your chamber makes it clear that the bankrupt may not trade through his wife and may not trade through any ascertainable means, your chamber is not in favour of that same bankrupt being remunerated in accordance with the success of the business, it might be at the rate of 95 per cent. of the profits ?—If it were not his business, or if it were not the business of the nominee of his, he would not come within the bounds of this resolution of my chamber.

6306. I do not see much difference between a man trading and receiving 90 or 95 per cent. of profits, and a man trading and receiving 100 per cent. of the profits. I say you must allow the bankrupt to live—you cannot starve him ?—Certainly.

6307. The only means to let him live is to let him work. However, that is argument. Another point is that you say that a woman should be liable to the bankruptcy laws, the same as a man ?—Yes.

6308. And you do not, I understand, confine that to a woman's trading ?—No, I do not.

6309. Anybody would be liable ?—Who contracts a debt. She should be amenable to the law of bankruptcy. At present it is extremely difficult for tradesmen to recover debts from married women.

6310. I think I will not continue that subject because the chairman asked you about it, and his questions make my point on that. The advances by a trustee after the settlement you think should be postponed to other creditors ?—Yes.

6311. Have you a reason for that ?—Frequently these advances are made out of trust funds which ought never to be used in business.

6312. If that your only reason ?—I think so, at present.

6313. Your reason would not apply where a father had placed ten thousand pounds in settlement and a portion of that had been lent to carry on a business ?—In breach of trust ?

6314. No, not in breach of trust ?—With the full authority of some provision in the deed of settlement.

6315. Yes—observe I say the money never came from the business ?—Of course in a case like that I am bound to adhere to the answer of my chamber—personally, I might have a different opinion.

6317. I think I have not made myself clear. Does your chamber suggest that twenty creditors, being all the creditors of a debtor, should not say to that debtor, "We will accept 5s. in the £, and give you an advantage ?"—No, my chamber have definitely come to the conclusion that all private arrangements should, in the first place, come under the Act. Of course, I am aware that it will be extremely difficult to accomplish that in every case. I have had cases myself in which there has been no deed, no writing of any description, where all the debtor wanted was time, and where he gave promissory notes for the debts payable by instalments, and those were duly met and the thing was cleared up, and there was no publicity about it. I am perfectly aware that in a case of that sort it would be extremely difficult to compel it to be brought under the Act.

6318. I would suggest to you that where all the creditors agree, their rights should not be interfered with. Where there is a majority it is different, but I am asking your view on the subject. Take the case which you have just mentioned yourself, where a dozen or more creditors decided, all of them unanimously, to give a man time, or to take a composition, do you say that that man and those creditors shall not be allowed to do so ?—I think it would be a very great hardship, but the answer to the question by the chamber is that all voluntary arrangements and compositions should be under the Act. I think they had in view quite a different kind of arrangement to what I have been mentioning—an assignment, for instance.

6319. Where all the creditors might not agree ?—Yes.

6320 You would protect the rights of the minority ?—Certainly.

6321. I have a little difficulty in understanding two answers of your Chamber. Assume that a deed of assignment has been executed; that the trustee has entered upon his duties, and has partially realised the property; that the majority in number has reported to the court that the debtor, in their opinion, has been guilty of reckless trading and so on—what is the position of the trustee, and what is the position of the debtor ? Is it your view that the debtor should be made bankrupt and the deed of assignment ended, and if that is the case what would become of the trustee, who has already realised under it ?—The view of my chamber is this—that this debtor should undergo public examination—that in fact the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act should apply to him, as if he were an actual bankrupt.

6322. But would you, or would you not, cancel the deed of assignment ?—Yes, I should supersede it entirely after bankruptcy.

6323. And what would you do with the trustee, who has already realised ?—If he were continued, well and good. If not, some other trustee would be appointed, and he would hand over the assets he had realised, and the deed would be at an end.

6324. But he has no right to do anything of the sort ?——Quite so. But I should make a provision that the trustee who has properly acted should be remunerated and his transaction protected.

6325. And you say that that is to be done by a majority in number of the creditors. Another part, I think, of your answer is that the Court should further have the power, despite the opposition of the creditors to the contrary, to order bankruptcy, if in the report of the Official Receiver there is believed to have been fraud, and so on ?—Yes.

6326. First of all you say the majority in number has the right to report the debtor for this purpose for recklessness, and so on. Then is it your mind that that report should bring the Official Receiver in to examine ?—Yes.

6327. And then the Court should annul the deed ?—Yes, if it thought fit. I should give it discretionary power, of course.

6328. That might take it three or four months to do ?—Possibly, in some cases. At present you do not get a trustee to commence operations as a rule under three months.

6329. It would be a little cumbersome to wait that time ?—It might be a little cumbersome, but it might expose certain frauds which it is well known do take place under voluntary arrangements.

6330. You come to the point then of the trustee's accounts being officially audited. Have you much experience of deeds of arrangement ?—No, I cannot say that I have.

6331. Is it not usual for a committee to audit a trustee's accounts ?—Under the present system of deeds of arrangement, no; I have not very extensive experience about those. I have seen them, and had them brought under my notice from time to time.

6332. You have not much experience in deeds of arrangement ?—Not a great deal.

6333. By the way, I forgot to ask you one question In deeds of arrangement would you only bring the Official Receiver in bankruptcy in in case of fraud ?—Oh yes, certainly I should.

6334. Supposing a debtor has not committed fraud, but has been reckless in trading, and, in fact, instead of paying 6s. 8d. in the £1, is only able to pay 5s., 4s., or some other figure like that, owing to his negligence or recklessness, would you consider that a reason for annulling a deed of composition ?—Yes, I should think it a very good reason for doing so.

6335. In that case would any deed of assignment escape being broken up by the Official Receiver ?—Yes, I think so. I think there are plenty of known instances where arrangements are made and become inevitable through misfortune, and which go through without question.

6336. You have had considerable experience in these deeds of arrangement ?—I have had some, but not a large experience.

6337. I think I have not made myself clear. Assuming that the debtor, as is the fact in nearly every case, has arrived at the point when he cannot pay his creditors because of negligent trading—misfortune if you like—but trading at a loss, and trading possibly after he knew that he was insolvent. A man goes on, pays 19s. in the £, then 18s., and then his stock realises much less than he expects, and so on—in a case of that character, which I may say is that of ninety-nine cases out of every 100 of failures—would you say that the minority would require the bankruptcy of the debtor ?—No, we should say that only the majority should be allowed to bring it into bankruptcy in that case.

6338. Your view is that where fraud is committed the debtor on the application even of a minority, even of one man, should be made a bankrupt ?—If it be fraud, certainly 6339. But in many cases of ordinary failure and not recklessness or negligence ?—Then it must be the majority of the creditors.

6340. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I take it that you have rather extended an answer which you gave to Question No. 2 in regard to the discharge being suspended for five years in a case where proper books of account had not been kept, by agreeing that the matter should be penal ?—Yes, I have.

6341. I may take it from you that that is the view generally entertained by chambers of commerce and by your own chamber ?—Yes, that is so.

6342. Now, as to hiring agreements—am I to take it that you would register all hiring agreements without any limitation whatever ?—I would draw no line whatever. I should have all hiring agreements registered.

6343. In the view of your chamber it would not be sufficient to impose a limit say of £30 as in the case of bills of sale, excluding from registration those below that amount ?—No, I do not think so. I think that everything should be registered in this way, because, although it might be only a small amount, yet it affects a very large number of traders in the country.

6344. Then as to the register being kept in the district, would it not be sufficient if the present practice with regard to bills of sale and deeds of arrangement were adhered to, by which the deed is kept in London and an abstract of it is sent to the local county court ?—Yes, I think so. The commercial community at present is extremely well served by the Gazettes.

6345. And that if applied also to hiring agreements would maintain uniformity in practice ?—Yes.

6346. And I gather that you are in favour of extending the powers of the Court so that the Bankruptcy Court should be able to punish any offences—small offences at any rate—or refer them to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction ?—To the magistrate, yes, that is our view. We do not know a better tribunal than the County Court Judge who has all the circumstances before him or remitting it to the local bench to be dealt with. At present the local benches are entrusted with infinitely greater powers and punish offences of a far more serious character, and my chamber think that they might be entrusted with these things also.

Mr. George Duncan Law, called; and Examined.

6347. (Chairman.) I think you represent the Bradford Chamber of Commerce ?—Yes.

6348. Would you mind just giving us your address ?—My firm is styled Law, Russell & Co., Limited, Bradford 6349. Are you in the Bradford trade ?—Yes, I am in the Bradford trade. I am the head of the firm. I am also Chairman of the Piece Merchants' section of our chamber.

6350. I think you have been kind enough to come and express the views of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce ?—Yes.

6351. That is an incorporated chamber ?—Yes, that is an incorporated chamber.

6352. And it represents, I presume, the prominent traders ?—It represents the staple trade of the district, practically speaking, and all the trades connected with it.

6353. We have had each of us the typewritten copy of the report of the chamber in answer to the questions propounded by this Committee, but I was just going to ask you upon them a little if you will kindly favour us with your views ?—Certainly.

6354. With regard to the examination and investigation of the debtor's conduct and his punishment, would you just shortly tell us what your Chamber think ?—We think that the examination ought to be more thorough and more complete than it is at present. We think that there should be time given for the Official Receiver to go into the case and ask other questions later on. There have been many cases which have come under my own notice where men have not told the truth at their first meeting, and on investigation it has been found out that they had to recall a great deal of what they said.

6355. So that you would in fact not close the examination so soon ?—That is so. I think it is a great mistake.

6356. And you would enable the Official Receiver to investigate further and have the debtor up again ?—Yes, have the debtor up again.

6357. Then I gather that as regards punishment, your chamber agrees with the resolution that we had of the associated chambers, the end part of which is that the court should be empowered to inflict summary punishment upon a debtor who had been guilty of misconduct ?—Yes; we were strongly of that opinion, but we added something to the effect that the truthfulness or otherwise of his answers should be also taken into account, because that has a great deal to do with it.

6358. What is your view as to including among punishable offences the failure of the bankrupt to keep any books of account ?—We think that that is a very serious matter. I believe in France it is a much more serious thing than in England ? I have lately come across some cases in Egypt where the tribunal there is also empowered to go much more thoroughly into the question of the books, and to insist upon adequate books of accounts being kept.

6359. And so you would make that a matter in respect of which a bankrupt might be subject to imprisonment, if the case was a proper one ?—Yes. Of course there are limitations. There are some businesses where it is very difficult for a man to keep what I call proper books of account: ledgers and the like, and where probably all that he can do is to keep a cash account. But even if he does that with some reasonable fairness, it gives a clue to his business.

6360. Then, lastly, I think that your chamber would be in favour of the cost of prosecuting bankrupts being paid out of the National Fund, as it often occurs that there are no assets out of which the prosecution's costs can be paid ?—Yes, I think so.

6361. Passing now to the realisation of assets, I rather gather that you are not in favour of any very special change in the present procedure—that is to say that the creditors ought to have the control of the realisation of assets ?—I think so. It varies so much in different cases.

6362. But if there is a business to dispose of or to keep going or anything like that, you would be in favour of the trustee being appointed by the creditors, and of the creditors practically controlling it ?—Yes, certainly. Mr. George D. Law. 17 Apr. 1907

6363. Next, as regards undischarged bankrupts carrying on business, could you tell us what the views of your chamber are upon that, because it is a very important question ?—We feel that there should be some method of arriving at the names of those undischarged bankrupts, and I think in the answer of our chamber they refer to some system or other—there should be a list. It might be published, as other lists are, or registered in each district.

6364. Then it would have to be as a corollary of that, would it not, a punishable offence for a bankrupt to trade in a name other than that of his prior bankruptcy, otherwise the list would be no good to you ?—There is one case I have just come across in my own business, where a man who was an undischarged bankrupt entered into some business and seemed to be very anxious to do business. We did not know what he was, and on making inquiries we found out that he was an undischarged bankrupt, and that he was carrying on the business—the real man doing the work—in the name of his wife. Such cases have come up in the course of my business life very often, and our Chamber feel very strongly on this question.

6366. Do you think it would be necessary in order to make a list, such as you suggest, of undischarged bankrupts effective that it should be made penal for a bankrupt to recommence business under another name—for instance, to take a concrete case that as regards Mr. Preston who was made a bankrupt in Cheltenham, it should be made penal for him to recommence business elsewhere under the name of Redgrave ?—If it were the same individual, but I think it would be a great step gained if a list were kept, because we do make enquiries and get to know, and the list would be a very great help to traders.

6367. Now then, passing on to the question of married women, do you think that married women ought to be made subject to the bankruptcy laws ?—My chamber thinks so very decidedly.

6369. Then as regards marriage settlements, would you place them on the same footing as voluntary settlements ?—Yes, certainly.

6372. And, broadly, I take it that your view is that where there is no fraud or anything of that kind that the trader should be left free from official interference ?—I think so. There was one point, if I may say so, which struck some of us, and that was that it would be a great advantage in deeds of voluntary assignment where there was a question which could not be settled except under bankruptcy proceedings if that question could be taken to the local Court and be decided there—sometimes it is a question of undue preference or something of that sort, which I believe cannot be decided except by going through the Court. If some of those questions could possibly be arranged by going to the Court and getting a decision upon them it would materially help us.

6373. So that you would leave the power of the creditors to have the thing wound up in their own way and leave them intact the power of recovering assets which they do not have now, but which they would have in bankruptcy ? —That is so.

17 Apr. 1907.

6374. You are in favour of making it compulsory for an assignment of book debts to be registered ?—Yes.

6375. I presume that is as to general assignments ?—Yes. By general assignments I suppose you mean the assignment of particular debts.

6376. I rather mean to exclude the case where a banker advances on the security of something that would be due from the employer ?—Next month so to speak, but not on the current account.

6377. No ?—Yes, I should be in favour of that.

6378. Would you extend that to hiring agreements ?—Certainly. I have known of a case just lately where a man had met his creditors and had filled the place with sewing machines and naturally anybody who was going to sell to him would say " He has got all these sewing machines," and would think he was very well off while as a matter of fact they were lent by one of the sewing machine people. His machinery was sold and he had to get new machinery from the sewing machine company.

6379. Do you find that the provision of the Yorkshire Registry works well in registering transfers of manufacturing businesses and so forth ? I see you refer to it: " Provisions similar to those of the Yorkshire Registry should be made throughout the country, so that persons dealing with the mortgagor may be able to ascertain the existence of the security " ?—Yes, we do.

6380. That is peculiar to Yorkshire, I believe ?—Yes, I believe so.

6381. Lastly, I see allied with this subject is the very important case of the registration of firms. Does your chamber entertain a strong opinion about that ?—It always has done—it has always been very strong upon that, and personally I am too, after a very long experience.

6382. That is rather also assimilating to the law of France ?—Yes, under the law of France in case of a change of the personnel of the firm we always get a circular notifying that the name has been changed. I do not know that that is absolutely necessary as long as you can find who are behind the firm.

6383. (Mr. Richardson.) On page 2 you say " the court should be empowered to inflict such summary punishment and impose such disabilities as may be deemed expedient." Would your chamber be in favour of imposing civil disabilities as a punishment ?—I do not know when that came up before us whether we were considering this question of civil disabilities.

6384. What short of that ?—By imprisonment.

6385. You say " impose such disabilities as may be deemed expedient." Do not you think that the taking away of a man's civil abilities would be a considerable punishment to him ?—Yes, it would be a very serious punishment.

6386. And that he would feel a great deal more. As we know there are upwards of 70,000 undischarged bankrupts. If the undischarge carried with it that as long as it continued, or at all events for a number of years civil rights were taken away, do not you think that it would act as a great deterrent ?—I am sure it would.

6388. I might say that in France a man is not punished for trading under a name other than his own name, because he is an undischarged bankrupt.

6389. (Chairman.) No.

6390. (Mr. Richardson.) It is looked at from another point of view. It is looked upon as fraud, and as an attempt to get goods fraudulently. He is punished, but he is not punished under the Bankruptcy Act.

6391. (Chairman.) That is what Mr. Astoul told us last Wednesday—the counsel for the French Embassy.

6392. (Mr. Richardson.) He is liable to be punished for obtaining goods fraudulently

6393. (Chairman.) But Mr. Astoul also said that he was liable if he, as a single man, traded under the name of a firm, to be punished under the law.

6394. (Mr. Richardson.) Just one more question, and that is with regard to the voluntary arrangements. As you know there is now a three months' limit in which dissenting creditors can object to the deed being made absolute ?—Yes.

6396. (Mr. Peat.) In regard to a bankrupt carrying on business, I understand your chamber to hold the opinion that a bankrupt should not carry on business in another name, but is your view also this, that a bankrupt's wife should not carry on business and employ the bankrupt if it is done quite openly ?—No, I do not think we should go so far as that, if we only had the opportunity of knowing or getting the information.

6397. As to hiring agreements I notice that you qualify your view by stating that hiring agreements of plant or furniture used by a debtor in his business should be registered—that is under Number 9 ?—Yes.

6398. That would not apply to furniture of a private house ?—No.

6399. It would not ?—No.

6400. That is not your view ?—No, that is not our idea at all.

6401. Now take the hire of a steamship for a period of years. Do you regard that as something that should be registered ?—I do not know—we have not thought about it.

6402. Nor what is very common, a company hiring 100 or 1,000 wagons on the hire-purchase system. That is not the class of thing that you have in mind ?—No, not at all. What I had in my mind was a man who is a small manufacturer, getting loans, so to speak, or the hire of machinery at so much a year, and posing as if the machinery was his own.

6403. It does not apply to big transactions ?—There are some cases where it transcends the ordinary, such as those you mention, and where it is of sufficient magnitude it would not enter into the ordinary run.

6404. Your view does not apply to such things as wagons and locomotives ?—No.

6405. Or to ships and that class of thing ?—No.

6406. I should ask one more question on that subject. It is customary for a landlord to let a mill with power ?—Yes, it is so.

6407. How would you register that ?—I think that would be known. There is no difficulty about that in our neighbourhood. We know perfectly well that such a millowner has his engine, lets his mill and gives the power as well. That does not come into our idea of what is a hiring agreement.

6408. And the same with collieries—you find exactly the same thing ?—Yes.

6409. It would not do to say that all hiring agreements should be registered ?—No.

6410. You want a lot of thought to come round that ?—Yes.

6411. Then in Number 9 you mention " Provisions similar to those of the Yorkshire Registry should be made throughout the country, so that persons dealing with the mortgagor may be able to ascertain the existence of the security." In my experience in Yorkshire every banker has a deposit of deeds which never gets on the register ?—Yes.

6412. And therefore the mere registration would never show the trader that the property was really the property of the debtor unless you passed a law that no banker's lien without registration was to be good. Now you would upset all the bankers if you did that ?—I think it would be a very good thing.

6413. Would you—I am afraid the bankers would not. But your view is really and truly that a lien in favour of any person should not be valid—should have no force whatever ?—Should have no force whatever unless it were registered. It might press hardly in some cases, but I think on the whole it would tend to clear up a great many difficulties in trade.

6414. I should like you to consider that a trader even in Bradford who deposits his deeds even for a temporary security would have to register that—it would become public property ?—Well, as a rule in the case of a man who does that, it does become public property sooner or later.

6415. But you have not considered, have you, the disruption of banking business which such a law would imply ?—We have not, in our chamber, discussed that question, because it really was not before us, nor did we think that it entered quite into the scope of what we were dealing with, but I think if I were to express without consultation, the views of our Law Amendment Committee, they would be somewhat in favour of some scheme that would have everything registered.

6416. All liens ?—Yes; at the same time if it were really for what you might call a temporary private arrangement for a week or two, I do not know that it might be worth while to register it.

6417. I daresay you have some banking experience ?—Yes.

6418. I do not suppose you have had an overdraft ?—Yes.

6419. If you ever gave security it would be by way of deposit of deeds, or a deposit of shares, with a blank transfer, which would be a temporary security. Now, if you are going to have all such things registered, has your association considered the immense disturbance that that would cause even for a month or a week, mind ?—Yes, it would; but I do not think that we were quite at the time thinking of these very much larger questions that you have asked.

6420. Just so. One other point on the same subject. You see you are in Yorkshire where there is this registry. With the exception of Yorkshire and Middlesex, which is not compulsory, there is no other county with a registry ?—No.

6421. So that you might have your customer in Yorkshire in one position, and your customer in another county in another position ?—Exactly. Mr. George D. Law. 17 Apr. 1907.

6422. And your bankers the same ?—Exactly.

6423. And it would not be applicable to the whole country ?—No.

6424. And therefore the law would have to be a curious one applicable to Yorkshire only ?—Yes, it would.

6425. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I take it that in the answers you have given to Mr. Peat as to the registration of hire agreements you would require these to be registered—"hiring agreements of machinery, plant, or furniture used by a trader in his business," in order to enable possible creditors to know whether it was desirable to give credit or not to the person concerned ?—Yes.

6426. That is the object in view ?—Yes.

6427. And whether he is dealing with wagons or anything else is immaterial ?—Yes.

6428. The object being really to ascertain the actual financial position of the person in question ?—Yes.

6429. So that a creditor may know whether he should trust him or not ?—Certainly.

6430. And I take it that your answers to the questions put by Mr. Peat were guided by that principle ?—Yes.

6431. (Sir Edward Fithian.) That will be quite sufficient for me.

6432. (Witness.) There are two points I have been discussing since our meeting with several of our members since their asking me to come up here, and one was that we felt that it would be very wise to ask a trustee in a voluntary assignment to give adequate security. We have known of cases lately where a trustee has decamped. Then there is another point, which is rather an important one: that in the colonies of Victoria and Western Australia the registration of bills of sale, of assignments of debts, and of mortgage debentures in the case of companies—these being all practically in the same level—need not be registered until notice has been given of an intent to apply for these. So that the notice is given in the Gazette in order that the creditors or those who are interested may enter caveat against it. That is one of the points which has struck us since our meeting.

THIRTY-FIFTH DAY.

JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.
H. E. G. BURLS, Esq. (for the Secretary.)

The Hon. BERNHARD RINGROSE WISE (K.C. of New South Wales), called; and Examined.

6433. (Chairman.) As I dare say you are aware, this Committee has been appointed to inquire and report into the effect of the Bankruptcy Laws prevailing in the United Kingdom and particularly into questions of commercial misconduct, and we hope to have the advantage of your assistance in telling us what the procedure is in the Australian States in reference to the questions upon which our consideration is invited. First of all, as to the prevention of commercial misconduct by insolvent debtors, could you tell us what are the Courts which have jurisdiction over insolvent debtors ?—Speaking of New South Wales—and I am only speaking of New South Wales—the Bankruptcy Court and the Criminal Court.

6434. Is your Bankruptcy Act similar to that in force here ?—It is founded on Mr. Chamberlain's Act of 1883, and with regard to offences against commercial morality there are practically the same provisions in New South Wales as here. The Hon. Bernhard R. Wise. 1 May, 1907.

6435. Is there no punishment ?—Yes, punishment is of two kinds, that of the certificate being suspended or refused, and of prosecution before the Criminal Court.

6436. Are the offences for which there is prosecution similar to those we have here ?—I have not verified them, but I think practically they are similar.

6437. Then with regard to the discharge, we have been informed that in New South Wales a man comes up compulsorily for his discharge ?—Undoubtedly. That I think is a most valuable provision. That provision is contained in Section 43 of the Consolidated Bankruptcy Act

(New South Wales), and it contains two clauses. The first provides that no bankrupt may make an application for discharge later than twelve months from the date of sequestration unless he has taken the preliminary steps before the inquiry; and the second provides that if a bankrupt has not applied within nine months of the sequestration the Court can, on the application of the Official Assignee, require him by summons, and in case of refusal or neglect may compel him by warrant, to appear before the Court and show cause why a certificate of discharge should not be refused or suspended. The practical effect of that is that every bankrupt has to submit to an investigation and a judgment upon his conduct independently of such disclosures as may be made in the public examination, or in the examination for the discovery of assets. I think that provision is an essential provision for securing respect for the Bankruptcy Law on the part of the bankrupt.

6438. In practice are the discharges under that procedure suspended generally, or does it often happen that the man's discharge is refused altogether?—Yes, it does. I think we are a little stricter in the application of the law as regards suspension and refusal than, as far as I can see, the Court is in England. For instance, I take it that it has been practically laid down here that five years is the limit of suspension.

6440. Does the community there suffer from the undischarged bankrupt trading in other names—the names of companies and so forth?—He cannot trade in the name of a company now, because by a recent Act we have required every company at its registered office to have the names of its real owners exhibited, and every trading name of a firm must expose the name of the partners, and if a man trades under a trade name such as Velveteen Limited, the name of the people who compose Velveteen, Limited, have to be displayed.

6441. Does that apply to joint stock companies only?—No, to all partnerships and to persons trading under assumed names.

6442. Does that involve a very large registering staff?—No, not at all.

6443. Are the names published in publications like our commercial Gazettes?—They are by the Trade Protective agencies, but anyone can search the register on application.

6444. Just to go back for a moment, is the system like the Act of 1883 here with regard to the Official Receiver?—To that I must answer no and yes. Our Act has departed from Mr. Chamberlain's Act in this respect, that we have not an Official Receiver. A petition is presented by a creditor—I am only dealing now with compulsory sequestration—and the Registrar appoints a day for his hearing. In practice that seldom exceeds eight days, and it may be the next day if service can be effected, and if the debtor wishes to oppose the making of the sequestration order he must give three days' notice. Immediately the petition is presented an application may be made by any person interested to stay any proceedings against the debtor, and on the hearing of the petition, which, as I say, takes place seldom more than eight days after the presentation of the petition, the sequestration order may be made. Thereupon the whole of the debtor's assets vest in the Official Assignee, who is an officer of the Court. There have been four and there are now three Official Assignees who are paid a minimum salary and allowed collecting fees, roughly speaking, based on a percentage of the amount that they collect from the estate. Then when the sequestration order is made and all the property of the bankrupt is vested in the Official Assignee he has the same power as is contained in Mr. Chamberlain's Act to collect all assets and book debts of the debtor. Then the first meeting of the creditors takes place, and at that first meeting the creditors may if they like accept a composition or arrangement, but that must be subject to the approval of the Court, and that approval will never be given until a minimum sum of 7s. 6d. in the pound is paid. In practice we find that creditors' arrangements have very rarely, if ever, taken place. I never came across one in my practice, and I was in the Bankruptcy Court as much as anybody and passed this Act. The practice is to let the whole matter go under the control of the Court and we do not allow any arrangements outside of the Act. Any composition is an act of bankruptcy, and no one would accept the responsibility of being a trustee under a deed of assignment.

6445. And so are they quite non-existent?—They are quite non-existent—they used to be most familiar until the passing of this Act in 1887. I might mention that you must not be misled by a reference to the Act. The later references to it will be to the Act of 1898, but that is a consolidating Act.

6446. Is there any provision analogous to that in our Act for appointing a creditor's trustee?—Yes, that has been acted upon, but very rarely.

6447. So that practically the administration is by the three Official Assignees?—Yes, who are officers of the Court. Each Official Assignee is bound within three months to bring up his plan of distribution. That is the limit of time, but unfortunately we, following the English rule, allowed the creditor to come in afterwards and receive his dividends; but I think that ought not to be allowed. If the creditor is so remiss as not to prove his debt before the completion of the distribution he should be precluded from receiving the dividend which was distributed, but our law is the same as the Engish law in that respect.

6448. As regards conduct, is there a public examination before the Judge?—Yes, before the Registrar

6449. Conducted by the Official Assignee?—Conducted by the Official Assignee, who generally in any important case appears by counsel.

6450. Supposing a man has committed a crime as distinguished from some other misconduct—is that reported to anybody like the Public Prosecutor?—Yes, it is reported by the Judge to the Attorney-General.

6451. And does the Attorney-General consider it?—The Attorney-General in New South Wales is the Grand Juror. There is no grand jury, so that it comes to him in the ordinary course.

6452. Does he decide whether to prosecute or not?—He decides whether to file an information or whether to bring the defendant before the Police Court and have him committed in the ordinary way.

6453. But he could prefer an indictment straight away?—Yes. May I add to that, that the Official Assignee also has it in his power to take out a summons and have the man committed before a police magistrate in the ordinary way.

6454. Are prosecutions usually successful?—Yes.

6455. As you are aware, it is rather complained of here that there are so many acquittals?—So I am told, but it is not at all the case in New South Wales. Juries are rather ready to convict, except for the non-keeping of books, which does not appeal to them. Of course, we do not prosecute them only for not keeping books.

6456. Is the application for discharge generally heard after the final dividend has been declared?—No, not necessarily. It must be heard within nine months in the ordinary course, but the debtor is not allowed to apply if he allows twelve months to go by, and if he does not apply within nine months he must be asked to show cause why he has not applied. He may get a certificate of discharge, but it does not necessarily follow that the estate is released.

6457. If I may ask you in a rather larger capacity, it has been very strongly urged upon us from a great many quarters that such a thing as the non-keeping of proper books ought to be made punishable at the discretion of some tribunal—do you think so?—Yes, I can only say that which has been my experience, and I suppose the experience of everybody who has had to do with bankruptcy, namely, that you never have a fraud without bad book-keeping, and bad book-keeping is very strong evidence of fraud, although you may not be able to carry it further and prove the fraud. That a man should be made liable to prosecution for the non-keeping of books I would not like to go so far as to say, but I think the making away with books ought to be made a criminal offence.

6458. (Mr. Addison.) It is with us under the Debtors Act ?—Yes, so it is under the Debtors Act.

6459. Do you think that such a thing as trading with knowledge of insolvency, of course in a bad case, or speculating, should be made criminal offences ?—No, certainly not. I think every man in any big position goes on hoping against hope, and in nine cases out of ten no doubt he ought to close sooner than he does, but without any criminal intent he goes on hoping to pull himself through ; that is the experience I have had on that point.

6460. Do you, from what you have seen, comparing the systems in the two countries, think that it would be a good thing to provide that the debtor should be liable to come up and say what amount he has earned, if his discharge is refused, so as to get hold of some of his earnings for his creditors ?—Yes, I should certainly think so if his discharge is refused.

6461. Yes ; or suspended ?—That I have not thought of; certainly it would be a condition of suspension that he should bring up his after-acquired property.

6462. (Mr. Smith.) Is it usual to order him to render accounts ?—I should not say so.

6463. Is it usual in practice in granting a certificate of discharge to say that the debtor should continue to render accounts to the Official Assignee ?—There is Rule 244 of the English Court, which we adopt, that "when a bankrupt is discharged, subject to any condition, it shall be his duty, until such condition is satisfied, from time to time, to give the Official Assignee such information as he may require with respect to his after-acquired property, and not less than once a year to file with the Registrar a statement showing the particulars of any property or income he may have acquired subsequent to his discharge." I do not know whether that Rule is put in force here, but it is with us.

6464. (Mr. Smith.) I do not know that it is.

6465. (Chairman.) Not very much, I think. In practice is it quite easy to find a bankrupt ? Here he disappears into another name and you do not hear of him ? —No, he disappears into another State with us, but I think he would be found. You must remember the place is comparatively small. Although the area is large, the population is not.

6466. Are the provisions as to after-acquired property the same as they are here ?—The statutory provisions are the same, but I do not profess to be able to say under what circumstances the assignee of after-acquired property would get a good title. I think that is a matter that has been litigated quite recently.

6467. Do you think that would be a salutary change if a law were enacted so as to protect persons—subsequent creditors—who have given credit to an undischarged bankrupt ?—No. I do not think they ought to be protected—I cannot see why they should be protected. It is their business to find out whether the man is an undischarged bankrupt or not. They can easily find it out, I think. If it could be shown that they made every possible search, and the creditor had employed every means of finding out the identity of the man, that might be a different matter, but if you once offered a loophole you might not know where to stop, because it ought to be as difficult as possible for an uncertificated bankrupt to get a commercial living.

6468. According to the state of the decisions, there is a difference between personalty and realty here ?—Yes, there is.

6469. Do you think that is one that should continue to be observed ?—I would not like to say. I can only say that the decisions of the English Court are followed. The Privy Council have directed that the decisions of the Court of Appeal should be followed—that is, Trumble v. Hill in 3 App. Cas.

6470. Have you in the State of New South Wales any special provisions as to married women corresponding to our provisions ?—A married woman can be made bankrupt only in respect of her separate estate.

6471. Only of trading ?—No, it does not matter about trading, but in respect of her separate estate.

6472. Would she be subject to public examination and all that sort of thing ?—Yes.

6473. (Mr. Addison.) That is whether a trader or not ? —Whether a trader or not.

6474. (Chairman.) And whether living with her husband or not ?—And whether living with her husband or not.

6475. Is that under the Bankruptcy Act or the Married Women's Property Act ?—The Bankruptcy Act, Section 123 : "A bankruptcy petition may be presented by and against a married woman in respect of her separate estate."

6476. Have you the system of bankruptcy notice ?—Yes.

6477. Can that be presented against a married woman ? —I do not think that it can, but I would not like to answer that for certain. My impression is that it cannot be.

6478. Do you have the Scott and Morley form of judgment over there ?—Yes. My opinion is that a bankruptcy notice can be served on a married woman in New South Wales, but it is a long time since I have looked up the question.

6479. Do I understand from what you told us before that the system of deeds of assignment outside the Bankruptcy Court scarcely exists ?—This Act, in fact, was passed with the view of getting rid of deeds of assignment. We had the old law of 5 Victoria passed in 1842, which was founded on the then contemporary English law and practice. There was no control over the debtor. We had an Act authorising deeds of assignment, and any deeds of assignment which complied with the provisions of that Act took away the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court; but the thing became such an abuse that we went as far as ever we could in the direction of official control of estates, and I think we ought to go further still.

6480. Then on another subject, are the well-known hire-purchase agreements prevalent ?—Yes, they are prevalent.

6481. Are they subject to registration ?—I almost think they are, but it is quite a recent Act. They have not been, but, speaking subject to correction, I believe during the last year or two they have been. However, I cannot say for certain, because I have been away for two years or two years and a half.

6482. Are assignments of book debts subject to registration ?—The old equity rule applies to them that notice must be given to the Assignee, but there is nothing further than that. In that respect I think the law wants altering. I think every trade arrangement by which a debtor puts a portion of his assets out of the reach of the general body of creditors, if made when in insolvent circumstances, ought to be bad, and certainly any arrangement of that sort ought to be registered so that the creditor should have the opportunity of protecting himself by finding out what the position of the debtor was at the time that he made such assignment. There is one matter you mentioned with reference to married women. The only abuse we have had, or the particular abuse we have had, is, I suppose, one that you have had here, men giving large household allowances to their wives and the wives out of the savings of their household allowances buying property. I have never been able to see why a wife should not be jointly liable with her husband for her husband's debts in respect of all property she derives through her husband. Let her keep money she brings into settlement or money that she earns while she is a married woman, but any money she receives from her husband or during coverture from her husband it seems to me ought to be liable for the husband's debts, and until that is done I do not see how you are ever going to get over the abuse of the Bankruptcy Law.

6483. (Mr. Smith.) When you say that an assignment outside of the Bankruptcy Act is unusual, do you mean it would be illegal ?—It is an act of bankruptcy and can be taken advantage of by any creditor.

6484. But if it is not taken advantage of, would it become binding at any time ?—Yes, if every creditor joined in it.

6485. If no one objected to it ?—If no one objected to it.

6486. But it could be objected to if done in time ?— It might be objected to by a subsequent creditor, who could say that the property of the debtor had been put out of his reach, and then the property vested in the Official Assignee would be liable to repay that creditor; but if all the property is distributed then I apprehend nothing could be done.

6487. As a matter of fact, a debtor could make private arrangements with his individual creditors and get discharged from liability by compromising his debts ?—That would be an act of bankruptcy.

6488. It could be set aside ?—It could be set aside because the title of the Official Assignee would relate back to the act of bankruptcy.

6489. How far does it relate back ?—Six months. It is six months here, is it not.

6490. It is three now; it used to be six months ?—It is still six months with us.

6491. (Mr. Smith.) After that date it would become binding ?—Yes, it would if all the property comprised in the deed had been administered, but if there were any property not administered that would be an asset in the bankruptcy.

6492. With regard to the firms, I do not know whether I gathered correctly that there was practically a registration of names ?—Yes, the names of the real partners must be disclosed. It is particularly important where you have firms trading under trade names.

6493. Do you find that that system works well ?—Admirably, and has been most beneficial, and everybody recognises how valuable it has been.

6494. Is there a penalty for non-registration ?—Yes, a considerable penalty.

6495. Has any question ever arisen as to the application of the Statute to small cases. It has been suggested that in this country there are a great many small traders who would never dream of registering—such as costermongers and others ?—That might be left to the discretion of the Registrar.

6496. That is left to his discretion, I suppose, with you ?—Yes, the Registrar does not prosecute unless he finds there is reason to do so. He does not prosecute in trivial cases.

6497. And you think that that is sufficient protection ?—Certainly. I have never heard any difficulty suggested before.

6498. I think it is a theoretical objection to the system of registration, but it has been urged. Can you give us an idea of the annual number of bankrupts in New South Wales ?—About 400.

6505. (Mr. Smith.) What is the general sense of the community with regard to the working of this later Act—is it satisfactory ?—I think it has worked satisfactorily. There was a good deal of illfeeling when it first came into force, a feeling which I confess I shared, although I have completely changed my mind on the subject. The law of New South Wales always had been that any arrangement made by a person in insolvent circumstances within a certain time of sequestration which had the effect of preferring one creditor to another was voidable at the instigation of the official assignee. We tried to alter that by introducing the English practice that it must be made with intent to defeat and delay the creditors. Fortunately the Bankruptcy Judge, who had been trained in the old school, I must say twisted the Act to bring back the old system. Finally we have decided that the old system should prevail and it undoubtedly had the effect of stopping secret arrangements and preferential arrangements. Every one that was brought into court was upset and now the law is as follows—which is the most striking, most original, and most unusual feature of the Act—"Every alienation, transfer, gift, surrender, delivery, mortgage, or pledge of any estate or property, real or personal, every warrant of attorney or judicial proceeding made, taken, or suffered by a person being at the time insolvent or in contemplation of surrendering his estate under this Act or knowing that proceedings for placing the same under sequestration have been commenced, or within sixty days of the sequestration thereof, and, whether fraudulent or not having the effect in any such case of preferring any then existent creditor to another shall be absolutely void." That makes any attempt to give priority to one creditor, whether given in good faith or not, bad, and secure that whatever assets the bankrupt has had at least within sixty days of the sequestration shall belong to the general body of creditors.

6506. There can be no preference ?—All these metaphysical discussions about intent and motive which embarrass the English courts are gone. The only question is, has it had the effect of preferring, and if so it is bad.

6507. If a creditor receives money innocently under those circumstances it is somewhat hard on him ?—Yes, that is why there was an outcry against the Act—it is undoubtedly hard on him. I have known exceedingly hard cases, but I think in the interest of the general public it is good to have it.

6508. (Chairman.) I quite agree with you. I wish we had it here.

6509. (Mr. Addison.) About prosecutions; is there any power in the Bankruptcy Court itself to inflict any penalty or punishment ?—Only by affixing conditions to the certificate of discharge.

6510. A condition of payment ?—Yes.

6511. But it cannot fine or imprison—that must be brought before a proper criminal court ?—Yes. Of course, there is power to punish for contempt and sometimes the bankrupt is got at in that way.

6512. What is the position of a debtor who has not got his discharge ?—All his assets continue vested in the official assignee, except personal earnings, and he cannot incur credit beyond £20—that is a criminal offence—without disclosing that he is an undischarged bankrupt.

6513. Of course, if there are many undischarged bankrupt, that places these men in a very nondescript position ?—I do not think as a rule men would stop to come up for their discharge if they could get it.

6514. Are there relatively many undischarged bankrupts in New South Wales ?—I should not like to say, but I should not think so.

6515. Here it is considered by many rather a serious thing that the bankrupt goes into trade again in a different place and gets assets from subsequent persons who supply goods, or what not, who know nothing of the bankruptcy, and then that the trustee under the bankruptcy takes those away from him. You think that by searching and so forth the subsequent creditors might protect themselves ?—I think so. I think credit is given much too easily. I should like to see the statute of limitations very much reduced and obstacles put in the way of people getting credit.

6516. All these suggestions made about registering assignments of assets or of book debts are with a view of enabling credit to be given ?—Precisely; to be given safely or I should not say to be given, but to enable credit to be refused.

6517. If a married woman is made a bankrupt as regards her separate estate, are the consequences the same in her case as in another ?—In all respects the same, but I must say I have known of no instance of it being put in force.

6518. Of a married woman being made bankrupt ?—Yes. I do not say there have been none, but I do not recall any.

6519. I was going to ask you, if you knew of it, whether that might not be a means of putting pressure on the husband to pay his wife's debts ?—I have no doubt it would be; but why should it not be—why should not both be liable for each other's debts ?

6520. That is a nice question ?—And in that case there would be fewer swindling bankruptcies than there are.

6521. What is the system of payment of the official assignee ?—By a fixed salary and a percentage.

6522. The salary being paid out of— ?—The consolidated revenue.

6523. Is it found that the fees received are sufficient to cover the costs of working the Act?—There again I forgot to look that up, but I think they are—I will make a note of it.

6524. Then the legal costs, I suppose, are taxed?—Yes; the judge has power to award the official assignee a larger sum than the ordinary scale of remuneration where the case presents features of special trouble.

6525. I observe you said that the certificate of discharge was not necessarily a release of the estate?—Yes.

6526. I do not quite follow that—that is different to the system that we have?—The bankrupt's certificate of discharge may be granted and yet the estate may be administered by a committee of creditors under the court.

6527. Do you mean subsequent estate?—No, the estate that he had.

6528. The future estate which he might acquire would be free?—Yes, that is free. Power is given to the creditors to work out the estate themselves, but subject to the control of the court. It may be that the bankrupt would get his certificate of discharge, but the estate would not be released.

6529. By release you mean the closing of the administration, I suppose?—Yes.

6530. (Mr. Addison.) There is one subject which is not quite bankruptcy which I should like to be informed about—the registration of firms. Is there a central registration in Sydney?—Yes.

6531. For the whole colony?—For the whole colony.

6532. Are there any local registries in towns or places?—The Registrar-General who does the registering has branches in the county towns and I should imagine he would work through his agents there.

6533. If I live several hundreds of miles away from Sydney how do I find out?—I imagine that the Registrar-General through his officers throughout the country would find out.

6534. There would be no local means in each town of finding out?—No, there would not be, that is to say there is not a copy of the general register kept in every town—it is only kept in Sydney.

6535. There is not a separate register of the traders in each town?—No.

6536. Is there any provision that that should be renewed or revised annually or at other times?—Yes, I think it is done annually but I am not quite certain. I am almost certain that it is done annually but it may be a longer period.

6537. Is there an obligation on traders to register?—Yes.

6538. And to pay a fee every year?—A nominal fee it is but there is a heavy penalty if they omit to give the information. I was Attorney-General when the Act came into force and we had a great many cases where there had been omissions to comply with the Act. We only prosecuted in one case. We gave them reasonable time to comply with the Act.

6539. If a partner dies is there a communication to be made of the fact for the correction of the register?—Yes, I think so, but I am speaking only from memory.

6540. Do you think that there is any difficulty in keeping the register clear?—We have had the Act in force since 1900, I think. I was responsible for the administration of it for three and a half years and there was no trouble then and no complaint about it. I think if there had been any difficulties we should have heard complaints quickly with regard to them.

6541. I was a little anxious with reference to applying such a rule as that in this country because the register might become a very voluminous one?—The answer to that is that the Mercantile Agency and Trade Protection Societies find out the necessary information. I suppose no one searches for himself.

6542. They would not give information to the registrar. I am only suggesting this, that supposing a man who had traded as John Brown & Co. had died, what means are adopted for removing his name from the register?—His surviving partners would do that.

6543. But supposing there are none and that he was the sole man trading under that name, or suppose that man trading as John Brown & Co. goes out of the country as frequently happens here—how are you to rectify your register in such a case?—But if it were not rectified what harm would happen if a man were not trading?

6544. Except that we should get such a colossal register as well as a misleading register?—Of course all those problems are so much simpler in a small place.

6545. (Mr. Smith.) The annual registration would correct that?—Yes, that ought to do so—he ought to be struck off the list.

6546. (Mr. Addison.) However, I was anxious as you were here to get that from you but it is hardly within our province to recommend the registration of firms.

6547. (Chairman.) Only incidentally.

6548. (Witness.) It is not only firms who are registered in New South Wales but it is more important to register people going under trade names. Take a person who trades as "Velveteen, Limited." (I take this as an imaginary example.) It is most important that the general public should know who are the people trading as Mr. X. or Mr. Y. instead of knowing the firm only.

6549. (Mr. Richardson.) Can you tell us are there many prosecutions, and if so, the reasons for the prosecutions, and what are the usual punishments?—The punishments are from one to two years—I have not known of a sentence longer than two years.

6550. Are there a great many?—Not a great many—from one to four a year.

6551. What are the reasons which give rise to a prosecution?—Generally for making away with the property and concealing assets—that is almost invariably one of the offences charged, and also the doctoring of books to show assets or to conceal them. They generally lose their books when they come to town—they say that they are robbed of their cash—that is the general story.

6552. Does the official assignee always realise the assets?—Either he himself, or he himself with the aid of a trustee appointed by the creditors.

6553. He has a trustee?—If the creditors like to appoint one.

6554. A trustee who understands the business?—Yes; if the creditors like to appoint one they can appoint a trustee to work with him.

6555. The official assignee is simply the official to see that the assets are properly realised?—Yes, he is responsible to the court.

6556-7. Have you any knowledge of the general cost per cent. of the realisation of assets as compared with our system?—I am afraid that I only gave attention to the questions on the paper and that I did not look that up.

6558. Did I understand you with regard to the registration of firms to say that they have the names of the partners indicated on their premises?—They have somewhere on their premises.

6559. Somewhere where the traders who call upon them can see who are the partners?—Yes.

6560. Are they compelled to do that on their printed matter as well?—I do not think so—no, I am sure not.

6561. Not on their business papers?—No.

6562. But I understand you to say that you have the registration of assignments of book debts?—No, we have not.

6563. But it is your opinion that there should be registration of assignments of book debts?—Yes. I think every dealing with property should be registered.

6564. Where a debtor assigns book debts that assignment should be registered?—Yes. Any dealing with property in the way of security.

6565. (Chairman.) Is the Attorney-General in the State of New South Wales practically the same as the Public Prosecutor—does he do all that work with a staff?—He is both Public Prosecutor and grand juror.

The Hon. Bernhard R. Wise, K.C.

6566. And you have a regular official staff ?—Yes.

6567. Not like the Attorney-General here who is only a prominent member of the Par ?—No, the Attorney-General of New South Wales is an official who is responsible for the administration of justice.

6568. He appears, I suppose, only for the State ?—No, he is in general practice too. I would like to add that the most important thing in connection with our bankruptcy administration is the provision as to having the effect of preferring. That really makes the greatest change.

Mr. SAMUEL JAMES SEWELL, called; and Examined.

Mr. Samuel J. Sewell.

6569. (Chairman.) You are the Secretary for the Hire Traders' Association ?—Yes.

6570. I think that the evidence that you wish to furnish us with relates to the practice of letting out goods on hire or hire-purchase, and to the question, which has been referred to this Committee, as to whether it would be desirable, or necessary, that such agreements, either wholly or in part, should be subject to registration similar to that which prevails with bills of sale. The first question I should like to ask you is: what are the names of the associations whose views you have come here to give us, if you would kindly give us the important ones ?—The Agricultural Engineers' Association; the National Electrical Manufacturers' Association; the Musical Instrument Trade Protection Association; the Furnishers' Chamber of Trade; the Institute of British Carriage Manufacturers; the Society of Motor Manufacturers; the Cycle Trades Association; the Saddlers' and Harness Makers' Association; and the Washing Machine Makers' Association.

6571. Are those associations all affiliated to the Hire Traders' Protection Association ?—Not strictly speaking, but they co-operate with us on this occasion.

6572. What are the constituents of your Association ? Are they firms or companies ?—Firms who do that class of business.

6573. Are they firms of all kinds of trades ?—Yes.

6574. I mean the furniture trade, and so on ?—Mostly furniture and musical instrument firms.

6575. Can you give the Committee any notion of the amount of capital that is embarked in the trades for which you claim to speak ?—My Committee, after carefully considering this question, came to the conclusion that the amount involved in the manufacture of articles dealt with on hire system lines is about £100,000,000 sterling. Certain details are set out in a letter which was sent to your Committee.

6576. I have it before me. Can you at all state approximately the number of traders or the trades that use this system ?—Yes; approximately there are thirty trades who use the system extensively.

6577. Can you give at all approximately the number of traders ?—We reckon about 40,000 traders are interested in this question.

6579. That, I think, brings me to the question on which we wish particularly to hear you, which is this: We have had evidence before us that it would be desirable, in the public interest and the interests of trade, that hire purchase agreements should be subject to registration either wholly, or those in which the purchase price is over a certain particular amount. As I understand, your Association wishes to present us views in opposition to that proposal ?—That is so.

6580. Perhaps you would state your views ?—My Association considers that registration would seriously interfere with trade. A number of the thirty trades interested in this question are interested to the extent of over 80 per cent. of the business they do. The statistics collected by the Musical Instrument Trade Protection Association some years ago showed, I think the figure was, that 82 per cent. of the trade done by musical instrument dealers in this country was done on the hire system. We are of opinion that musical instrument dealers who do business to that large extent on hire terms would have that business very seriously curtailed; and the same remark applies to many other trades. In the furniture trade it is becoming an increasing practice for furniture dealers, instead of selling their furniture on credit, where the property passes, to sell it on hire terms in order to preserve to themselves the property until the last instalment is paid. In fact, the old system of credit in connection with furniture is almost obsolete at the present time. Then there are a number of trades supplying plant for manufacturing purposes, printing and agriculture to mention two only, trades which, to a very large extent to-day depend upon the hire system as their plan of trading; and those firms would find their trade very seriously curtailed, because there is no doubt that the public, if they had the fact registered that they had goods on the hire system, would not want to have those goods. Possibly you might say: If they cannot pay for them it is better they should not have them; but we must remember that those people have needs which can be satisfied at the present time by the hire system, because it gives to the trader comparative immunity from loss, and enables him, therefore, to have manufactures produced in this country and transfer them to persons who require those manufactures, which means work for the people at large; and I think if you weigh that against the possibility of credit being given because of visible possession, I think you must see at once of the two evils it is far better to let these agreements go on unregistered than that they should be registered with the certain curtailment of trade which would follow. I should like, if I may be permitted, to read a few letters which I have received. I have written to several of the largest manufacturers in the country, in some eight or nine trades, to ask their views; they are given very tersely.

6581. Certainly, read them if you kindly will ?—Perhaps they are more efficacious than statements by myself. This is one from Crossley Brothers, the gas engine makers, who are in a very large way of business: "We are greatly concerned to learn that the Board of Trade is interesting itself in favour of registration of hire agreements. The passing of such an Act would prove a serious matter to the whole of the hire traders, and we shall certainly support you in your objection." I have a letter from, I believe, the largest makers of stationary engines in this country, but they ask that their name should not be disclosed. I do not know whether, in the circumstances, I should read the letter.

6582. Read it, please?—They say: "We quite agree that any such registration would be detrimental to the sale of any machinery under such agreement. We strongly oppose the idea as we are convinced that our many friends who prefer this method of doing business would, in consequence, object to doing the business at all and thus militate against the sale of our engines." Then the Linotype Company say: "With reference to the suggested registration of hire agreements, as hire agreements enter very largely into our particular business, we are convinced that compulsory registration would seriously injure us." Then a firm of billiard-table makers say this: "Would be the death blow to many large business firms in this country, businesses would have to be considerably reduced and many thousands of people would be thrown out of employment. At the present time we consider that 50 per cent. of the small home billiard tables are sold on the instalment system, and we should think even in the billiard world alone £1,000,000 of capital is employed in England. The public would not consent to have their agreements registered, and it would kill the trade entirely." The Yost Typewriter Company say: "We beg to state that in our opinion the registration of hire agreements, as is now done with bills of sale, would be detrimental to the typewriter trade. The existence of a bill of sale, as you are well aware, is prejudicial to a man's credit, and the majority of respectable firms, we are convinced, would rather go without a typewriter at all than buy on credit and have the fact of their having done so registered and made public. We are strongly opposed to this scheme and trust that the action you are taking in the matter will be crowned with success." The Liddell Engineering Company, manufacturers of laundry machinery, say: "In reply to your letter we are of opinion that the registration of hire-purchase agreements would be very detrimental, and in fact would practically put a stop to this class of trade, which is very useful in a large number of cases, particularly to small people who are just starting in business, and who are not prepared to pay for their plant cash down." There is a similar letter from Bradford & Company, who are in the same line of business; they say: "Not only shall we be the sufferers, but these customers also, who are usually laundrymen starting business on a small capital." Then there is one from the Singer Sewing Machine Company: "Having noted that your Association are appearing before the Board of Trade Committee on the subject of the registration of hire agreements as bills of sale, we would like to say that our opinion is that such registration would work a great hardship on a large number of people, in that it would of necessity greatly restrict this line of business. The classes most affected in our business would be the dressmakers, tailors, bootmakers, etc., as well as the tens of thousands of working women who use the sewing machine as a partial means of support and as an aid to them in reducing the expense of clothing themselves and their families. These are all people of small means who are unable, with the best will in the world, to pay for a sewing machine or other article of like character in cash. There are a very large number of people engaged in this trade, we alone (and there are many others) employ over 5,000 people in our selling organisation. The number of people employed in manufacturing the machines in this country is over 12,000. To place restrictions on a trade of these dimensions, and to add expense and complications to the sale of machines to the people of the classes mentioned above, and who constitute three-quarters of the purchasers of our machines, would to our mind only be justified under the most extreme necessity. We regret that we are unable to see any advantage if registration is required, and believe that while acting to the prejudice of a large and important trade, and to the injury of a class of the working population deserving all the help possible, it would afford absolutely no protection to the minority it might presumably be designed to protect, and who, as far as our experience goes, would not avail themselves of this protection nor would they wish to do so." Then there is one from Jones' Sewing Machine Company: "I beg to say that I have brought this matter under the notice of my directors, and they desire me to say that they have given it very serious and anxious consideration, and they will be glad if you can state that it is their deliberate and unanimous opinion that such registration would be most prejudicial and very injurious to our business. We do, as you know, a very large business with hire purchasers, and a great number of our clients we are convinced would not sign hire agreements if they had to be registered, and we could not accept the responsibility attached to the trade without such agreements, so that this trade would be lost to us in case of registration. Under present conditions many persons are enabled to make a start, and we can point to thousands of persons who have made such a start and become successful traders. We should, therefore, in every way we can, oppose any registration of hire agreements." I should like, with your permission, to read one or two paragraphs from letters from traders' organisations which I have received. The Washing Machine Makers' Association say: "This association very strongly objects to hire-purchase agreements being registered as bills of sale and fully concurs with the position taken up by your Association in the matter." The Secretary of the National Electrical Manufacturers' Association writes: "On behalf of my association I have no hesitation in saying that such registration would be highly detrimental to the electrical industry." The Cycle and Motor Trades Association: "I have made full inquiries from the members of the association and they are of opinion, and some of them very strongly, that the registration of hire-purchase agreements would have a very serious effect on the cycle trade, as a very respectable class of people purchase bicycles in this way. You have the authority of this association to state that they are opposed to any alteration of the law. The benefit which might be derived from registration would be more than counterbalanced by the enormous loss of trade which would follow, there being a great number of people of some social position who now purchase goods in this way who would decline to do so if their names as hirers were published." The Musical Instrument Trades' Protection Association says that their council have come to the very definite conclusion that any such regulation would be very detrimental to the pianoforte trade. The Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders, Limited, state that they are opposed to the registration of those agreements as bills of sale. The Institute of British Carriage Manufacturers say that such a step would not be acceptable. The Saddlers' and Harness Makers' Employers' Association state that they are of opinion that the registration of hire agreements as bills of sale would be very detrimental to their trade.

6583. Have you considered the question of whether some of those classes of objections might be met by confining registration, as bills of sale are confined, to agreements the subject of which is, say, over £30?—Two or three firms, the sewing machine and washing machine firms, would be exempt if the limit were £30, because the value of the goods would be below that.

6584. (Mr. Peat.) Not in every case with regard to sewing machines?—Not sewing machines installed in a factory; there they would not be exempt—but sewing machines for domestic purposes would be.

6585. (Chairman.) It is perhaps right to point out to you that one of the arguments that has been presented to us in favour of the registration is that when debtors get judgments against them and execution is sought to be levied on their goods, it is discovered that all the goods are on the hire-purchase system and are swept away by the lender, who reserves possession of the goods and keeps the instalments of hire hitherto paid, and perhaps lets the goods out again, so that both the execution creditor and the hirer are to the bad?—I do not know that the hirer is to the bad, to use your own phrase, because the competition in this class of business is as great as it is in the cash class, and the rate of instalments to-day is a very small one indeed; in fact, the amounts, I believe, range from 1s. to 2s. 6d. a week for £10 worth of goods, and you could not lend on simple hire, without any question of purchase following, those goods on less instalments; so that I do not think if the goods are swept away the hirer as a rule has lost anything. He has had the use of the goods, and the amount he has paid would be no more than would have been charged had he hired them without the option of purchase. As to the execution creditor, I fail to see, having regard to the magnitude of the trade, how a register would be of any advantage. We consider there are upwards of 2,000,000 agreements entered into annually. Let us take the figure at 2,000,000, and assume, if you like, that, if the limit were placed at £30, 50 per cent. of such agreements would not be affected. That leaves us with 1,000,000. Now, one of two things would happen; either that class of trade would be killed or materially reduced, which would mean a reduction in the need for labour, which would mean a great reduction in the amount of business done, or, if that did not happen, there is the objection to the register. What about a register containing a million names; what use would it be? Look at the work involved in keeping it.

6586. If I may interrupt you, it has been pointed out, in answer to questions whi h I have put, that the work would not be very great, that the existing machinery of registration is in such good order that that would not be a very serious matter?—I take it that you could not keep a register in every town. You could not keep duplicates or copies of that register, but one of my colleagues here to-day has come prepared, should you see fit to hear him, on that particular point. Having conferred with all the trade protection societies, Stubbs' and Kemp's and people of that character, he is prepared to give their views on the keeping of that register. He is more competent to speak on that point than I am.

6587. (Mr. Chamberlin.) When you say all the protection societies, Stubbs and so on, does that include all the protection societies in England?—No. I will withdraw the word "all." I did not mean to be so comprehensive.

6588. (Chairman.) As regards the objection on the part of people to registering, do you think that the fact that a person is known to have taken goods on hire is at all the same sort of thing to its being known that he has given a bill of sale? Being known to have given a bill of sale means that he has borrowed money, but the other means that he is paying it?—I think there is a fundamental difference between them: it seems to me that a hire agreement is evidence of improved financial condition, whereas the other is evidence of an impaired financial condition.

6589. Then why should the hire purchaser object to his name being public?—I should have an objection, it is somewhat difficult to state why, but I should not care for the world to know that I had had goods on the hire system. I think it is just a trait in human nature that is somewhat difficult to express, but I certainly should refuse to have goods on the hire-purchase terms if my name were to be registered.

6590. (Mr. Peat.) It implies that you could not purchase them?—That is what I should be afraid of.

6591. (Chairman.) Is it the fact, or is it not, that the price is much increased to the hire purchaser by using a hire-purchase agreement?—I should say not materially. There are a number of firms advertise, and I have no reason to suppose they do not act up to their advertisements, that 5 per cent. is added to the price.

6592. (Mr. Richardson.) Before the hire-purchase system was established, I apprehend there was as much trade done as there is now, was there not?—As much trade done?

6593. As much trade in proportion to population: the hire-purchase system has only been in vogue thirty or forty years?—I should think that the comforts the working classes had then were not so numerous as they are to-day, that is to say, the working classes had not a piano, they had not a mangle, they had not a sewing machine; so that I should think that the hire-purchase system, owing to the facility which that means in the transfer of goods, has added to the comforts of the working classes, and therefore has increased the trade. I should say that trade has increased.

6595. Have you considered the question from the point of view of the dealers in perishable articles?—Yes.

6596. Do you not think that the traders who have non-perishable articles in having the hire-purchase system are getting an advantage over the other traders in the country?—I do not think so.

6597. They have no means of hire purchase for their perishable goods; and do you not think that thirty or forty years ago there was in proportion I suppose as much credit given then as there is to-day in trade, that the dealers in furniture allowed their furniture to go out on credit just as much in proportion as they do to-day?—I cannot, of course, speak to that period, forty years ago, but I should think that the trader in articles of consumption, the butcher and the baker, knows for a fact that a very large percentage of the people in his district have goods on the hire system, and does not take visible possession to necessarily represent ownership. I should take that to be so.

6598. How would he be likely to know?—I take it that the average trader should assume, and he is entitled to assume, that because a person wanting credit of him possesses furniture of value in his house, it does not follow that the furniture can be taken under execution to satisfy that trader's debt. What about marriage settlements and things of that kind? There is no registration of them.

6599. (Mr. Peat.) Is it your experience that business of this class has in recent years been steadily increasing?—It has tremendously increased.

6600. Of recent years?—Yes.

6601. I am not quite sure that you expressed an opinion, but the services of large numbers of men would be found unnecessary if by registration this class of trade was interfered with; is that your opinion?—Undoubtedly.

6602. And possibly considerable capital would become unnecessary or obsolete: is that your opinion?—Yes; we reckon that half a million people engaged in various trades would be affected by anything of this nature which is calculated to curtail trade.

6603. Do you mean they would be affected prejudicially?—Absolutely.

6604. Will you kindly tell me, if you find (and perhaps if you have the experience you will answer the question) that where heavy articles, machinery, and that class of goods, are let on hire, the price to the hirer is substantially increased, or increased to any extent, as compared with a sale for cash in a month or three months?—It is obvious that the trader must make a charge for the capital which is out, I mean interest on his money, but in my view the price charged for goods—you are dealing particularly with heavy machinery?

6605. Yes?—I do not think it exceeds a reasonable charge for interest on the capital laid out in that way.

6606. Do I understand your answer to mean that, as compared with a sale for cash, a sale on the hire purchase system only allows for the reasonable interest on the capital which the trader stands out of?—I think you can fairly put it that way, because there is such competition. The people who do a hire trade have no more immunity from competition than those who do a cash trade. The competition is so great that I believe that must tend to keep prices down to little more than a cash basis.

6607. Would you tell me, if you have the experience, what proportion of hire purchase agreements become terminated in consequence of the bankruptcy of the hirer or of execution being levied on his property?—Very few.

6608. You told me there are 2,000,000 of such agreements in a year?—Yes.

6609. Have you any means by which you can tell me whether it is 1 per cent., 2 per cent., or ½ per cent. of those agreements which become affected by bankruptcy or execution?—No, I have no data.

6610. Would you be prepared to hazard an estimate?—I do not think so; it would be too much of a hazard. I believe our solicitor, Mr. Tudor, whom I believe you have already had before you, is better able to answer that question. He deals with that side of the business; I deal with the commercial side.

6611. (Mr. Addison.) Are you speaking of hire purchase agreements, or do you include simple hiring agreements?—We were dealing with hire purchase agreements, hiring with the option to purchase.

6612. Have you any means of knowing what percentage of hire purchase agreements are not carried into effect in the way of completion?—I have made many inquiries of traders on that question, and the highest I have ever heard that put at was 10 per cent. not carried into effect, and about the lowest was 2½ per cent. I think if you strike the mean there, it would be about right.

6613. And it may vary with the trade?—Yes.

6614. You are speaking probably of the furniture trade?—I am speaking of articles generally. I should think if you put it at 5 per cent. it would be as high as it ought to be.

6615. In the heavy machinery trade and so on, do you know what the percentage would be?—I should not put that any higher. You mean plant?

6616. Yes; the percentage of contracts not carried out would be small?—Yes. That is a matter that is of a somewhat delicate nature; when dealing with individual firms you cannot very well ask a man that question, but I have got answers from a number of traders and I should say you would take it at 5 per cent. at the outside. That means all classes of returned goods I am dealing with, not only bankruptcy. Was your question with regard to bankruptcy only?

6617. No, not carried out through want of power to perform?—Where it does not ripen into a complete sale?

6618. Yes?—I should say it would not exceed 5 per cent.

6620. It may be possible that in watering places where there are lodging houses, the possession of a good house of furniture may be some indication to a local tradesman?—It might be so were it not for the fact that boarding-house keepers perhaps more than any other class of the public have goods on the hire system. I think traders know that.

Mr. Samuel J. Sewell.

6621. It is notorious that a lodging-house keeper has goods on the hire system?—Yes.

6622. (Chairman.) I ought to have asked you one other question. One class who have, to put it tersely, rather attacked the hire purchase system are the sheriff's officers and county court bailiffs. I will tell you exactly of what they complain. They complain that a warrant is put into their hands for execution: they go and levy, and then not only do they get nothing but run the risk of an action against them. There was recently one action which was successful. They, therefore, rather urge that there should be some kind of publicity by which they could possibly be protected. Have you considered it from that point of view at all?—Of course that scarcely enters into my department of the association's work: that would come more within the solicitor's class of work, but what troubles me about the matter is this. Let us assume, for a moment, that registration is not objectionable and you have got your register and you have it in London. Obviously the mercantile gazettes could not give these million names and no one would care to duplicate them: therefore, they have to communicate with London. A bailiff's officer is not going to delay attending to his duties what time he is inquiring in London whether A. B. has or has not goods on the hire system. It seems to me that that class of people would not be benefited at all. I think they are asking for something which would not benefit them and which would certainly be detrimental to trade on the whole. Of course there are such things as removal from one part of the country to another, and then they would be in another county court district.

6623. I observe in the Memorandum that you sent to us that you refer to the county court returns. I am not quite sure exactly to what point you were directing your remarks. You say you found that in 1900 the plaintiffs won in ninety-nine cases out of 100, and that the average value of their judgments was only 11s. in the £. What inference would you draw from that?—My point is this, that the average furniture dealer cannot safely do to-day a trade on instalments of the out-and-out sale type; he is forced to adopt the hire system rather than the out-and-out sale. That is the point I wish to make upon that.

Mr. John Allpass, called; and Examined.

6624. (Chairman.) I think you are managing director of Hastings, Limited?—Yes.

6625. And that you are the representative of various trades interested in the hire-purchase system?—Yes.

6626. May I ask what is the business of Hastings, Limited?—Furnishers, piano dealers, sewing machine dealers, mangle dealers, practically everything sold on the hire system except heavy machinery.

6627. I see your address is Falcon Road, Clapham Junction?—Yes.

6628. Have you branches in other parts of the country?—Yes, in different parts of London.

6629. Does your company do a large business?—Yes, there are some larger, of course, but we do an extensive business. We have eight shops at Clapham Junction.

6630. Are the class of hire-purchase agreements that you deal in for large amounts? When I say the amount, I mean the ultimate purchase price?—They vary, anything from a sovereign to £200.

6631. I hope it is not too delicate a question to ask you, but is the difference in price between the cash price and the credit or hire-purchase price a large one?—No.

6632. What do you consider are the objections to introducing a system by which some classes of hire-purchase agreements should be compulsorily registered?—I am strongly of opinion that any scheme of registration of hire purchase contracts would be highly detrimental to the different trades interested, and in most cases simply ruinous, and further that if registration were helpful it should have been asked for many years ago, and not by enforcing it on the trade now that many millions and in some cases the entire fortunes of traders are embarked in business on the hire system. My reasons for maintaining that registration would cause great injury or ruin to traders are as follows:—(A) The public do not wish their private affairs made public property, or their neighbours to know what their private transactions are about. Indeed they are so sensitive with regard to it being known that they have goods on the hire system, that I have on several occasions known persons raise objections to even a hire agreement being stamped at Somerset House on the ground that people would know that they had goods on the hire system. What would be the feelings of such people on being invited to have their private affairs made the subject of inquiry in a public register, an abstract of which would be lodged in the district office in which they lived or carried on business? (B) It would be worth the dealer's while, rather than register to chance his goods being claimed by the trustee in bankruptcy, and in that case, his goods would be forfeited to pay someone else's debt, although he had been guilty of no fault or negligence owing to the hire system being so well known, but even then my opinion is that the public could not be persuaded that the agreement would not be registered if a register was in existence. (C) Although the register might be of some use to a creditor for giving or withholding credit, its use would not be of sufficient value to justify the expense and hardship and loss incurred by a system of registration on those who do business on such lines. (D) Any system of registration would involve not only the register of 8,000,000 contracts, if 2,000,000 be the approximate number of contracts entered into annually, but also of other documents such as marriage settlements, book debts, etc., and would make such a register quite impracticable, for it would be of no use to register the one class of property unless all. An incomplete register would be absolutely futile. If visible possession entitle to credit, then goods on simple hire or on approval must be registered, as well as articles on hire, with option to purchase. Then assuming that a trap, a bicycle, or a costermonger's barrow, if let out on hire with option must be registered, ought one let out on hire only for six months or a couple of hours to be exempt? If a piano on hire with option is liable, should one let out on hire only for six months or only for the evening be exempted? Supposing that a cooking stove or oven let by the gas company with option requires registration, why should one on simple hire from the gas company, or let with the house by the landlord, be exempt? Ought not every landlord who lets a house furnished to register? And if so, why should a tenant who lets a room furnished be exempt? Every house being bought through a building society would clearly require registration; but, if so, why should houses let on ordinary rental be exempted? Surely the person buying his house is more worthy of credit than the person simply hiring it.

6633. It was not suggested there should be anything registered but hire-purchase agreements of chattels, not real property; houses are quite a different thing?—With regard to the number of hire purchase contracts which culminate in a purchase I should say they are not less than 90 per cent. That leaves a difference of 10 per cent. which I can practically explain later if you wish it. As to the policy of the hire system, it is the only method by which a person can safely part with expensive property unless cash be paid. In this way a home or business can be built up, and it enables people to apply their capital in more directions than they otherwise could if they had to pay the full sum for the goods they require. It enables workmen or seamstresses to become the owners of the tools of trade they use and gradually to set up a business for themselves. Many large concerns are started by the owner being able to procure his first machinery on hire. I will give you one case of a man who thirty-five years ago secured a sewing machine on the hire system from the Singer Company, by paying 10s. deposit and 1s. 6d. per week. This man, with his wife, were hard workers and thrifty. The machine was used for making shirts, and so successful was the start that a second machine was bought on the same system, and subsequently others, which enabled him to work up one of the largest businesses as a shirt manufacturer in South London. It is, of course, notorious that hotels and boarding houses and lodging-house keepers furnish their places on this system, to the mutual advantage of themselves, the dealer and the public, and, of course, furniture, etc., in private houses is never seen by the creditor, so cannot influence him in giving credit. To set up, therefore, any scheme of registration would be to cause grievous injury not only to hire traders but to the persons they employ, the persons from whom they purchase goods and the hiring public generally. Many householders would be compelled to revert to the old practice of taking furnished apartments instead of easily securing their own and at the same time saving money. For instance, a house at Southfields let empty at 14s. 6d. per week inclusive is let furnished at £1 15s. per week, thus £1 0s. 6d. is paid weekly for the use of the furniture. The house could be furnished on the hire system for £100. In less than two years, at £1 0s. 6d. per week, the furniture would become the property of the hirer. Without the hire system the tenant would have no right at all in the goods. On the ordinary terms of the hire system, these goods would be supplied at 13s. per week; thus the hirer would save 7s. 6d. per week and at the same time become the owner under three years. I have made enquiries of several agents re furnished and unfurnished houses and flats, and have had the furniture inspected so as to get at the value, and in most cases the difference in favour of the hire system is greater than the one I have given. I do not think registration would help high bailiffs or sheriffs, and in my experience very few actions are brought against them. I have never brought such an action. With regard to innocent purchasers, these are few, inasmuch as when a hirer absconds he generally leaves no trace of himself or of the goods; the purchaser, therefore, is very seldom brought to book. The registration of bills of sale is of advantage to borrower and lender and injures neither the parties nor the public, whereas the registration of hire-purchase agreements would be disadvantageous to both, and would be of little value to the general creditor even if it could be worked. A bill of sale is direct evidence of poverty, not so hire-purchase contracts. This is not a case of conflicting facts. We interfere with nobody, we injure no one else's buisness, we merely ask to be let alone. Any register would have to be kept up to date, and this would involve someone being under obligation to make the necessary entries such as agreements terminated by hirer returning goods, or goods taken under a distress for rent, or completed by purchase and so on. Who is to be made responsible for these entries and what justification have you to inflict a penalty on the dealer for not keeping the register up to date? No one else could be so bound.

6634. I see you say that those which culminated in a purchase are not less than 90 per cent. Is that allowing 10 per cent. for those in which the instalments are not kept up, or in which there is execution, or in some other way it is terminated?—Yes, the 10 per cent. would be made up by agreements being terminated by the landlord seizing our goods for rent; others, in case of death where a certain percentage of the amount is unpaid, the agreement is cancelled and the goods presented to the next of kin; others would be runaways.

Mr. JOHN CARRINGTON, called; and Examined.

8 May, 1907.

6635. (Chairman) I believe you represent the Midland Furnishing Company, carrying on business in Judd Street, Euston Road?—Yes.

6636. Is that a large company?—A very large company, and I am also here in the interests of other firms.

6637. Chiefly in the furnishing trade?—Chiefly in the furnishing trade.

6638. You have heard what Mr. Sewell and Mr. Allpass have told us, and we should not want to ask you to repeat anything of that, but the question I should rather like to ask is one to which I think you have particularly devoted attention, and that is the question of the practicability of registration?—That is so.

6639. Perhaps you would just tell us your views on that?—The principal trade protection societies say they would not attempt to print a gazette of registered hiring agreements; the work and cost would be too great, the weekly volume too large, and the task next to an impossibility, and subscribers would never pay the price it would cost. I, on April 11th of this year, was making special inquiries from the principal trade-protection societies, and on that day I went to Messrs. Stubbs, Gresham Street, and interviewed a gentleman who, I believe, was their manager, Mr. M'Kenna, who said if all hiring agreements were to be registered it would positively be valueless as regards any protection to traders; the number would be so great that the keeping and entering of the same would be almost too enormous, even if a Government Department were set aside for it, and certainly as regards making a weekly gazette of same, it would be absolutely impossible; and he also said if there were a barrier like bills of sale, and hiring agreements were registered above a certain amount, he still could not see how they could issue a weekly register. On that I made a remark that without a weekly register in the gazette it would no doubt be valueless. On the following day I interviewed Mr. J. H. Hadwen, the Secretary to the London Association for Protection of Trade, Berners Street, W., and also the Secretary to the Association of Trade Protection Societies of the United Kingdom. I asked him his views as regards registering hiring agreements, and he said at once that it would be a very vast and expensive business and positively of almost absolute uselessness. No trade-protection society could keep a record of same or issue a weekly gazette, and it would be a serious injury to the commerce of the country, and ruination as to the employment of many thousands of people. He further was good enough to tell me that a motion that came before the Association of Trade Protection Societies in 1904 to register hire agreements or, as an alternative, to affix labels to hired goods, was beaten by an overwhelming majority as to both movements. Mr. Hadwen was then good enough to point out how little registration would be of any use to the general tradesmen, for the reason, he said, that they had any number of subscribers who made use of their debt-collecting department; and often a subscriber would come to them and say: "I want you to collect this debt." The society would then look the debtor's name up on their books, and say to the subscriber: "Whatever made you trust this man? If you had come to us, with your privilege as subscriber, we could at once have told you the man was not worth trusting with twopence"; and the subscriber generally answers: "Oh, I did not give you a thought." No, it is not that the subscribers did not give a thought, but the fact that competition is so great that they are over anxious to do business, and when they can get information by the asking, they do not. I next went to Kemp's Mercantile Agency and Inquiry Office, Cannon Street, and saw their manager, Mr. Batten, who at once said registration would be so cumbersome that it would be absolutely useless. I then went to Messrs. Perry, Bush Lane, Cannon Street, one of the largest trade-protection societies, and saw their secretary, Mr. L. R. Hockridge, and his opinion was that registration would be a disastrous and serious blow to the commerce of the country; it would so injure thousands of respectable tradesmen that it would mean bankruptcy to many and take away privileges the millions enjoy. The registration would do harm instead of good, and for mercantile purposes would be valueless. As regards the issuing of a weekly gazette, he said it would absolutely be impossible. I then went to Daniel's Mercantile Agency, Abchurch Yard, E.C., and saw Mr. George Daniel; he has been connected with mercantile agencies all his life, and said registration of hiring agreements would be unfair and unreasonable to those people wishing to purchase in this manner, and would interfere with the just rights of the public, and would be absolutely useless as regards being of value to those traders not in the hire trade, and that a weekly gazette could not be published. Those are the principal people I saw.

6640. I think on the other points your memorandum rather coincides with those of other witnesses?—Yes, I would have liked to have pointed out one particular point which came before me, as regards when there was a registered bill of sale. I should like to bring to your notice something actually within my knowledge that occurred about the year 1901 or 1902. A certain man had a large hotel in a fashionable quarter in London. He was financed by a person to whom he gave a bill of sale for £5,000 over the furniture and effects. The man became bankrupt, and many tradesmen in the neighbourhood proved for very large amounts, including one firm who proved for over £400 for grocery and fruit, notwithstanding that there was a registered bill of sale, showing that competition is so great that firms would rather face risks and do the trade, and that registration does not deter the trader from giving credit.

Mr. JOHN HENRY COCKBURN, called; and Examined.

6641. (Chairman.) You are a member of the firm of Parker Rhodes and Co., Rotherham, solicitors?—I am. We are solicitors for some of the principal waggon companies in England, and we also are solicitors for some of the principal colliery proprietors between Leeds and Leicester, all in the Midland coalfields, which are very important just now because they are comparatively new. It so happens that the principal objection to this proposition would come from colliery owners. The way in which it is objectionable to the waggon companies would be this. They would suffer in that it would deter colliery proprietors and iron manufacturers from taking waggons on hire; therefore the waggon companies are indirectly interested, whereas the colliery proprietors would be directly affected by it; and I am quite sure they would have a strong objection to having these agreements registered as bills of sale, because it suits them so well to hire these large numbers of waggons on the hire-purchase system; it allows them, instead of paying for 500 waggons in one year, which might happen to be a bad year in the trade, to spread the payments over a number of years. It is one of the incidents of the coal trade that it fluctuates. There is a boom now and then which makes up for a number of bad years, so that this system is admirably suited to them. It is the policy of the colliery owners not to call up more capital than is necessary; they like to keep their capital low and pay for these things out of the full years which come now and then. I was going to suggest if you would also allow someone representing the colliery companies to speak, it would be of extreme value, because it would be they who would be affected rather than the waggon companies who do business with them. I may say that so far as rolling stock (including locomotives and waggons) is concerned, there was an Act passed in 1872, which exempts those things from liability for distress for rent, and there is a very notorious usage with regard to railway waggons, that they do not belong to the trader. I think I may go so far as to say it may be safely assumed that those who trust colliery proprietors or iron manufacturers know that the waggons do not belong to them. It is so well known that they do not assume that the waggons belong to the colliery companies.

6642. (Mr. Addison.) Are the waggons that you refer to lent on the hire-purchase system or on simple hire?—Nearly always hire purchase, with a view to spreading the cost over a period of years. Not only is it the custom with colliery companies not to buy railway waggons, but many do not build their own cottages; they prefer to take them on lease, because they do not want to call up more capital than is necessary; they like to pay a big dividend now and then, so it suits them admirably not to buy. In fact, I may say that the old colliery companies which are near the end of their existence own railway waggons to a greater extent than new companies which are full of life and vigour; there has been a period of years during which they have acquired them; so registration would give a false impression. It would look as though the old concerns were sound and the new and enterprising and vigorous ones were not sound.

Mr John H. Cockburn.

6643. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Have you any knowledge at all as to what the difference in price would be?—I do not think it makes the slightest difference. I do not think anyone pays more for a waggon because he takes it on the hire-purchase system. There is a not at all unreasonable rate of interest charged. It is like this: when a man is a colliery proprietor he expects to make—I will not tell you the rate of profit—but a good round thing, because of the risks and fluctuations. The rate of interest he pays for his waggons is very much less than what he earns; therefore it suits him; it is a financial convenience to him to have them on the hire-purchase system, because he makes profit out of it. I am sure that some of these great colliery concerns which are thoroughly sound would strongly object to having their names in such a list.

6644. (Mr. Addison.) The names of the collieries are put on the waggons?—Yes, the names of the collieries are always painted on in large letters.

6645. Is there any indication on the waggon that it is the property of the waggon company?—Yes, there is always the name plate there to show that it is the property of the waggon-owning company.

6646. Until paid for?—Yes.

6647. So that the waggon has the name of the colliery upon it?—Yes. It is usual to put the name of the waggon-owning company on an iron plate, and the name of the colliery which hires them is painted in large letters; the colliery company likes to show that it has 1,000 or 2,000; it suits them very well. I may say, so far as concerns the protection of traders, it is the custom in most collieries to pay once a month ; there is no great length of credit taken or required.

6648. Anyone who sees a waggon can tell if it belongs to a waggon-owning company ?—You look at the side or end of the waggon to see whether it is owned or hired. If you see a little plate, that is an indication that it is a hired waggon.

6649. (Mr. Chamberlin.) In the same way, there are hundreds of vans about the streets of London which bear the name of a firm on them, but they are the property of some company which has let them out ?—I may tell you that we in Yorkshire have been greatly troubled this present spring because the railway companies themselves have not enough locomotives to haul the traffic ; therefore the railway companies could not find the requisite rolling stock, and it would be a great disaster if we had to hire from railway companies. They could not do it all. They want to keep their capital as low as they can, and so it would be a serious thing, and would obviously dislocate trade, if waggons were not hired in this way.

6650. (Mr. Peat.) Will you tell me what capital is engaged in that particular waggon building and hiring trade ?—I am not in possession of that information, I am speaking more in the name of the colliery companies. I cannot say myself, but I think there are some in the room better able to tell you than I am.

6651. Can you tell me the average number of years for which you hire waggons ?—Five to seven years ; but there, again, those who are in the waggon trade can tell you better than I can. I know it is customary to have five, seven, or ten years as the term. I should like to make clear, that I am not authorised by any colliery companies to come here this afternoon. I only happened to be in town, and heard that this was coming on, and I thought you would like to know what objection there would be on the part of colliery proprietors, and iron manufacturers, to anything of this kind.

6652. (Mr. Addison.) You told us there would be an objection on the part of the coal proprietors, but you did not tell us the ground of the objection ?—They would strongly object to its appearing from any list that they are not the owners of the waggons on which their names appeared. The objection would arise from their being associated with other people who are in that list. It is in the nature of a black list, and they would strongly object to its appearing, especially in the case of young and enterprising and thoroughly sound concerns ; it would put them under a disadvantage as compared with older concerns.

6653. (Chairman.) I am bound to say that you have given us, although it was extempore, a most favourable and full statement, and I cannot imagine that you would give us anything very much better if you were to put it into writing, but we should be very glad to have anything that you would like to put into writing, and if anyone representing that branch of commerce would like to come before us, perhaps you would communicate with us early, because we are anxious to bring our evidence to a conclusion ?—I will communicate with them to that end.

Mr. John Lodge, called ; and Examined.

Mr. John Lodge.

8 May, 1907.

6654. (Chairman.) You represent the Lincoln Waggon and Engine Company, Limited ?—I do.

6655. Does that company carry on large works at Lincoln ?—We are a waggon-owning company, not a building company, so that the registration of hire purchase agreements would affect us substantially.

6656. Is your business that of letting out waggons as well as selling them ?—Yes, on hire purchase and simple hire.

6657. What kind of waggons do you deal with, railway waggons ?—Every sort of railway rolling stock, railway waggons, carriages and locomotives.

6658. Perhaps you could tell us something about the capital that is employed in this branch of trade ?—I have extracted some figures from the last published balance sheets of the waggon-owning companies similar to our own, not building companies, but purely waggon-owning companies, and including the uncalled capital, the amount of that stock is over £10,000,000. In addition to that, of course, there are the waggon-building companies, some of whom also let waggons on hire and also on hire-purchase. There is a further £7,000,000 invested in those building companies, so that it makes a total of over £17,000,000 for the two kinds of companies combined.

6659. That is embarked in the trade of manufacturing and letting these things ?—Yes.

6660. What are the grounds of objection to making hire purchase agreements registerable ?—The ground of our objection first is, that the system of hiring waggons under these agreements has been in existence in some of the companies over fifty years, the average of the nine waggon-owning companies is forty-two years. The youngest of the companies that I have in mind was established in 1875. My own company was established in 1873, some of them go back to 1857, and during that period we have had leases for rolling stock with some of the largest railway companies in the country who have hired a large number of waggons. We now have as tenants Members of Parliament, Members of the House of Lords and others of very high position who are interested in collieries and the iron trade, and because they wish to work their business with as small an amount of capital as possible, they take this means of providing the rolling stock because, by its own earnings, in time it will purchase itself. During the forty years these companies have been in existence, I calculate that rolling stock to the value of about £25,000,000 has been hired by these tenants.

6661. (Mr. Peat.) Under the hire purchase system, you mean ?—Yes.

6662. (Chairman.) In what way would that be diminished, or come to an end, if there were a system of registration ?—If there were a system of registration, companies of that character would object to take stock under a system by which registration was required, because they would consider it placed them very much in the character of an impoverished firm who could not provide their rolling stock otherwise than by borrowing it. It would certainly hinder them financially in raising or obtaining funds for other works, or extension purposes, or the raising of capital.

6663. Is there any other remark you would like to make, having regard to what you have already heard in this room ? We want to hear everything on the subject we can ?—I think that the publicity which waggon hire purchase agreements give at present is a far more reliable thing than any registration would be. It is a most important feature of the agreement that the owner's plate is in a conspicuous part of the waggon, and it is known thoroughly by everyone in the trade and those who are likely to give any credit. That is absolute evidence that that stock, whether it is a waggon or an engine, does not belong to the colliery company ; and that covers all sorts of rolling-stock. At this moment my company have waggons at a very large colliery, all of which bear our own plates, but in only one lot have the colliery company any interest as being under a hire purchase agreement. They are all lettered identically with the name of the firm ; they are all of the same character ; and to all appearance they all bear the same owner's plates ; but only one of the agreements would have to be registered, and apparently, if you adopt registration, that company would only have recorded against them 100 waggons, whereas of the 300 waggons that they have the other 200 are not their property, and they have no interest in them. They are simply hired, in one case from us direct, in another case they are hired from a third party ; so that our contention is that the publicity of the owner's plate is the most effective and well-known public notice ; and the information is obtained at once instead of having to refer either to headquarters, or a district registry.

6664. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I do not want to put it at all offen ively, but it is somewhat a matter of sentiment, is it not? They do not object to having the name on the waggon to show that the waggon does not belong to them, but they object to having this put into print in a list of other people?—No, they would object to the publicity. That this rolling stock belongs to other people is made clear to the people with whom they are likely to have to deal. They object to the publicity of all the world, such a large proportion of whom they are never likely to have any business with or to buy goods from; but possibly they may come to the public asking for financial support in the way of extension of their plant, or shares, or something of that sort.

6665. It is the sort of idea that they get put into a black list?—That is so. Firms and persons of the character I have mentioned would not take waggons at all from waggon building or waggon hiring companies if a public registration were necessary. They would try and get them from the railway companies, and as a result these large waggon building firms would not be more than a third occupied, because practically a half to two-thirds of their output of railway waggons passes through the waggon owning companies, and are let on hire purchase.

6666. Is it correct that two-thirds of the waggons made by waggon companies pass through companies who use them for hire purchase?—Yes, I should think so.

6667. You say that £25,000,000 worth have been actually sold during the fifty or sixty years that these companies have been in existence?—Yes.

6669. The bulk of the business is hire purchase. I am surprised it should not amount to more than £25,000,000 in fifty or sixty years?—I am taking forty years and I am taking the average. The number last year and recently has been much more than that. I have taken an average of 20,000.

6670. It has been a growing business?—Yes. The number last year was over 30,000 waggons.

6671. (Mr. Richardson.) Do you think registration would really interfere with the credit more than the fact that an owner's name plate is upon the waggon?—Very much more.

6672. You say everybody now has the opportunity of seeing that the name-plate indicates that the waggon does not belong to the company who are running it, but to the company who is hiring it out. It seems to me that with such facilities the mere registration is rather a matter of sentiment than anything else. It seems to me that only the people who know now that the waggons do not belong to the persons hiringthem would know if it was registered. They would be the only people wh would look to see?—It just depends, of course, on the character of the registration. My opinion is that a colliery company now who own £350,000 worth of rolling-stock acquired by these means, who had a capital of probably £400,000, and were increasing their stock every two or three years, would strongly object to a hire purchase lease for 100 waggons, amounting to £6,000 or £7000, being put in a public list where, perhaps transactions of £5, £10, £15, £20, £40, or £50 were registered. It would very seriously depreciate their standing for credit.

6673. (Mr Peat.) You have some knowledge of the capital engaged in colliery enterprises, and possibly also the capital necessary in a similar enterprise for rolling stock. Have you any experience on that subject?—Yes.

6674. Can you tell me whether, for instance, the capital engaged in sinking a colliery is greater than the capital engaged in the rolling stock for it?—It may possibly be slightly more, but the requirements of the rolling stock, especially if it is a coal that has to go a long distance, will be frequently equal to the cost of the colliery. May I give an instance: a new colliery in the new coalfield in Yorkshire has practically equipped themselves with waggons, most of the companies have leases with them, and they have a total of about 1,400 waggons, representing a capital outlay of about £84,000, and I do not think their colliery has cost them much above £100,000.

6675. Then, in that case, if those people had preferred not to enter into a hire purchase agreement, it would have been necessary for them to have raised double the amount of capital in order to buy and pay for their rolling stock in cash?—Yes, or else they would have to take their waggons on simple hire, in which case they would never acquire any interest in them.

6676. The suggestion is that even a simple hire should be regist red, so that does not help you?—No, that does not help.

6677. Will you tell me in your own experience what percentage of those hire purchase agreements do not result in an ultimate sale?—We have 600 to 700 hiring agreements in operation.

6678. That is your company?—Yes. During the last ten years, I do not think we have had more than three or four cases of that kind per year.

6679. That is less than one per cent. a good bit?—Yes.

6680. Have you in your experience come in contact with what you have heard referred to to-day, that is the bailiff coming in where you have had hire purchase agreements with customers?—No. We have occasionally had questions arising either with official receivers in bankruptcy or trustees under deeds, and the practice of my company, and similar companies, is to allow the estate, if they care to do so, to take over any beneficial lease.

THIRTY-SEVENTH DAY.

Mr. JOHN GRANT GIBSON, called ; and Examined.

Mr. John G. Gibson.

15 May, 1907.

6681. (Chairman.) You have been, I think, for some years official receiver in bankruptcy for the district of the County Court of Manchester, and I think some other county courts ?—Yes ; the largest portion of my time has been spent at Newcastle, but latterly at Manchester.

6682. I think before that you were in the south of England ?—Yes ; I was in the London and Suburban district and then at Brighton.

6683. So that you have had experience all over the country ?—Yes ; in various parts of England.

6684. You have had experience both in rural districts and in large towns ?—Yes.

6685. The Committee have received your proof, but we should very much like to get on the shorthand notes your views personally on the questions referred to us. The first matter on which we wish for the benefit of your information is in relation to the investigation of the bankrupt's conduct, and the imposition of punishment. Perhaps you can tell us in a summary way what your views are ?—My views are these : So far as the more serious bankruptcy offences are concerned I think I should be prepared to leave the ordinary law, as it stands, alone. That is to say, to proceed against a criminal bankrupt by the usual method of an inquiry before a magistrate, committal for trial, and trial by jury at the assizes or sessions ; but in addition to the offences defined by the Debtors' Act I rather suggest the creation of special bankruptcy offences, and for those I would recommend a summary process in which the judge would be either the stipendiary magistrate for the district, or the county court judge, as the balance of opinion might decide. Personally I am inclined to favour the stipendiary magistrate as being the tribunal ; but that is not a point on which I have any very decided opinion ; but I have a very decided opinion that a summary jurisdiction should be applied to certain commercial offences.

6686. Could you indicate to the Committee what of the matters which are not now offences you would bring into the category of commercial offences ?—Unexplained disposal of assets ; gross cases of preference of relatives or favoured creditors ; and the disposition of blocks of property on the eve of bankruptcy ; and also the obtaining of goods to any considerable extent within a short time of bankruptcy.

6687. As regards the failure to keep any, or any proper, books of account, what do you say ?—Of course it is extremely difficult to answer that question in a single sentence. There are some businesses, a sweet shop, for instance, in which the keeping of books would be somewhat unnecessary ; and to lay down any hard and fast line that any trader who failed to keep books would have committed a criminal offence might, I think, give rise to hardship. On the other hand, there are cases where the keeping of books is absolutely vital ; and offences are able to be committed, and cannot be discovered solely by the non-keeping of books. We find that where books are well kept we can nearly always get a conviction ; but where they are not kept, practically, although we may suspect the grossest offences, it is impossible to prove the offence ; and, possibly, upon that point, I think that discretion should be extended to the official receiver or to the court as to whether a trader should be committed or sentenced and punished for the non-keeping of books.

6688. Have you considered at all the question whether it would be possible to define what books a man ought to keep, as is done in the French and German Law ?—If I may say so, I quite agree on that point with the evidence given by Mr. Harry Lloyd Price, who said that in his view every trader should be required to keep at least one book : in French I think they call it "le journal," and at some time in the year he should be required to write out in that book a statement of assets and liabilities giving the names and amounts of his creditors and debtors and the particulars of his assets. That would give us a datum point to which to go back ; then we could get the things the man had had delivered since and we could practically convict him of having improperly disposed of goods and appropriated the proceeds.

6689. Assuming that offences such as you describe were made the subject of summary proceedings, have you at all thought out what would be the method of proof ? Would you make the official receiver's report primâ facie evidence calling upon the man to explain ?—Yes, I should make the official receiver's report primâ facie evidence, just as it is now primâ facie evidence of analogous matters in applications for discharge. I think the official receivers in the country, supervised as they are by a responsible Government Department, might fairly be trusted not to strain the case against bankrupts.

6691. Will you pass on to the question of the law relating to the discharge of bankrupts and, incidentally, as to the effect of after-acquired property being obtained by an undischarged bankrupt ?—That is a subject which, if I may say so, I have made a special study of in recent years ; and I have formed a very strong opinion upon it. I consider that the status of every bankrupt should be determined as soon as possible after the public examination. I should, in fact, make it part of the procedure in every case for the conduct of the bankrupt to come up for review by the County Court Judge. I would recommend the law being altered so as to make it obligatory upon the Official Receiver to apply for a day to be appointed for the hearing of a bankrupt's application for discharge, just as now he applies for a day to be appointed for the public examination, and that day should be as soon as the Court can give him a day after the conclusion of the public examination, say within three months.

6692. Do you anticipate that if that was the case, it would add at all seriously to the work of the Official Receiver, or of the Court?—I am afraid it would add considerably to the work of the County Court Judges; I do not think it would add very seriously to our work, because one of the difficulties in drawing up reports as to discharge is that so many years have elapsed since the matter was on the tapis. If the official receivers had to write their reports within two or three months of the conclusion of the public examination their labours would be very much lightened.

6693. Do you find in your present district, and in the districts you have been in, that the undischarged bankrupt is a frequent person?—Very frequent. I have had a very large number of cases indeed. At the time when I read a paper which I have here, which was in February, 1906, I had already had, in a little over a year, eleven or twelve cases of double bankruptcies, in which the result was that the creditors in the second bankruptcy were deprived of all the assets of their then debtor for the advantage of the first set of creditors.

6694. I think the inference you would draw would be that it would be well to dispose of a man as soon as possible?—Yes, I think that as soon as possible his civil status should be restored. Of course he should not go scot-free. If he has been guilty of serious fraud he should be punished by a short sharp term of imprisonment. For less serious cases, I think some method of imposing a pecuniary condition for the granting of discharge, to be paid for by the man out of his subsequent earnings, which could be ascertained by the compulsory filing of accounts, would be much more satisfactory than the long terms of suspension that are in vogue, and which only apply to a small percentage of bankruptcies.

6695. Do you find that the granting of a discharge, subject to a judgment for money, is common in the districts in which you have been, or is it not much used?—It is not very common; in comparatively few cases does that happen.

6696. Assuming that we have undischarged bankrupts, the present state of the law has been a good deal complained of as to its incidence on after-acquired property?—Yes, I have considered that matter a good deal too, and my suggestion is that the law should be made analogous to that which was laid down by the Court of Appeal in Cohen v. Mitchell, that is to say, that all bona fide dealings which pass after a bankruptcy with an undischarged bankrupt should be protected, provided they were entered into prior to the intervention of the bankrupt's first trustee.

6697. You would extend that to land?—I would extend that universally. I think that the present distinctions are somewhat artificial.

6698. I do not know if you have given any thought to this point: do you think that giving protection to creditors like that would encourage people to remain undischarged bankrupts in trade? I have heard that suggested?—I have not considered that point, but of course my remedy is a twofold one. I would limit the period of undischarge of a bankrupt by the method that I have suggested, of having a universal review of the bankrupt's status which I believe has been tried in some of His Majesty's Colonies, New Zealand, for instance.

6699. And New South Wales?—Yes.

6700. Passing on to our fourth question, do you think, from your now very long experience, that any more rapid mode of realising assets, in particular in relation to such things as going concerns, could be adopted?—I confess I do not think there is much fault to be found with that for this reason, that the vast majority of cases in which the assets are over £300 pass to a creditor's trustee, and in the smaller cases that the Official Receivers do not realise as a habit before the first meeting of creditors, and that takes place within a fortnight of the receiving order, so that I do not think it can be said there is any very serious delay.

6701. Passing on to the question of married women, we have had a good deal of evidence upon that, as to whether married women should be made amenable to the Bankruptcy Laws instead of enjoying the comparative immunity that they now enjoy. What is your view as to that question?—I think the time has now arrived when the married woman can be placed in relation to the bankruptcy law in exactly the same position as if she was a femme sole, or a man. I know there is the difficulty which the learned Chairman suggested to me in a letter, namely, that the very old idea in English law of restraint on anticipation might be endangered, and the suggestion that I make with regard to that would be that a restraint on anticipation by a married woman on property that was her own should, in the event of bankruptcy, be of no effect, but that a restraint on anticipation in property left to her by some other person might well be kept alive. I think Section 19 of the Married Woman's Property Act of 1882 deals with that point; that goes to a certain length, and I would carry that section a little further.

6703. There is another question upon which we have not had very much evidence, which I am glad to see you deal with, and that is in relation to marriage settlements, as to whether the law might be altered with some advantage so as to further protect creditors against claims either in proof or in property by persons claiming under settlements?—So far as the question relates to antenuptial settlements I should hesitate (I have not the authority and weight to do so) to recommend any change in the law which would strike at so vital a matter of domestic life, but I have very definite views with regard to the settlement of claims that married women have against their husband's estate with regard to moneys lent or advanced to that estate. As at present, the law prohibits a married woman from proving in competition with her husband's creditors in the event of her husband's bankruptcy, but at the same time the law permits a married woman to have her debt wholely satisfied out of her husband's estate unless the transaction can be attacked as a fraudulent preference, which of course is very little relief indeed. I would invalidate all settlements by a husband on a wife within two years of bankruptcy, whether the husband was solvent at the time or not; and I would invalidate like settlements within ten years of bankruptcy unless the assignee can show that the settlor was able to pay his debts without the aid of the property settled. In fact I would extend the provisions of Section 47 to settlements by husbands on wives in respect of past due debts. I have known several cases, quite a large number, of serious injustice in which a husband's estate has been depleted to satisfy his wife's claim, when, if he had not made that assignment or settlement, the wife would not even have been allowed to rank as a creditor. It seems to me to be illogical to allow a wife's claim to be paid in full while at the same time denying it a right of proof, which is a very much less important thing.

6704. I think you can cite an instance?—Yes. I remember a case at Guildford very well which is one of the places where I was Assistant Receiver. In that case the husband was a livery stable proprietor and his wife lent him some £300 or £400 for his business. If her husband failed, she would not have been able to prove for that loan; as it happened, however, the husband assigned by way of absolute bill of sale the whole of his horses and carriages, so that when the matter came into bankruptcy those things could not be touched, because they had been assigned by way of this bill of sale to his wife.

6705. So that the wife was practically paid in full out of the husband's estate?—Yes, and of course a settlement of that sort, by a husband to a wife, is very much more important and serious to his estate than a like settlement to a creditor, because a settlement or payment to a creditor, even if it denudes the estate, at any rate relieves it of the obligation of the debt, which is thus wiped out, but in the case of an assignment by a husband to a wife there is a double injury inflicted, the estate is impoverished, and a debt is paid which was no debt in the event of a bankruptcy.

6706. I think, besides that, you would recommend the alteration of the law for the purpose of protecting creditors in the case of transfers from a husband to a wife without any bill of sale at all, under the case of Ramsay v. Margrett?—Yes, the Court decided in that case that inasmuch as a husband and wife lived in the same house that an assignment could be validly made by the husband to the wife that required no registration whatever. The effect of that is that frequently husbands transfer to their wives, without any deed requiring registration, the household furniture in liquidation of outstanding old debts and as the deed requires no registration, the wife is held in law to be clothed with the property and possession alike, and can hold her husband's creditors at arm's length.

6707. Of course in Ramsay v. Margrett it was the wife's own house, which, I think, was held to make a difference ?—I understood that that case was argued, first of all, as a bill of sale.

6708. So it was ?—But the Court said it was not necessary to consider the question of bill of sale.

6709. Yes, that is so. The eighth clause of our terms of reference does not relate to bankruptcy; it relates to deeds of arrangement between debtors and creditors, and the points specially referred to us are whether the present state of the law ought in any way to be altered, so as either to bring these arrangements within the purview of the Court or the Board of Trade, or leave them where they are ?—The proposal that is most generally mooted is one which would give a majority of creditors power to bind a dissenting minority. My view is that if the law were changed in that direction simply, and without a very elaborate system of safeguards, that very serious evil results would follow; that is to say, if merely majority agreements were regularised, without accompanying safeguards, I would, so far as I can do so, throw the weight of my knowledge and experience against such a proposal; but I think it would be possible to regularise majority deeds provided certain safeguards were adopted.

6710. Such as ?—One of the initial points I think would be that the meeting of creditors should be held in the office of the Official Receiver, and the Official Receiver should be chairman thereof. My reason for suggesting this is that with a non-expert chairman, it would be extremely difficult for him to deal with points of law or points of fact that might arise with regard to proofs. Then again the partiality of the chairman might be called in question if no Government official, or such person whose bona fides and impartiality are beyond question, were employed in the matter. If the chairman of the meeting were the debtor's nominee, there might be a risk that sympathetic claims of creditors might be admitted. If, on the other hand, the chairman of the meeting were to be the nominee of the trade creditors, a possible injustice might ensue to the cash creditors. I know as a matter of fact that considerable jealousy does subsist on the part of trade creditors with regard to claims by relatives. There is a natural tendency to look with suspicion, that is sometimes justified but sometimes not, on cash creditors, by representatives of the various trades. Therefore I would suggest the creation of an impartial chairman who would, both by his training and his expert knowledge, be qualified to preside at the meeting and deal with proofs. I would also suggest that composition proposals should be submitted to the Court for its sanction. I think that unless this is done there would be grave risk of quasi-felonious debtors being white-washed by composition deeds, but if the sanction of the Court were to be required, then I think that that risk would be, to a large extent, if not altogether, removed. I think that the sanction of the Court could be obtained in a very summary and speedy manner at short notice, and that the facts of the case should be submitted to the Court in the form of a report by the Official Receiver.

6711. Would you extend the provisions as to a trustee giving security ? Do you think that that would be expedient, or would you leave it as it is ?—I, of course, have no experience as to the percentage of cases in which trustees have proved unfaithful to their trust. That is a matter I should prefer to leave to the Board of Trade authorities to deal with. I understand that accountants themselves are in favour of trustees under deeds being required to give security, and the cost would not in any case be very heavy.

6712. Would you complete what you have been telling us on this subject by telling us what your experience is of the creditor who stands out ? It is said that very often when the majority of creditors are in favour of a deed of arrangement, to have it arranged their own way, one man for just over £50 stands out ?—One has often heard that, and that is of course a matter in which I do not feel I am qualified to pronounce any very weighty opinion, for the simple reason that I am not concerned as a rule with deeds of arrangement until they become bankruptcies. I would like to say that no creditor can stand out unless his debt is very substantial. I should say that the percentage of liabilities of £50 or over in the failures all over the country is comparatively small. The vast majority of creditors are under £50,and therefore I should say that the fact that £50 is necessary in order to make opposition effective is a very weighty disadvantage from the point of view of the dissentient creditor. His debt has to be a very substantial one. It is not like a £10 or £15 debt having a power to upset a deed. When a man's debt is £50 he cannot be said to have an unsubstantial interest in the estate of which he is a creditor.

6713. The last question that is referred to us is as to the registration of certain instruments. As regards assignments of book debts we have had some evidence that it would be advisable to have them registered, and some evidence that it would not ?—My own view is that the lack of registration of assignments of debts does not create any very great mischief, or at any rate not such mischief as would outweigh the present benefit, alike to traders and creditors, which the present system permits. I am referring more particularly to building contracts for houses, and building contracts for ships. It is well known that persons who have to complete an expensive thing like a building or a ship, get their payments by instalments; so much when the keel is laid, so much when the frames are up, and so on. They would not in many cases be able to build the ship if they could not get assistance and help from their bankers. I think it would, to a certain extent, fetter trade, if you were to require registration of assignments on building contracts for ships and houses, and it would be a practical difficulty I think to distinguish between what class of book debts required registration, and what class did not.

6714. Have you found in your experience that assignments, what one might call general assignments, of book debts to a creditor, or a lender of money, are common ?—No, I should say they were not very common. In fact I should say they were comparatively rare. I do not think that we come across a great many cases in which we find book debts are assigned, except in cases where a business is all book debts, such as a Scotch draper's, where sometimes we find the debts in a particular district are assigned. With the exception of that class of trader, I have not myself had much experience of assignment of book debts. I should like to point out this, which I think has not been touched on before, that one of the main arguments in favour of the registration of assignments of chattels is wanting in the case of book debts, and that is the evidence of the senses. The reason that it is necessary to register an assignment of stock, or furniture, or things of that sort, is because when the traders see the man surrounded by the appearance of wealth, if there were no obligation on the part of the borrowing trader to register an assignment of his stock, he might get credit upon the faith of property which really belonged to someone else. That is the thing which has been at the bottom of all the Bills of Sale Acts. No such condition exists in the case of book debts, because a man cannot tell by walking into another man's shop whether he has book debts owing to him or not; therefore he cannot say he has been deceived into giving credit by the appearance of wealth that really does not exist.

6715. As regards hire purchase agreements, have you come across them, either in the course of your official experience, or owing to the fact that you have been very busily engaged in large commercial towns ?—Hire purchase agreements are enormously common, and they are increasing in number every day, that is to say the number of trades affected by them are very largely increasing. I myself confess that I do not view with great sympathy the desire to register these agreements, because I think most of the people who deal with the people who are likely to have articles of this description on hire, know of the custom perfectly well, and therefore they are not likely to be misled. Take, for instance, the creditor of a printer, he knows perfectly well that small printers buy their printing machines on the hire purchase system; therefore I consider he has only himself to blame if he gives credit, from the fact that he sees three or four printing machines in his creditor's shop. I do not think that much injustice flows from that, I confess.

6716. There are two special points in the supplement to the statement you have been good enough to send us about which I particularly want to ask you. I was not going to trouble you with anything upon the suggested extension of Section 125, the dead man's clause, but as regards the two others I want particularly to ask you this: One of your suggestions is as to shortening the public examination?—Yes.

6717. Would you kindly explain that to the Committee, because it is directly material to one of our points of reference?—There is a system that was devised by my predecessor, Mr. Dibb, some years ago, and it has been adopted and carried out by myself since I went to Manchester. It consists of this—in place of the usual oral examination by question and answer, which involves the appointment and payment of a shorthand writer, and the delay occasioned by having the notes transcribed, what we do is, in the less important cases, where there is no suggestion of fraud or serious commercial misconduct, to invite the bankrupt to attend our office on a day shortly before the public examination, and then, by dint of question and answer across the table, to get from him the history of his case. The preliminary examination, or O.R. 7 as it is called, forms the basis of that, and then in addition any complaints that we have received from creditors are put before the bankrupt, and he is asked to give his explanation, and so on. We get from him the story of his trading life. That is done by a senior clerk in the office, or by the assistant receiver, and then the papers are all sent up to the Official Receiver, who revises the draft, and it is sent down and typewritten. Then one copy is sent to the Registrar three or four days before the public examination takes place, and the other copy is retained for the Official Receiver's use. On the day appointed for the public examination the list is called through; in Manchester we have a long list of fifteen or sixteen cases, and on the examination day the Official Receiver in reply to the Registrar's question, intimates whether the case is an oral examination or a special memorandum, as the case may be. The list having been read from top to bottom, the special memorandum cases are taken first. They occupy only about five minutes each. The special memorandum is read aloud in an audible voice, so that everyone in court can hear, to the bankrupt; the bankrupt is then specifically sworn to it by the Registrar, and the examination is thus finished within a few minutes, and on the same day. We consider that that system is an improvement upon the suggestion which has been made by several friends of mine, Mr. Price amongst others, of simply swearing the debtor to the O.R. 7, because the O.R. 7 contains a number of matters which are irrelevant, and on the other hand it does not touch on other matters which our special memoranda bring out.

6718. You do not think that operates to deter the creditors themselves from coming and asking questions?—Of course the system has been in vogue now in Manchester for some five or six years, and it is fairly well-known in the district. No complaint has ever reached my ears on the part of any creditor that the system involves the neglect of any matters that should be thrashed out. Occasionally it happens that a creditor attends in a special memorandum case and says that he would like to examine the bankrupt himself. The Registrar then generally asks him what the point is which he wishes to put to the bankrupt. It is quite likely that the point is one of the points that is dealt with at length in our special memorandum. When that is the case the creditor in 99 cases out of 100 is perfectly satisfied, and the memorandum is read in the ordinary way. Occasionally it does happen that the creditor brings out something quite new. When that is the case our special memorandum is dropped for the time being, the creditor is allowed to proceed with his oral examination, and the examination is then adjourned in the usual way for the transcript of the notes to be made. Then on the adjourned day the special memorandum is put to the bankrupt with the ordinary statutory form. It is not dropped for ever, but for the time being.

6719. In your public examinations does the creditors' trustee often attend?—He is always there in person, but the number of times in which he actually examines is not very large. They generally rest satisfied with the Official Receiver's examination; they are always there.

6720. The other point I wanted to ask you was one which, of course, affects the question of assets for creditors, and that is as to the present provision protecting a landlord's rent in relation to rents being payable in advance?—That is a matter about which I have felt very strongly since I have come to Manchester. I found in vogue a practice there, practically an invariable practice, of making rent payable in advance. That seems to me a great injustice to the ordinary creditor. The way that that practice has been evolved is as follows: in the old days there was a custom in many solicitors' offices of making the rent payable on the usual quarter days, but with a proviso that in the event of the tenant becoming bankrupt the rent should become payable in advance. The legal advisers of the Board of Trade advised that such a provision in a lease was invalid as amounting to a fraud on the bankruptcy laws, and I believe in two or three cases the matter was tested, and it was found that that advice was sound. As soon as solicitors realised their position, or the position of their clients, they altered their practice, and now the common thing to do is, certainly with the smaller class of shop-keepers, to make the rent invariably payable in advance as a matter of course, but not to insist upon the practice during the solvent tenancy of the tenant, with an understanding that in the event of bankruptcy the clause is to be put in force. So, of course, we have come to the old position, the tenant pays his rent so long as he is a solvent man some short time after the quarter day; he never thinks of paying it in advance, but when the receiving order is made, we are met with a claim by the landlord for the whole of the current quarter, and then if we cannot get out before the quarter day, for the whole of the next quarter; for three or four months after the receiving order. To give a concrete example, supposing a receiving order is made on June 20th, a man will have paid his rent up to March 25th previously, it is a physical impossibility for the receiver or trustee to get out by June 25th, but he could get out by the 27th or 28th, but that does not avail; they have to pay the whole of the rent from March to June, and from June to September. That seems to me very hard on the creditors, when the trustee is prepared to give vacant possession to the landlord so soon. I would recommend a change of the law in that respect.

6721. That would require a slight amendment of Section 42?—Yes.

6722. (Mr. Richardson.) Do I understand you are not in favour of punishing a debtor for the non-keeping of books?—No; I do not think I should like my answer to be understood in that way. What I meant was that the non-keeping of books is a subject which should be treated with discrimination. I would not prosecute every old woman who keeps a stall for not keeping books; but where there is reason to suppose that the non-keeping of books is due to the deliberate wish to conceal transactions then I think the matter should be one entailing punishment.

6723. Would you not make it a certain punishment for a well-educated man who had been in business who had kept his books well? No doubt you have found often that a man has kept his books well and then has ceased six, eight or nine months before bankruptcy; and you have found great difficulty in tracing transactions because of the non-keeping of books?—I think the best way would be to make it an offence not to keep books, and then leave it to the discretion of the Official Receiver not to enforce punishment in cases in which, in his opinion, the non-keeping of books was due to sheer ignorance and lack of education.

6724. Would you not make it certain punishment where books had been kept up to a certain time before bankruptcy, and then the bankrupt had ceased to keep them? In ninety-nine cases out of 100 they have ceased to keep books with the purpose of mystifying the accounts so that the transaction cannot be traced?—I think your question exactly meets what I was intending to give as my view, namely, that where the non-keeping of books could not be condoned by ignorance or lack of education, then it would be an offence entailing punishment.

6725. You mention summary proceedings for certain offences. Would you not also include the pawning of goods bought immediately before bankruptcy? That frequently happens?—That is an offence now. I prosecuted a bankrupt at the last quarter sessions in Manchester for that very offence. We had him committed to the sessions, but, unfortunately, he cheated the law by breaking his bail. The only satisfaction is that we have estreated the recognizances of his sureties.

6726. There are the smaller cases of pawning in which the creditors do not pursue any action against them because of the smallness of the amounts involved. If you go in for summary jurisdiction, would you not include that as one of the possible offences?—Yes; I think it should be included.

6727. At the discretion of the Court?—Yes; the only thing is that at present it is the law of the land; and it might be urged that as the power already exists there is no necessity to reiterate it in an amending Act.

6728. Amongst the punishments, would you be inclined to favour civil disabilities: to deprive a man of his political power of voting, and so on, as a punishment? In the case of a man undischarged for five years he should lose his political power?—Civil disabilities already exist in many directions at the present time; a man is incapable of becoming a councillor or an alderman, for instance, or a member of Parliament. You mean you would extend it to voting?

6729. Yes?—I confess I have not applied my mind to that. Therefore, perhaps, you will excuse me from giving a definite answer to a matter which I have not specially considered; but it is worthy of consideration I admit.

6730. You consider that the debtor should come up for the consideration of his discharge within three months of the public examination?—Yes.

6731. Do you not think that is rather too early, that the limit should be a little longer, say six months, to enable the estate to be realised and the dividend paid?—I do not wish to be dogmatic as to the period. I simply said three months because my idea is that it should be as quickly as possible. If three months is considered too short it could be extended.

6732. If it were limited to six months, generally an estate could be wound up in six months?—Yes; I recognise the force of that suggestion.

6733. If deeds of arrangement were agreed to by all the creditors, would you compel such deeds to come under the notice of the Official Receiver or the Court?—At present, of course, the law is that they do not.

6734. Would you if they all agreed? I can quite understand your reason for deeds of arrangement coming before the court where there is a division, where the whole are not agreed; but if they all agree, would you compel them then to come before the Official Receiver, and to have the arrangement sanctioned by the Court?—I am inclined to think that if you open the door to the majority deeds——

6735. I am not speaking of majority deeds?—I say if you alter the law so as to make majority deeds binding, that then, as compensation for that, it would be desirable that all deeds should be under the regulation of the Court.

6736. If the Official Receiver and the Court sanctioned a deed of arrangement agreed to by the majority, would you allow a dissentient creditor the right for a time to throw such an estate into bankruptcy?—No.

6737. You would not give him any time?—No; I think that would be a sufficient safeguard.

6738. The mere fact that the majority had agreed to a deed, and the Official Receiver and the Court had sanctioned it?—I think, provided you have full safeguards of the nature I have indicated, that you may safely leave the Court to deal with a dissentient shareholder as it does now.

6740. Pardon me, the tendency of the law nowadays is to create a woman entirely separate from her husband, even as to making her bankrupt, and trading separately, and other matters of that kind?—Yes; I recognise that that is so.

6741. Still you suggest that a woman who lends her own money to her husband, not only should be postponed to every creditor, which is the law at present, but that she should be put under further disabilities?—I say that so long as the law is that money lent by a wife to a husband is postponed to other creditors, in just the same way as a partner is not permitted to compete with his partner's creditors, so long as that is the state of the law, it is in my opinion illogical to allow a woman to be paid in full for that which she is not allowed to prove for

6742. The circumstances might entitle the lady to be paid, or might result in her being paid some portion of the sum she had lent her husband. It is very frequent—it is not occasional but frequent, that a woman may lend £1,000 of her money to her husband for a month or two months, or whatever the period may be, and she gets it back; but your alteration in the law would prevent her lending any money to her husband, because she could not get it back or secured?—I think that might be safeguarded. I think that temporary loans, in which it could be shown that the money was lent for a specific purpose and for a specific time, might be paid back by the husband to his wife in the same way that he might pay back a loan from an ordinary business correspondent.

6743. I am referring more particularly to allocation of existing visible assets in satisfaction of debts?—That would be an ordinary matter of ordinary business. I do not think I would interfere with that.

6744. It is not a hard and fast rule in your mind that where a woman lends money to her husband, which is her own or her parent's, as is very often the case, she should not receive security, and not be entitled to receive repayment of it? That is not your view?—No; my view is more particularly against the allocation or assignment of a visible portion of a trader's assets in discharge of a wife's loans for business purposes.

6745. I am afraid I must ask you to forgive me again. It is possible the lady might lend the money and take a bill of sale; why should she not?—If she takes a bill of sale, that is registered.

6746. Yes, I am aware; and so in your case of the man who had the livery stables, if he gave a bill of sale to his wife for the money, where was the injustice?—He gave a bill of sale in respect to a loan that had been made by the wife some time beforehand, so that the estate got no present advantage out of the loan.

6747. The ordinary law would cover that giving of security, would it not?—Only if it was within three months of the bankruptcy. If it was three and a half months or four months the practical result to the creditors would be the same, but the remedy would be different.

6748. Perhaps you may consider my observation on this point and give it such weight as you think necessary; if you made it impossible, or practically impossible, for a woman to help her husband you would seriously prejudice trade in the country; it would tend to this, that the woman would lend through her son or her daughter or her father or her mother, or some other relation, who would not be under the same disability as the woman?—I dare say that that is done now to a certain extent.

6749. It is done now to a certain extent, but the disability at the moment is that the wife may not rank with fellow creditors; and in 99 cases out of a 100 the husband does not pay her off. That is my experience?—I myself should prefer the disability swept away.

6750. That is my view, too?—But at present it is illogical to keep the disability and allow the other.

6751. However now I understand your point better than when I first heard you express it. On the subject or deeds of arrangement, am I right in concluding from your remarks that you are not intimately acquainted with the larger deeds of arrangement which are fairly frequent, consisting of £20,000, £30,000, £50,000 or £100,000 worth of debts ?—No, we naturally are not familiar with those cases; they do not come into bankruptcy.

6752. Therefore you are not, may I say so with great respect, acquainted with the difficulties which have had to be overcome with individual creditors seeking a preference of a more or less unjust character ?—I would not attempt to place my experience against that of an accountant of your experience, who is trustee under deeds of assignment frequently.

6753. Of a large kind ?—Yes.

6754. You are aware that the execution of a deed is an act of bankruptcy which lasts for three months ?—Yes.

6755. May I say that many creditors wait until a week or so ?—You are anticipating an answer that I am very pleased to have the opportunity of giving. I think the three months' period should be reduced. I am strongly of that opinion. I think if a creditor is really honest in his desire to bring the affairs of his debtor before the examination of the Court he would do so at once. There is no earthly reason why he should keep the trustee under a deed of assignment hanging about for three months. I would reduce the period to one month at any rate.

6756. Assuming the bankruptcy takes place, you are aware that the trustee under the deed is considered a trespasser ?—He may be.

6757. Do you think that is reasonable and fair if he has simply done his duty as a trustee under the deed ?—Is not the grievance rather imaginary than actual ?

6758. I have had no experience personally of such a thing, therefore I can only say what I hear ?—Our practice, which is one we are fully authorised by the Board of Trade to follow, is to honour all the bona-fide intromissions of a trustee with an estate. Beyond that we are authorised not only not to attempt to upset the transactions of a trustee under a deed, but we are authorised to pay him a reasonable sum for the trouble he has taken as trustee under the deed.

6759. That is very satisfactory information for me. Did you observe in a fairly recent litigation the trustee under a deed had collected a debt, and that the trustee in bankruptcy claimed the same debt on the ground that the deed having been upset, the trustee under the deed was not entitled to collect it ?—Yes, I recollect that case; it was reported in the Weekly Notes.

6760. (Chairman.) It was Davis v. Petrie; Afford was the trustee.

6761. (Mr. Peat.) Therefore the trustee in that case, and many other cases possibly, is under very serious disability, and the estate itself in serious jeopardy, if the trustee may not collect the debts ?—I confess I cannot see why there should be any risk in that, because if the trustee collects the debt, the money exists in specie, and he can pay it over to the trustee in bankruptcy, in which case the trustee in bankruptcy does not require to sue the debtor to the estate. Was not that a case in which the trustee absconded ?

6762. (Chairman.) He did not abscond, but he handed over a small quantity of the debts. I was counsel in the case, and then—it was after I had ceased to practice—the trustee in bankruptcy sued the people who had paid the trustee under the deed.

6763. (Mr. Peat.) And the trustee under the deed had absconded, had he ?

6764. (Chairman.) He was not to be found.

6765. (Mr. Peat.) That is equivalent to absconding. The trustee frequently has a business to carry on, at any rate that is my experience ?—Yes.

6766. Something has to be done to keep things going ?—Yes.

6767. He collects the debts and creates fresh ones ?—Yes.

6768. My question to you is, do you think it reasonable that the actions of the trustee in a bona fide and honest manner should be upset because the deed itself is upset ?—That, of course, deals with a matter that is not a matter of statute, but which is a matter of our common law, and it is a matter upon which I should hardly like to express an offhand opinion, not having considered it.

6769. (Mr. Addison.) You told us that there were some offences which you would like to have dealt with summarily ?—Yes.

6770. Could you forward to our Chairman a list of those which occur to you ?—I mention some in my proof.

6771. You mention two, but of course one wants if possible to have such a valuable suggestion as that in a concrete form. For instance, one you mention is the disposition of blocks of property on the eve of bankruptcy. That is rather vague. It does not say whether it is for a past debt or whether it is for value, or what it is. I only suggest that if you could send a concrete list to our Chairman we should be obliged to you ?—I should be inclined to say that when a man hands over to a single creditor a large portion of his estate, under such circumstances as that it would be set aside as a fraudulent preference if proceedings were taken in a Civil Court, that should also be regarded as a criminal matter.

6772. That means a disposition of a block of property otherwise than for value ?—Otherwise than for present value.

6773. Passing from that to the undischarged bankrupts, I think your view is that which is entertained by many, that the creating of a class of undischarged bankrupts is undesirable. We gather from the Board of Trade returns that there are probably 70,000 undischarged bankrupts ?—Yes, I made a calculation myself, and assuming that none had died, which is of course a very large assumption, there would be something like 85,000, but I should think at least there must be 70,000 living.

6774. What exactly do you propose to substitute for the suspension or refusal of discharge ?—I think that a pecuniary condition might be usefully substituted for a suspension period. That is to say the court should grant the bankrupt his discharge, subject to his paying some sum. I would not suggest a very large sum, it depends upon the man's capabilities, but £50 or perhaps £100, to be paid within a certain number of years.

6775. I observe you have said that the granting of a discharge for money to be paid is not common ?—At present it is not common.

6776. You would enlarge that ?—Yes, I would enlarge the practice.

6777. Would it be necessary to supplement the provisions of the Act as to his reporting himself and giving an account of his means, and so forth ?—Yes, the bankrupt would be given a written notice, calling upon him to file accounts on January 1st and July 1st, showing what his earnings had been during the preceding six months.

6778. He would have to report to the Official Receiver ?—He would have to file accounts.

6779. You would couple with that some provision for enforcing fulfilment ?—Yes, I think there would be some such steps for compulsion if he failed to comply with the Order of the Court or the Official Receiver.

6780. In the grosser cases, where a mere payment would not be satisfactory, what punishment would you suggest ?—Those are the cases in which I suggest that the debtor should be subject to criminal proceedings.

6781. Those would be cases which would come within your summary list ?—Yes, but even in such cases I think that the debtor, having purged his offence by imprisonment, should be a discharged man. A large array of undischarged bankrupts is a menace to the community.

6782. Those are words that occur to one's mind certainly. I have come across instances. With regard to the realisation of assets, I think that our Paragraph was directed to cases where there was a goodwill that could be immediately dealt with, or some cases where the delay of even a fortnight would greatly prejudice matters. I have known such cases, but they have been very rare, in the case of a bank or a going business to be taken over. Someone will come in at the moment and give something for it ?—You see, where the cases are of any size the business is kept on.

6783. But the keeping on of a business is not the same as disposing of it?—It is kept on for a short time; the shutters are not put up.

6784. You would not have any objection to give that power to the Court, with the consent of the creditors?—None whatever. The only reason we hesitate to realise with the goodwill attaching in cases of that sort, is that we do not want to trespass upon the functions of the creditors' trustee.

6785. I mean a special power and not a general power?—Yes.

6786. There is this very vexed subject of married women. Do you suggest that every married woman incurring a debt should be liable to be made a bankrupt, whether she is in business or not? Perhaps I should tell you why I put the question. I am looking at it from the point of view of the husband. Is it desirable that the man who has an extravagant wife should be placed in the terrible position which he would be in if that wife were liable to be made bankrupt because somebody has given her credit, which perhaps she would have been better without? It is a great change in the law. Of course we do change the law a great deal, but it does seem to me that it would be bringing a serious difficulty often into domestic life?—I appreciate your remarks but I cannot fancy that such cases would be frequent.

6787. Why so? Perhaps it may be a struggling professional man able to pay his way, but which of us could tolerate the making of a wife bankrupt if we could by any means bear the burden?—Of course the credit that she would have had to get involves the hypothesis that it would be somewhat large. It would be over £50 to start with.

6788. Unfortunately one does know of extravagant wives. The point of view which I am suggesting to you is this, I cannot quite see the effect upon the home. Where there is an asset of the wife's to be administered, a separate estate or anything of that kind, for the benefit of the creditors, then I appreciate there should be a power, but where the wife has nothing, and the effect is to press the husband, it requires, I think, a good deal of consideration?—I quite appreciate that. Of course it may be said that such wives as you are thinking of would be no real menace to the community, because they are not traders.

6789. I want to be satisfied that in order that an extravagant wife may get goods on credit, it is desire able to give such a power. I cannot bring myself to face the position in which any of us would be placed under the circumstances. We must pay; one could not sit at the same table with a wife who was going through the Bankruptcy Court?—The world is full of unpleasant things; the husband has to go through the Bankruptcy Court, and the eldest son, and that sort of thing.

6790. That is his own fault. You agree it does present a serious difficulty where there is no asset of the wife to administer?—It also raises this difficulty, which I had not thought of till you put your question, and that is this, that to alter the law in that direction may create oppression for the husband, the screw would be put upon him to meet his extravagant wife's debts, by holding the threat of bankruptcy over his wife.

6791. The Court, I think, does not care to adjudicate in bankruptcy, where there is no possible benefit to be got by the creditors from it?—Yes, there was a case of re Otway, I think.

6792. It is so with regard to winding up a company, and sometimes in the case of bankruptcy. I only want to suggest the difficulty which occurs to one. Then with regard to marriage settlements. You say that when a woman settles her own property, and gets into debt, you would ignore the settlement?—When she settles her own property, with a restraint on anticipation, I think that the same rule should apply as applies when a man settles his own property with a forfeiture in the event of bankruptcy.

6793. I am going to put before you what is rather common in one's practice as a lawyer. A marriage settlement is made, and a certain fund is provided by or on behalf of the wife, and a certain fund is provided by or on behalf of the husband, the income of which is intended more or less as a common fund to keep the family going. It seems it might be a little hard on the husband if the restraint which the law now allows as against the creditor laying hold of the wife's contribution should be done away with, with no fault on his side?—The case you are assuming is that of an ante-nuptial settlement is it not?

6794. Yes?—I am not suggesting that those should be affected at all. On the contrary I think I should hesitate to suggest any change in the law relating to such a sacred document as a marriage settlement.

6795. You would not affect an ante-nuptial settlement?—No, not at all.

6796. Nor the provision of a father's will, or anything of that kind?—No.

6797. (Mr. Smith.) I understand you do not agree with the suggestion put to you that the non-keeping of books should, under all circumstances, be treated as an offence which should be punishable by imprisonment?—I think perhaps the safest thing would be to make it an offence, and then leave discretion to the Official Receiver.

6798. I say under all circumstances?—Yes.

6799. You would not treat it as an offence to be punished by imprisonment unless there was some element of fraud or gross recklessness?—Yes, or circumstances such that the Court may fairly assume that the non-keeping of books might have been avoided and was deliberate.

6800. Would this represent your view somewhat? That the bankrupt has not kept such books as are necessary to disclose his business and financial transactions, unless the Court be satisfied that from the nature of the case, or the circumstances under which the business is carried on, such books are unusual, or that the failure to keep them has not arisen from any intention to conceal the state of affairs, or from wilful neglect?—Any such provision as that.

6801. Some general phrase of that sort?—Yes, that would meet my views.

6802. With regard to the realisation of assets, I am not sure whether a question was put to you as to the practice of realising before the trustee's appointment. What is the practice?—Our directions are that in cases in which the assets are likely to be over £300 not to realise at all unless they are of a perishable nature. Where the estate is a small one there is no absolute prohibition against realising, but as a matter of practice we do not realise without consulting creditors.

6803. You do not realise in those cases?—No, not before the meeting.

6804. You realise, of course, when they are perishable goods?—Yes.

6805. Has there been in your district any complaint as regards administration of estates on that point, as to assets being realised before the first meeting of creditors?—No complaint at all.

6806. Neither at Manchester nor Newcastle?—No.

6807. Do you object to the proposal that a general assignment of book debts should be registered? I mean a general assignment which would not involve the publication of particular names?—I would not throw my evidence against it, but I am not particularly taken with the idea of the necessity for it.

6808. Or assignments of future debts. Do you not think they should be registered. Debts which are not in existence at the moment of the assignment, giving a particular creditor a charge on debts to be created hereafter, would you not require such charges to be registered?—I think on the whole, perhaps, the balance of argument is in favour of the registration of the assignment of such debts, but, as I say, I have not met many cases of hardship owing to the existing state of the law.

6809. Do you agree with those witnesses who have stated that in their opinion the general assignment of book debts is generally a sign of the last extremity which precedes bankruptcy?—Yes, I should say that it was. I should say it was rather a desperate device, except in the well-known trades of shipbuilding and house building.

6810. (Mr. Peat.) Engineering, etc.?—Yes, and large transactions of that description.

6811. (Mr. Smith.) With regard to the questions asked by Mr. Peat as to the remuneration of the trustee under the deed, what is the regulation issued by the Board of Trade on that point. I think there is some general instruction; can you tell us the nature of it?—We are authorised to allow such fee as may be allowed on correspondence between ourselves and the Department for a trustee's services in safeguarding an estate, so far as he has done so.

6812. Your duty is to report to the Department the circumstances and inform them of your opinion of what ought to be allowed?—Yes, we make a suggestion.

6813. Is there anything as to the basis upon which that is to be formed?—Where the chattel assets have been realised we do it by a percentage of the amount realised.

6814. Where any benefit to the estate has arisen from the action of the trustee is he allowed for it?—When he realises, the basis is the amount of the assets realised. Where it is a matter of supervising and protecting assets we allow a fee of say three or four guineas.

6815. Where any expense has been saved by the estate by the action of the trustee which otherwise would have been incurred, would you allow that?—Where any payment has been made that would be paid under the bankruptcy, that is allowed, such as the payment of rent.

6816. I mean payments that might not be absolutely enforcible at law, would you allow remuneration to the trustee for work done in saving the estate from a loss, for instance?—Yes, that would be within the spirit of the instruction.

6817. And that depends on the particular circumstances of the case?—Yes.

6818. It is not a case in which the Board of Trade has laid down any hard and fast rule that trustees under a deed of arrangement should not be allowed remuneration for the work done, but that the work must have resulted in benefit to the estate before remuneration is paid for it?—Yes. I think I ought to say this, the practice has been extended and enlarged to a certain extent in consequence of the well-known decision of Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams in re Simonson ex parte Ball, in which he held it was not equitable not to allow a trustee under an assignment fair remuneration for his services.

6819. Are there many complaints now by trustees under deeds of their treatment?—On several occasions lately I have had applications made to me for an allowance and we have always been able to settle them on an amicable basis.

6820. With regard to the feeling of creditors with regard to these bankruptcy offences, do you think there is a very strong feeling in the commercial community with a view to making the bankruptcy laws stronger about punishing offences?—Yes, representations have been made to me on several occasions, but so far as my own experience goes, they have been rather made to me by the professional classes than by creditors, that is to say accountants and solicitors. I daresay they are voicing the sentiments of their clients.

6821. Have you known any cases where deeds of arrangement were proposed where offences have been known to have been committed by the debtor where they have yet passed the deed of arrangement, or is it in your opinion the practice of creditors in such a case to put the estate into bankruptcy?—It would be difficult to answer that question in a hard and fast way in either direction. Sometimes creditors seem to take a proper view of their public position and force matters into bankruptcy; in the last two years I think I have picked out that we had eleven cases of attempted deeds, in which a certain proportion of the creditors assented, in which afterwards serious offences were discovered.

15 May, 1907.

6822. That is out of the forty-seven cases you mention?—It is exactly 33 per cent.

6823. Were they cases where offences under the Bankruptcy Act have been committed?—Yes.

6824. Had those been known to the creditors beforehand?—That is a difficult matter to say. I could not say. The cases were somewhat notorious.

6825. Were there any serious offences?—Yes, certainly. In the one case the bankrupt was prosecuted to conviction, in another case the prosecution was pending, but the bankrupt died. In the third case the bankrupt was sent for trial, but he absconded, and in the other eight cases, that make up the eleven, the bankrupts were Jews, and the Board of Trade advised that prosecution was inadvisable owing to the hard swearing that there would have been from their compatriots.

6826. It is usual under such circumstances?—It is the usual case.

6827. These are cases where the majority of creditors had approved of the deed?—I would not like to say the majority.

6828. I thought these were cases where a deed had been propounded and carried by a majority?—Cases where a deed had been propounded by the debtor, and assented to by a proportion of the creditors, which eventually, owing to the objections of one or two creditors, came into bankruptcy.

6829. I think from your answers given to the Chairman you are of opinion that if the law were relaxed in that respect so as to allow the majority to bind the minority, there would be a great increase of evils of that class arising?—My experience is that creditors as a whole, as citizens, have a very proper view of their duties as citizens, but where their pockets are touched it is very hard indeed for them to forego a certain dividend for the less satisfactory, from their point of view, punishment.

6830. You think if they get a pecuniary advantage under the deed they would forego the exposure of punishment of what otherwise you would treat as a criminal offence?—I cannot help answering that from what actually occurs in bankruptcies. There are two cases pending now in the Manchester Court which are very bad cases indeed, in one of which the creditors came to me and represented that they did not wish for dividends, they wanted punishment. The cases where they came in were comparatively barren cases, and in one case the debtor was terrified out of his life at the public examination, and after the public examination he came, and through the assistance of friends made a very substantial composition, in one case 7s. 6d. in the £ and in the other 10s., and the compositions were duly accepted by the creditors. One is now pending before the judge, but in the other case the judge, after much searching of his heart, came to the conclusion that he ought not to deprive the creditors of so substantial a dividend, and sanctioned the composition.

Mr. Cecil Mercer, called; and Examined.

6831. (Chairman.) I think you have been Official Receiver in bankruptcy ever since the commencement of the Act?—From January 1st, 1884.

Mr. Cecil Mercer.

6832. So that your experience extends over twenty-three years?—It does.

6833. I think that most of the time you have been in the districts round London?—I have.

6834. Therefore your experience is a very large one?—It is.

6835. I think in your present office you are not only acting Official Receiver, but you supervise several other districts?—I do; I supervise the Cambridge district and the Oxford district. I am the senior Official Receiver for those districts and the Official Receiver of companies in those districts.

6836. I think you have perused our terms of reference?—I have, and I sent a memorandum to the Board of Trade containing my remarks upon them.

6837. That has been circulated. Therefore, perhaps, you could tell us shortly the conclusion at which you have arrived, on the different points which are referred to us? First as regards the punishment of the debtor?—As regards the investigation of the bankrupt's conduct, and the imposition of punishment, my opinion is that there ought to be some process in the courts now by which the judge, when a debtor comes up for his discharge, can commit him straight off, either to the assizes or to the court of quarter sessions, if he has committed certain offences; and the offences for which, in my opinion, he ought to be so sent for trial, if they are sufficiently grave, would be the failure to keep proper books; in that connection I want to make a certain differentiation. I should not think in every case of suggesting that a man who was only a costermonger, or who kept a small shop and could hardly read or write, should be sent for trial if he has not kept proper books. There are offences and offences; but if he has been a merchant in a good way of business, or keeping a large shop, and for some years past he has kept books very well, and the last year or two he has not kept them, perhaps at all, in such a case I should certainly send him for trial for an offence of that sort. I should also send him for trial if it is clearly proved to the satisfaction of the court that the debtor has contracted debts without a reasonable or proper expectation of payment. In my opinion that is one of the most serious offences a debtor can commit. It is not only that he knows he is insolvent, but, if you can prove he has contracted debts without expectation of payment, I think he ought to be sent to trial for that. Then further: giving fraudulent preferences; for fraud and breach of trust; and for an absolute inability to account for his deficiency of assets. Going upon that, I think the points can be raised when he applies for his discharge. I do not agree with my colleague that at the end of three months or six months the matter ought to come before the court. What I say is you ought to give a year, say, for the realisation of assets and the winding-up of the estate, and then make it an automatic process for the Official Receiver to set down a debtor's application for discharge at the end of the year, when the matter will come forward.

6838. Do you consider that the present procedure as to realisation works satisfactorily in case of business and so forth, where a man carries on a business which it may be desirable to dispose of?—So far as my personal experience goes, it works perfectly satisfactorily. At least I have no complaints made to the Board of Trade about my conduct in the realisation of assets. I should like to say, dealing with the question of discharge, that I am entirely against these pecuniary or personal orders against debtors, because some years ago I tried that course of procedure, and I used to get the court to grant the debtor his discharge subject to his consenting to judgment for a certain sum, and allowing him a certain amount out of his income for his maintenance; then the rest he was to pay over to the Official Receiver. I have had dozens of those cases where the debtor has to file an account. I used to write to him once a year, but in all probability the man had gone away and the notice was returned through the dead letter office. You could make nothing of it. I have now come to the conclusion that if it is a bad case the discharge should be refused altogether; if it is a moderate case it should be suspended, coupled of course with the additional provision which I should like to see, of giving the county court judge the power of committing a man, on proof of the commission of certain offences, to take his trial.

6839. Have you had any experience of the hardship that now is said to operate with regard to after-acquired property?—Yes. I have a case in my mind, but I cannot complain personally because I was trustee No. 1. That was a case where a receiving order was made in Chelmsford in 1895, and in June 1906 I ascertained that a receiving order had been made against the same man in the Great Grimsby County Court. Mr. Oscar Berry had been appointed trustee of the estate. I claimed the assests, and Mr. Berry of course had to hand them over to me. I made, I think, very reasonable terms with him, as he was upon the spot, or his agent was, and I allowed him to realise those assets, and paid him his out-of-pocket expenses, and, with the approval of the Board of Trade, I paid him a commission by way of remuneration, but of course the second creditors, the Great Grimsby creditors, got nothing at all, because all the money, after paying the costs, was paid over to me for my Chelmsford creditors. I do not think in a case like that I should adopt, or try to adopt, the case of Cohen v. Mitchell; I do not think it would work. What I suggest is, and the suggestion I have made in the memorandum is, that the creditors in both bankruptcies should share pari passu, and that the trustee of the second bankruptcy should have the conduct of the proceedings. I think that would be an equitable way of meeting the case.

6840. If the first bankruptcy was still in progress, would that not mean that the second trustee would interfere with the first one?—As a rule a man does not become a bankrupt again till two or three years after. I have always found that practically speaking the first estate is practically settled with. In the case I have mentioned my bankruptcy was in 1895 and the man failed again at Grimsby in 1906, eleven years after. As a rule he does not come into court for the second time under at least two, three, four or five years. That is my experience.

6841. I think that you would extend the provisions of the bankruptcy laws to all married women who incur debts?—I should with this exception; I certainly think that a bankruptcy notice should be issued against a married woman. I have been very much impressed by certain questions which were put to my colleague by Mr. Addison with regard to making a married woman bankrupt in all circumstances, or practically speaking all circumstances. I am very much afraid that if a law of that kind were passed it might lead to blackmailing, that the husband might get blackmailed, and if he was a nervous sensitive man he would very often have to pay up when he should not have to pay up. You can pass an Act by the severity of which your own object will be defeated; therefore, having regard to the opportunity I have had of considering the point, I would like to say this, that I would not make the bankruptcy provisions operative against a married woman unless you can show she has a separate estate of her own. Merely to make a woman bankrupt because she is married, for the pleasure or amusement of it, would, I now think, be somewhat harsh.

6843. I think in respect to the laws with regard to deeds of assignment your ideas are in harmony with those of Mr. Gibson?—They are. I am very strong upon this: that I think trustees under deeds of assignment, whatever else is done, should give security. I have had two cases before my notice; one was the case of a man whom I was instrumental in prosecuting. I put the matter in the hands of the Treasury, and he was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment at Reading Assizes. He was the trustee in the case of Davis v. Petrie. That was the case of a man who, as soon as ever he saw in Stubbs' Gazette or Perry's Gazette a notice that a man had a judgment against him, sent him a circular to this effect:—"I see that unfortunately you have had a judgment obtained against you; I will come down and see you with a view of making an arrangement to see what I can do for you." In all probability the defendant was an ignorant man not acquainted with business, and the man I have referred to used to take down a deed of assignment already prepared and get him to sign it. He would do that in Birmingham, Nottingham, Norwich, Reading, all over the country; and eventually the way he was caught was he was made bankrupt himself, and then the Treasury took him up. I have got a similar case now, which I have put before the Treasury. That man has not been made bankrupt; but there he defrauded an estate which came under my cognisance. I put that matter before the Treasury, but as no adjudication had been made against him—he had not been made bankrupt—they thought they could not interfere or do very much with him. All of a sudden they heard that he had gone to South Africa; and they have taken steps to see if they cannot get him back. He was a fraudulent trustee who simply lived on getting these deeds of assignment. He kept on living on them; that was his only business. The cases that have come under my notice are those I have mentioned, and a third in which the man, I believe, carries on business at Preston.

6844. You think that making them give security would stop that sort of trade, possibly ?—I think it must do to a certain extent, coupled with the fact that they would have to file accounts, and to account; because if they give security and they do not account, then you can call upon the Guarantee Society.

6845. I think you would be in favour of general assignments of book debts being made subject to registration ?—I should. I should only put this limit; that if a man is going to his bank to borrow £1,000 upon the security of debts for a short time, I do not think a transaction of that kind need be registered; but if he is in low water and attempts to get some more money and he can only do it by assigning these debts, then I think a transaction of that kind ought to be registered. I do not agree altogether with my predecessor's evidence upon the signs of apparent wealth when you see a man having a large stock, or something of that kind. I think you see that when a man has a large shop or place of business, it is a fair matter for assumption that he must also have book debts, and therefore you would give the trading community greater security if you registered those assignments.

6847. There is one other matter which you entertain a strong opinion upon that is mentioned at the end of your memorandum. Will you tell us about that ?—My position here is this; the official receivers frequently find that certain fraudulent arrangements have been entered into by debtors. It is a matter of common occurence where, unfortunately, he has no estate, where the debtor has got rid of his estate before it comes into bankruptcy. Now the Official Receiver has no fund to attack a transaction of that kind, and the Board of Trade, of course, by the regulations of the Treasury, are also prohibited from allowing him to use the State's funds for such a purpose. I entirely admit it is a difficult point; but I should very much like to see whether it could not be got over in some way by the Treasury allowing, in a case of that kind, where the opinion of counsel was in favour of the proposed proceedings, the public funds to be put at the disposal of the official receiver for those purposes. I admit the subject is one of great difficulty, and is arguable both ways. At the same time I would not do it merely in the interests of creditors, but to punish these people, and make them give up their ill-gotten gains. I had a case in my experience recently where a publican had his licence in his own name; but he said his wife lent him the money to purchase the public houses as he went from one to another. Last year he was driving home at night while drunk and ran down a couple of young girls, and very seriously injured them. They sued him, and recovered damages in the court. He at once files his petition; he has not got 6d. These two girls were, practically speaking, the only creditors. They got nothing. If I had had some funds at my disposal I could have made the wife disgorge some of the money she had received out of the sale of the the public house, because before judgment was obtained against him by these two young women in the court, he at once cleared out of the public house, sold it, and the wife received the proceeds of sale.

6848. (Mr. Peat.) With regard to your observations as to deeds of arrangement, I should like to ask a question or two. Is it your opinion, where all the creditors agree to a deed of arrangement, that in such a case it should be subject to investigation by the Court or Official Receiver ?—I think so. I think that where all the creditors agree the official receiver should have the right to investigate the affairs of the debtor, not necessarily by way of public examination, but to see whether or not there is a prima facie case for allowing the deed to remain in statu quo or whether it should be turned into a bankruptcy.

6849. You would withdraw from the creditors the right to compromise their debts with a debtor ?—The effect of my answer comes to that. I mean this, that of course I think the Court ought to have some hold over the affairs of a debtor who gives a deed of assignment. It ought to have some power of investigation.

6850. In every case ?—Yes.

6851. I conclude (if I am wrong you will correct me) that where a debtor does commit an offence which would be punishable under the bankruptcy laws, that he or his friends would not purge that offence by paying a very much more substantial dividend than his assets show ?—That would be a question for the Court, because it very often happens that a debtor commits serious offences of a very grievous nature, but his friends come forward and enable him to pay a very substantial composition, and then the Court very probably with difficulty and much heart searching, agrees to allow the composition to go through. I had a case of this kind in my own hands the other day, where a man committed certain serious offences against the Act; his estate showed 2s. 6d. in the £; his friends came and offered 7s. 6d., and I confess, although I did not absolutely oppose it, I put the whole of the facts before the Judge, and he, with some little hesitation, approved the composition on the ground of benefit to the creditors.

Mr. Cecil Mercer.

6852. You would not permit the creditors to be their own judges, even if they were unanimous on such a subject ?—It does not make a great difference if all the creditors agree to a deed of assignment, I agree; but I do not see any objection to the affairs of the debtor, so to speak, being overlooked by the Court even if all the creditors do agree.

6853. You refer to the registration of hiring agreements; you suggest that all of them should be registered ?—Yes, I do.

6854. If you take a furnished house for three months ?—No, I do not say that; I mean if you purchase furniture on the hire-purchase system. If you take a furnished house for three months that is not the same thing as buying your furniture upon the hire-purchase system.

6855. Will you forgive me for saying it is living in a house with furniture, therefore your creditor might assume that the furniture in the house was your own ?—Yes, that is so.

6856. Therefore the mischief is the same whether you buy on the hire-purchase system, or hire on a simple hiring system ?—Yes, if you put it in that light it is open to that construction. I see no distinction myself; if you give a bill of sale over your furniture the bill of sale holder has to register his security, and I do not see why, if you choose to pay for your furniture by instalments, a transaction of that kind should not be registered.

6857. Is there not a difference in the fact that the furniture, as Mr. Addison reminds me, is owned to begin with by the person who gives the bill of sale, and in the other case it is not owned by the person; it is hired by him ?—That is so.

6858. There is that difference ?—Yes, I admit that.

6859. Have you considered also the effect supposing you hire a yacht for three months or six months or twelve months and go for a cruise in the Mediterranean, that also would be a hiring agreement necessary to be registered as a bill of sale according to your view ?—Yes, that is so. see the difficulty in that way.

6860. Are you acquainted with the heavy trades very much, such, for instance, as colliery proprietors and machinery proprietors ?—No.

6861. You are not acquainted with that ?—No.

6862. Therefore possibly you are not well aware of the fact that heavy machinery and plant is purchased on the hire system ?—I am aware of that fact.

6863. Would you think those ought to be registered ?—No, I should make exceptions with regard to heavy trades. I do not think that applies very much, because in those heavy trades it is so well known that it is the custom to hire machinery and plant.

6864. You would make exceptions in those cases ?—Yes.

6865. Therefore you come down to the fact that it is the poor man, the struggling doctor or lawyer, or accountant, or some other person of that sort, who is beginning life, and starting with £100 worth of furniture, and paying for it out of his earnings, who is the man to be pilloried by a bill of sale ?—You must take of course the case in this way, that if a man cannot pay for his furniture he is holding himself out to be the owner of a very good houseful of furniture, and he is, to a certain extent, obtaining credit under false pretences, not perhaps knowingly, but that is the effect of it.

6866. We have dealt with that point, because if you hire a flat for six months and reside there, that would have to be registered as a bill of sale?—I see the difficulty.

6867. (Mr. Addison,) Let me follow that up. The furniture might belong to the man's wife, or might belong to others?—Yes, that is quite true.

6869. You say in marriage settlements there is almost invariably found a clause forfeiting the settlor's interest (that is, the man who settles) in the event of bankruptcy. It is the law now that a man cannot settle his own property to go away from him upon bankruptcy?—That is so.

6870. Would you propose to apply that to a case where a father, we will say, makes a provision for his son who is marrying, and the wife's father does the same?—I should not in a case of that kind. My view was this: that a debtor perhaps takes a life interest in a certain settlement; probably his father settles £10,000 upon him, and the settlement very often contains a forfeiture clause.

6871. Now we are at one. It was the use of the word "settlor" that made the difficulty?—Yes, that was an error on my part.

6872. Do you think it is any wrong to creditors that the parents of a husband and wife should provide a fund, the income of which should keep the family going, and say: "The husband shall receive the income of that fund. Of course he will apply it for family purposes, but if he should become bankrupt, then we wish the income to go to his wife." Is there anything wrong in that?—The effect of that clause is that the man still gets the benefit of the income.

6873. Because he happens to be the husband of his wife?—Precisely so.

6874. Is there any harm in it?—It is very hard on the creditors. Here is this man who has been living in very good style.

6875. Supposing it had all been limited to the wife in the first instance, as it might have been, and sometimes is?—Yes, it sometimes is.

6876. The position of the creditors would be precisely the same?—Yes, that would be so.

6877. Perhaps you have no very strong feeling on that, where the fund is provided by relatives?—No, I must confess I have not, having regard to what you have said.

6878. (Mr. Smith.) Do you approve of the suspension of discharges for offences under the Bankruptcy Act? I do not understand whether you approve of, or propose to do away with them?—Certainly, if a man has not been prosecuted, as has been mentioned, I should certainly still suspend the discharge, where any facts are proved against him. There are cases in this way. A man may have committed such serious offences against the Bankruptcy Act that he ought to be punished by being sent to prison. The offences may not be so serious, but nevertheless, he ought not to be let free upon the trading community for a certain number of years, say two or three years.

6879. You do not believe that it is a very great evil to the community to have so many undischarged bankrupts. You do not attach so much value to that as some of the witnesses?—Yes I do. That is why I say I should make it an automatic process for a man's application for discharge to be set down, say one year after the public examination is held.

6881. You think a man would come under that condition?—Yes, I have only about forty cases of discharges every year, out of about 140 or 160 bankruptcies. Most of those men get their discharges suspended for a couple of years. Therefore, at the end of that period they are free men, they have got their discharge; but there are a large number of men who become bankrupts and never apply for their discharge, and remain undischarged for ever.

6882. Is there any large number of the 140 against whom you would report no offence under the Bankruptcy Act?—Very few.

6883. So that in any case the suspension of two years would take place?—Yes.

6884. You do not think that that is such a great evil that it ought to be reformed?—No, not that; what I think is the great evil is that you have such a large number of men who are undischarged bankrupts, and will always remain such. I think there is a very great deal of distinction between a man who gets his discharge suspended for two years, and the man who never applies at all.

6886. It throws a large amount of trouble, I should think, upon the Official Receiver?—Yes, it does. Another thing is I would very much rather prepare my report upon a discharge a short time after the man had passed his public examination, when the facts are fresh in my mind, than wait some years and have to dig them out, when, perhaps, half the papers are lost. Then there is a difficulty about fees. As you know, when a debtor applies for his discharge, he has to pay certain fees, and if you make him apply, so to speak, against his will, he would not have to pay the fees.

6887. With regard to deeds of arrangement, I do not know whether I gathered correctly what you said. Did I gather you said you would allow the Official Receiver to interfere in the case of every deed of arrangement?—My opinion is that the Official Receiver ought to preside at the meeting of creditors.

6888. Would you interfere between a debtor and his creditors where he had executed a deed; would you set it aside?—If they are all unanimous, do you mean?

6889. Yes?—I see a difficulty if you do do it.

6890. Would you feel still more difficulty in interfering between a debtor and one of his creditors?—Certainly.

6891. And if in such a case his creditors in turn compromised with him, you would not propose to upset their arrangements?—No, I see the difficulty.

6892. You would not propose to upset an arrangement which had already been assented to by all the creditors in which there were no interests outstanding except the interests of justice?—No.

6893. You do not press that view?—No.

6895. In order that they may conduct proceedings at the expense of the vote where there are no funds of the estate?—Yes.

6897. Where there is an element of irregularity or misconduct to be exposed?—Yes.

6898. Does not the Board of Trade now sanction proceedings where that element is present at the expense of the vote?—No.

6899. Are you sure? I know that in my time it was so. I can say that for twenty years the Board of Trade were prepared at any time, on the representation of an Official Receiver, to advance out of public funds the expenses necessary to upset a fraudulent bill of sale, where there was no public object to be gained except that of simply preventing, we will say, a money lender having his will and committing practically fraud on the creditors. Where all the creditors were poor creditors, and there were no assets in the estate, the Board of Trade has again and again advanced the money ?—I know the Board of Trade has advanced the money in many cases to examine the witnesses when a question of misconduct has been reported on.

6900. Not only so, but I may tell you that the Board of Trade applied to the Treasury and got specific authot rity from the Treasury for expense to be incurred on that point. They place a certain sum of money at the disposal of the Board of Trade for them to sanction its use in cases where they thought on public grounds it was advisable to take proceedings. Would you go further than that ?—No, I can say this: in my experience the Board of Trade have never sanctioned that, or put at my disposal any public funds.

6901. Have you applied to them?—I have applied sometimes.

6902. Has this case which you mention here been put before the Board of Trade ?—No, that has not, because I have applied in previous cases, and the application has been refused.

6903. I should ask you to reconsider that, and to submit your cases to the Board of Trade, because I know that during the twenty years I was there a case was never refused where in my judgment, or in the judgment of the chief of the department, the solicitor, the permanent secretary, or the president, it was desirable, on public grounds, to institute proceedings which were not of a criminal character ?—I know I have applied in several cases, and I have been told by the Board of Trade they have no funds available for the purpose, and that I must get a guarantee from the creditors. I have been told that again and again.

Mr. Cecil Mercer.

6904. That is one of the conditions the Board of Trade have made, that they are to get a guarantee, because they will not do it until after every effort has been made. They do not want it known to the outside world that they are prepared to find money for upsetting a bill of sale ?—I did not have the bill of sale question only in my mind, but all these transactions.

6905. Have you any case to put before the Committee to justify your assertion that the Board of Trade will not spend public money on matters which are not of public interest ?—I do not put it that way; all I say is that I understood the Board of Trade were precluded by the Treasury; that is quite a different thing.

6906. I think you will find that is a mistake ?—I am very glad to hear it. I did not suggest the Board of Trade would not do it.

6907. It is not in the Board of Trade vote for a very good reason ?—I thought that the regulations of the Treasury precluded this being done.

6908. You have made a mistake there, I can assure you. It was one of the first things we did, to write to the Treasury and ask them for authority to spend money in such cases. They said: "We will not authorise you to spend money, but we will grant you a certain discretion to act as you like in the matter;" and the matter has been repeated to them every year, and the cases in which money has been spent appear and the account is sent to the Treasury in cases such as that. I think it comes to under £1,000 a year, but I think it has done very useful work in upsetting improper proceedings, but it would not do to encourage creditors to come and take proceedings at the expense of the vote ?—I was not aware of that.

Mr. THOMAS HALL WINDER, called; and Examined.

6909. (Chairman.) I think you have been official receiver in bankruptcy for the districts of Bolton and Wigan for a great many years ?—Since the Act was passed.

Mr. Thomas H. Winder.

6910. We are indebted to you for what I am going to bring before the Committee presently, a very carefully made out statement relating to the administration of estates. I will not deal with that now. In the course of your experience I suppose you have administered a great many estates and done a great deal in bankruptcies ?—About on the average sixty cases per annum.

6911. Before you became official receiver had you had anything to do with bankrutpcy at all ?—Yes, under the old Act.

6912. As a trustee ?—No, as a solicitor.

6913. The first question that I should like to deal with relates to the present procedure as to the investigation of a debtor's conduct by the Courts. You, I suppose, conduct a good many public examinations ?—I conduct them all.

6914. As a general rule, in your district do other people, like creditors or solicitors for creditors, take much part in the public examinations ?—Very little.

6915. Does the creditor's trustee often take part in them ?—Not very often. I may say here that as a rule any question he wants to put he puts through me.

6916. Do you think that the procedure is efficient for obtaining a full disclosure of a debtor's conduct and affairs ?—Yes, I do.

6918. As regards the procedure for obtaining punishment of a debtor, do you think that that requires amendment ?—I do.

6919. In what respect ?—The present method is, in my opinion, rather cumbrous. In the first place I have to draw up a report which has to show distinctly all the evidence upon which I rely. That is passed on to the Board of Trade, who consider it, and make suggestions, and those suggestions are attended to. Then when the Board of Trade sanction the report so that I may proceed with it, I have an application to make to the Court. The Court then makes an Order permitting the prosecution. It seems to me that Section 165 of the Bankruptcy Act intended that the County Court Judge should exercise the powers of a stipendiary magistrate, and I think it might be convenient if the County Court Judge were to be asked to hear, in the first instance, the evidence, and that he himself should commit the case direct to the Assizes or to the Quarter Sessions, as was evidently intended by that section. I think that would shorten the procedure.

6920. Have you at all considered the question of whether it would be expedient to give the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction power to deal with bankruptcy offences ?—I have.

6921. What is your opinion about it ?—My opinion is that the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction could deal with them quite as effectively as the Quarter Sessions, or even the Assizes. The Courts of Summary Jurisdiction do now take cases of far more importance than any bankruptcy prosecution, and they are capable, as magistrates, of dealing with such cases.

6922. Assuming that that jurisdiction was given, would it at all impose too much additional work upon the official receivers to have them to attend Petty Sessions ?—No, I think not. I think the official receivers could do the work, could take the case personally before the magistrate.

6923. The next matter I want to get your opinion upon is one on which we have had a great deal of evidence. In your opinion should a debtor's conduct be brought before the Court in every case whether he applies for a discharge or not ?—Yes, I think the proper course is that the official receiver should make a report to the Courts at the close of the bankruptcy in every case. It would impose more work, but it would be there, and it could be referred to at any future time. It is extremely difficult now to make a report upon a bankrupt's conduct seven or eight years after he has passed his examination.

6924. Do you think it would be advantageous and practicable to require every bankrupt at a specified time to come up and have his discharge dealt with, whether he asked for it or not ?—Yes, I think in every case on public grounds the question of a man's discharge should be considered at a certain period, say six months after he has passed his examination.

6925. That leads me to the next subject which is in the second clause of our terms of reference. As we know, of course, such things as not keeping proper books and speculation are matters for which a debtor's discharge may be suspended, but that is all that happens now. Do you think that any of those things could properly be made punishable by imprisonment ?—I do. I think after twenty-five years' experience I am perfectly satisfied that men have no right to trade who have no knowledge of books, and if they will trade, and if they will lose money knowing they are insolvent, they certainly deserve punishment in a criminal sense.

6926. Do you think it would be safe to give the jurisdiction to inflict such punishment to the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction ?—No, I should prefer that the Judge of the County Court should deal with matters of that sort.

6927. Might I ask you whether, briefly, your view of procedure in a bad case would be that the man should be publicly examined, that then there should be a report upon his conduct, and that he should come up and have the report considered, and the Judge award what punishment or what discharge is to be given to him ?—Yes, I do.

6928. Is it asking you too much to ask if you could specify which of those, as they are now called, "facts," might properly and safely be made punishable ? I mean, beginning with not keeping proper books, have you considered that ?—I have not looked at the facts in that light.

6929. Perhaps one may take it, from what you have just said, that not keeping proper books would be one of the things ?—Yes, it would.

6930. And perhaps gambling ?—Yes, gambling and betting, and I rather think that certain cases of fraudulent preference ought to be dealt with in a criminal sense.

6931. Having regard to an Act which has passed, we do not trouble with Clause 3 of our terms of reference, but with regard to Clause 4, as regards realisation and administration of property, we should like very much the benefit of your experience as to whether the existing procedure could be amended in the sense of securing a more immediate realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt, especially when it consists of a business, or something like that, which is liable to deterioration and rapid depreciation in value ?—With regard to a business which is saleable as a business, I do not think we can improve the present methods very much, because we can sell the book debts together with the stock and goodwill at once, but where there is no chance of selling the book debts, and they have to be collected, we are very seriously handicapped, and some two years ago about thirty-six or thirty-seven of the official receivers made a representation to the Board of Trade upon the subject. Perhaps I might refer to that.

6932. Are you referring to departmental regulations of the Board of Trade ?—Yes. as to the collection and sale of book debts.

6933. (Mr. Chamberlin.) You said thirty-seven official receivers ?—Yes ; we sent a letter to the Inspector-General in October, 1905. Those were non-salaried official receivers. The reason why only those signed, I might mention, was because the non-salaried official receivers meet once a year in a kind of association, and we discuss difficulties with regard to bankruptcy practices, and one of our difficulties was the collection and sale of book debts. We found ourselves hampered, and the consequence was we sent to the Board of Trade this letter in which we point out our views with regard to it. Shall I read it ?

6934. (Chairman.) Perhaps you would favour us with what that representation was ?—This representation was to enable the official receivers to deal with book debts, and to get the Board of Trade to alter the regulation that they must not sell book debts unless they are admitted ; that was the effect of this regulation, unless book debts were admitted by the debtors in writing we were not to sell. That was really the result of a question put in the House of Commons ; and a promise was given by the then President of the Board of Trade that these debts should not be sold unless they were admitted.

6935. (Mr. Peat.) And a very proper regulation.

6936. (Mr. Chamberlin.) That is what is referred to as being seriously handicapped as to selling the book debts ?—Yes, because in cases which passed to trustees the ordinary trustees were not so handicapped. They were allowed to, and do to-day, sell all debts whether they are admitted or not.

6937. (Chairman.) What do you suggest as an amendment ?—I look at Section 27. Section 27 was evidently drawn up with the idea that it might be used for the purpose of compelling persons who owed money to debtors to pay under an order of the court. I have, and so have other official receivers, endeavoured to use this section, because the section says that the Court may on application summon any person reported to be indebted to the debtor, and if the person so summoned admits it the Court may make an order ; and under a rule, it is Rule 72, the order of the Court is to be similar to a judgment. We find that the registrars object to using that section for that purpose. They say : "This section is intended for the purpose of getting evidence only, and is not to be made use of for the purpose of collecting debts" ; and in discussing the matter with my own registrars they pointed out very serious difficulties in the way of issuing execution and in the way of following up by commitment, and also that their forms are not adapted for it, and that it would have a very serious effect upon the fees of the Court. For instance, I might go in with a batch of fifty, and issue a few summonses, including three defendants in a batch, for 3s. 6d., and the effect upon the number of plaints issued might, if this were adopted, in the course of a year be very serious. I can understand very well that a registrar paid according to the number of plaints does feel an objection to this. I have never pressed it strongly because I felt it would be rather wanting in tact to do so against the opinions of my own registrars. I submit that that section was intended for the purpose, and that it might be strengthened for the purpose of enabling official receivers who have to administer small bankrupts' estates to get out of this difficulty of collecting book debts.

6938. Is that the view of the thirty-eight non-salaried official receivers which you obtained ?—No, that is not a view that I have obtained from them, that is simply my own view.

6939. You say you have collated the opinion of the thirty-eight ?—Yes, I did, and I find some of them have used the section for that purpose, others found that their registrars would not issue a summons for that purpose. I may say that the official receivers, as a rule, do not use this section for that purpose, but I submit that it might be amended so as to be used, because I think that the official receiver as an officer of the Court ought to be assisted by the Court. The intention was to make small bankruptcies simple and inexpensive; it would prevent the tremendous delay which takes place now in getting in a few book debts.

6940. Have you now to issue plaints in order to get them in ?—We find that the issuing of plaints is so expensive, and the delay is so great, that we try to get them in through other ways. I do not put debtors into the County Court. If I were to issue a summons to-day in the Bolton County Court I should not get it heard for a month. The expense is too serious in very small debts.

6941. You say that you think that the section might be strengthened. I do not quite see how it could be strengthened, because it is so extremely explicit; it says if the person on examination admits that he is a debtor of the estate, an Order may be made on him to pay, and if the County Court judges and registrars will not make such an order, it is a little difficult to see how you can strengthen the legislation ?—Rule 93 says every order of the Court may be enforced as if it were a judgment of the Court to the same effect, but I cannot get these witnesses to come unless I pay them conduct money.

6942. I am afraid that you must always have to pay conduct money, must you not, otherwise the man cannot come ?—If I summon a debtor before the County Court, I do not give him conduct money then. I do not see why they should be considered. They owe the money, they have been applied to twice, and the original debtor probably has done his best to get the money. I do not see why they should be considered. Then the difficulty is there is no power to commit for any costs of the application if they do not pay. That has been decided.

6943. At any rate we see what the difficulty is, and how in your view it could be remedied ?—If the County Court Act were amended, as we have heard it may be, by a proceeding analogous to Order XIV., we should then get on very well indeed.

6944. Your experience of Order XIV. is perhaps not so large as that of some people; you would not speak with such enthusiasm about it if it were ?—I know there is considerable difficulty, and very often men get liberty to defend when they ought not to.

6946. Supposing that he acquires property on credit, what is your view as to the position of the persons who have given credit to him after bankruptcy; a mortgagee for instance ? If an undischarged bankrupt buys land and mortgages it to a person who does not know of the bankruptcy ?—It is a great hardship upon the mortgagee, and I think he should be protected.

6947. That is to say you would protect all transactions for value without notice ?—Yes.

6948. Do you think the present law requires any amendment with regard to the salary and income of a bankrupt after bankruptcy ?—After the decision in re Shine, I think it is pretty well understood what Section 53 means. We have had considerable difficulty in ascertaining what the word "salary" meant, but I think after that decision we know pretty well where we are.

6949. There is one other matter in Clause 6, about married women. Do you think that it would be advisable to adopt any system of registration for people who trade in feigned names, or in the names of persons other than themselves ?—Yes, I do. I think that there ought to be a register kept of all persons trading in the name of other people, whether it is a short name, or a feigned name, or a company, but not limited.

6950. With the consequence that if the registration is omitted, the transactions shall be void, as it is in the case of money lenders ?—Yes.

6951. Do you think the present state of the law as to a married woman becoming bankrupt is desirable, the sort of immunity she enjoys; would you extend her liability ?—I would.

6952. So that the married woman who trades should be liable to be made bankrupt like a man ?—Yes.

6953. Have you any suggestion to offer in reference to deeds of assignment by a debtor to his creditors ?—There are many objections to deeds of assignment; I have considered the objections to the modes of carrying out deeds of assignment, and I have drawn up a few he e, which perhaps I might read. They are: (1) Because the trustee is not generally chosen by creditors, and no security is given. Nor is there power to deal with fraudulent trustees. (2) Because there is no independent inspection and examination of the creditors' claims. (3) Because there is no provision for an independent inquiry and examination into the debtor's assets, in order to ascertain if the values are fairly stated, or if assets have been omitted. The debtor is not examined on oath. (4) In cases where a composition is offered there is a tendency to minimise, and in cases of assignment to exaggerate, the values of the debtor's estate. (5) Because creditors are frequently omitted through want of care in keeping proper accounts. (6) Because it often happens that certain family claims are postponed, and consequently the deed is only partial in its operation as a discharge. (7) Because in cases of composition a debtor will make a promise to pay a higher composition than he ought, and, failing a guarantee for the last instalments, the debtor is not released, but the matter is simply hung up, and paves the way for future difficulties. (8) Cases occur in which debtors have gone on trading and incurring fresh liabilities, and then failed, whereby a fresh set of creditors have been created, and many of the old creditors have been paid out of the pockets of the new ones. I had a very good illustration of that case in Bolton in 1905, where a debtor had made a deed of assignment, his trustee instead of selling and winding up and paying a dividend, had said to the debtor practically: "Go on with your business, receive all the money, pay it into the bank, and when you have paid me 10s. in the £. then you can carry on your business." The result was that he created new liabilities, the trustee received the 10s. in the £., and then the debtor could go on no longer, filed his petition, and the result was a fresh set of creditors who got about 1s. or 1s. 6d. in the £. (9) In more than one case the trustee has, instead of realising, carried on the business and taken the profits, allowing the debtor a small weekly payment for his services. In this way a fresh set of creditors has gradually been formed to compete with the old ones. (10) It is a general practice to hold a meeting, but it often happens that the whole matter is arranged by circulars and assents obtained on the bare statement of affairs of the debtor. (11) Generally the operation of assignment and composition deeds is an assistance to fraud, and the hushing up of commercial scandals, and as creditors generally refuse to spend money to either prosecute or make a hostile examination into the debtor's affairs, many men remain corrupt traders who ought to be cleared out. (12) Either make deeds valid under proper safeguards and supervision or render them invalid entirely.

6954. Are those views the result of your own experience? —They are what I have gathered from a variety of sources.

6955. Are they the result also of a consultation with other official receivers ?—Yes, by circulars.

6956. I do not think that on the last question referred to us, as to the registration of certain classes of securities, you have any special views ?—No, I have not.

6957. (Mr. Barker.) You have spoken as to a bankrupt offering a larger composition than the estate would justify in your opinion; how would you prevent that ?—You cannot prevent it. A debtor is pressed and urged by the creditors to increase his offer.

6958. He pays we will say 10s. in the £. The principal creditors know perfectly well he is paying more than the estate can afford to pay; the consequence is they do not trust him again, but other people come in ?—Yes.

6959. And then there is another bankruptcy ?—Yes.

6960. I have seen cases of that kind. Have you had cases come before you where the bankrupt before his bankruptcy has assigned or sold his book debts ?—Occasionally, but very rarely.

6961. Not very often ?—Not very often.

6962. Do you think when a man sells his book debts the fact should be registered, the same as a bill of sale is ?—That would have a very prejudicial effect on trade, I think.

6963. It has a prejudicial effect on the creditors when he sells the book debts and they know nothing about it ?—Yes, but the selling of book debts is rather a difficult matter, and I cannot say that I have considered it very much.

6964. I suppose you find as soon as a man goes bankrupt the estate shrinks a good deal ?—Yes.

6965. And that is occasioned a good deal by the length of time it takes to wind up the estate ?—No.

6966. For instance, a shopkeeper has got a certain amount of stock and he fails, an accountant comes in and takes his stock, and it never hardly realises anything like the amount ?—No.

6967. That is what I mean by the shrinking. There is an irregularity, to put it in a very mild way ?—Yes, that is so. I thought you were alluding to the delay.

6968. The delay would occasion a greater shrinkage ?—Yes, it does.

6969. Can you suggest to us how you would shorten the time ?—I think the time allowed for calling the first meeting of the creditors is rather long, fourteen days. But then an official receiver is not under any obligation to wait for realising the estate until the meeting of creditors, providing the creditors do not object. If adjudication is obtained there is nothing to prevent him realising at once. There is no reason why the estate should shrink by delay.

6970. If these matters could be dealt with by the County Court judge it would shorten the proceedings considerably, would it not ?—In what way, I do not understand.

6971. If the whole thing came before the county court judge, and he had greater power than he has at the present time, would that not be a means of shortening the time ?—I cannot understand how they could deal with it any more than they do. I do not understand the question put in that way.

6972. You do not think there is any way in which the county court judge could shorten the proceedings ?—No, I do not.

6973. Then it is impossible to shorten the proceedings ?—The County Court judge has nothing to do with it until the matter comes before him for discharge.

6974. (Chairman.) It is the registrar who does it all.

6975. (Mr. Barker.) Supposing the County Court judge took the position of the registrar, would that not shorten the time a good deal ?—I do not think so; the County Court judge only sits about once a month.

6976. Some bankrupts are very indifferent as to whether they get their discharge or not ?—Yes, I should think about 90 per cent.

6977. It seems a long time that these things are hanging about before a man gets his discharge ?—That is so.

6978. You do not think it is very important that that should be shortened ?—I think the question of the man's discharge, as I have said, should be considered.

6979. By the county court judge, and he should deal with it ?—In every case.

6980. He would know more about the facts than anyone else, because he was in the district ?—He would not know anything except what the official receiver or the trustee told him of the application.

6981. You would get more witnesses in the district, would you not ?—The question of witnesses never arises.

6982. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I think you said that people with no knowledge of books should not be allowed to trade ?—I am coming to that conclusion.

6983. That would stop a large number of small traders, would it not ?—I daresay it would; I know it is a very drastic idea, and perhaps could not be carried out, but it is really serious the number of persons who trade without the slightest idea of whether they are doing better or worse.

6984. I suppose you would go further still, and say that everybody, by law, should be compelled to keep books ?—I cannot go so far as that, but really I think there ought to be some punishment for a person who continues trading for years without having kept any books, and without having any knowledge whatever of his position.

6985. Would you like us as a Committee to report that in our judgment anybody who does not possess a knowledge of books should not be allowed to trade ?—I will not say that.

6986. That was your evidence, was it not ?—Yes, but I will not say that.

6987. You spoke about the official receivers appearing to prosecute. Would the official receivers be able to perform that duty ?—I think so. I should allow them to do it, if they could, and if they could not they might employ a solicitor.

6988. (Mr. Richardson.) With regard to book-keeping, I take it that you mean simply that the Court should have power to punish for the non-keeping of books ?—Yes.

6989. That they should simply have the power ?—Just have the power. I think that would have a great effect.

6991. In certain cases, I take it, you would make it certain that punishment would follow ?—Yes.

6992. Your experience has been like that of everybody else, I have no doubt, and you think that persons who are able to keep books and cease to keep books, should be punished ?—Yes.

6993. That is the most serious difficulty, I take it ?—Yes.

6994. When traders have for years kept books and ceased to keep books, having ceased with the deliberate intention of mystifying the accounts, they prevent the transactions for the last year or so being discovered ?—That is so.

6995. In such cases I take it your opinion is that they should be certain to receive some punishment ?—Yes, I think that would tend to purify trade.

6996. It would act as a great deterrent ?—Yes.

6997. It would make them keep books of some kind, so that their transactions could be traced in some way or other ?—That is so.

6998. You have raised a new point to-day, so far as I remember it, that is with regard to private arrangements with creditors. I was interested myself in such a case at one time, where a debtor made an arrangement with his creditors totally unknown to anybody except the creditors involved. It occurs to me that that sort of thing should be registered in some way, and all deeds of arrangement should be treated as acts of bankruptcy; what is your opinion ?—I have known cases of that sort.

6999. Would you have the law treat that as an act of bankruptcy, and that it should be registered in some Court ?—I can scarcely go as far as that.

7000. You would still permit a debtor to make a private arrangement to pay 9s. 3d. in the £ to his creditors for the time being, they all of them agreeing to take this 9s. 3d., and nobody knows anything about it except the creditors involved. They quietly slide out, as has been suggested, and a new set of people come in, knowing nothing at all about this bankruptcy, because it is a bankruptcy; the debtor has made this private arrangement, and nobody knows about it. Do you not think it would be desirable to have such a transaction registered?—I should not like to go so far as that.

7001. (Mr. Peat.) There are one or two questions I wish to put as to deeds of arrangement. One of your objections was this: that there is no hold upon a fraudulent trustee?—My first remark is that there is no power to deal with fraudulent trustees by the creditor, except through the Court of Chancery.

7002. You can get at them?—Yes, you can get at them by the Court of Chancery.

7003. Or the County Court?—I have never had a case of that sort, or ever heard of a case.

7004. Perhaps that was in your mind. The second objection was that there was no inquiry into the assets?—No independent inquiry.

7005. Just so. What do you describe as independent?—Independent inquiry by an unprejudiced person.

7006. Do you not think the trustee is independent?—No, he is not always independent. Many of the trustees are persons appointed by the debtor.

7007. Have you any experience of a trustee, say a chartered accountant or an incorporated accountant, not doing his duty in that respect to the best of his power?—I have not had so much to do with deeds of arrangement as other solicitors, and my objections are only such as I have come across in my own experience, which is not of the same extent as that of a solicitor in full practice who deals with deeds of arrangement. I have only heard of these cases.

7008. Your other point was that family claims were in some cases postponed?—Yes.

7009. Do you think that is a serious offence?—I do. I think it is a very serious thing, because they crop up afterwards when the man goes bankrupt.

7010. Do you think it is a serious prejudice to a trade creditor, to get paid before a family creditor?—I think that creditors should be paid alike.

7011. Do you find that under present arrangements the claim of a wife is postponed?—Yes, that is so.

7012. What is your objection to a family claim being postponed?—My objection is because it crops up afterwards to the detriment of other creditors, who have trusted him, and do not know of it.

7015. At the same time you still hold that opinion, knowing that a wife's claim is postponed to the claims of the creditors?—Yes.

7016. You still hold the view that a family claim should be treated as different to a wife's claim?—Yes, because a family claim is generally of a very much larger number of persons, who are included in the term "relatives."

7017. Have you any personal experience of a deed under which family claims were postponed?—No. I have been at a meeting of creditors where family claims have been postponed.

7018. In order to allow of a bigger dividend?—In order to allow of a bigger dividend to creditors.

7019. Still you think that is prejudicial to the creditors?—To the subsequent creditors, not to the creditors under the deed.

7020. Have you any experience of family claims being absolutely released under a deed of assignment?—I have not.

7021. You have very little experience of deeds of assignment, I understand?—I have never drawn them up. I am not allowed to practise in insolvencies in any way or shape.

7022. I understand you to say that your information on this point is largely hearsay?—Largely hearsay, I must admit that.

7023. Another of your objections was to a trustee carrying on the business under a deed of assignment, and paying the debtor a salary. Is there any real serious objection to that?—It turned out so in the case I quoted.

7024. That is, I suppose, that possibly there was money lost, or what was it?—Money lost.

7025. In carrying on the business?—The debtor got goods from a fresh lot of creditors.

7026. Would not the trustee be responsible for those goods?—He was for a time, and then he allowed the debtor to go on and get goods for himself, all the time receiving this dividend.

7027. That is not an objection to a deed of assignment, it is an objection to a debtor, subsequent to a deed of assignment, carrying on business in his own name and incurring debts?—Yes.

7028. That is your objection?—Yes, but the deed itself was never carried out.

7029. I am afraid many deeds are not carried out. Have you ever compared the results obtained from deeds of assignment with those obtained from bankruptcies?—No, I have no information as to that.

7030. So, your sweeping condemnation of deeds of assignment is theoretical?—It is a good deal hearsay; what I have heard creditors say.

7031. (Mr. Addison.) You speak of sixty cases a year administered, are those where the estates are under £300?—Under £300.

7032. With regard to not keeping proper books, have you thought what direction could be given as to what books should be kept by a debtor?—I think if he kept a simple cash book and a ledger that would be a sufficient compliance.

7033. And a stock book?—Yes, if he can. I think he might do that. I should not ask for a complete set of books.

7034. Would you expect a little shop-keeper to keep a ledger?—I think he might, they most of them keep something in the shape of a ledger.

7035. I see you approve of the registration of traders trading under other names. Have you thought out where and how that register should be kept?—It might be kept at the County Court.

7036. Of each district?—Yes.

7037. Not a central registry?—No, I think that there might be a central registry with a register in the County Courts.

7038. But to be effective it should be a local registry?—Yes, like bills of sale.

7039. You have not worked out the details how it would be kept and rectified from time to time, have you?—No, I have not followed it out.

7040. Speaking of married women being made bankrupt, I think I understood you to say married women who traded?—Yes.

7041. (Mr. Smith.) Do you think that anything can be done to realise a debtor's stock under a receiving order more quickly than at present?—I do not think so.

7042. Do you think that anything can be done to realise book debts more quickly?—Of course if we are allowed to sell them, admitted as well as unadmitted, we could realise them quickly.

7043. Do you find that the restriction on selling them keeps the estate open for a longer period?—It does.

7044. To what extent?—I was discussing that matter with one of my clerks before I left, and we came to the conclusion that it would reduce the time by at least two months; in many cases the book debts keep the estate open two months longer than they need be kept open.

7045. And in some cases I suppose longer than that?—Yes.

7046. Do you think that you ought to have power to sell book debts?—As a last resource, whether they are admitted or unadmitted.

7047. Do you think there is any hardship in the sale of book debts to anybody?—Sometimes some of the book debt buyers are very harsh.

7048. But they can only enforce them with the sanction of the County Court judge?—That is so.

7049. The County Court judge has entire control over the question of enforcing a book debt?—Yes.

7050. As to the manner in which it is to be paid, and the extent to which it is to be paid?—Yes, and the instalments are very light as a rule.

7051. Do you think that the County Court judges generally act harshly in the matter?—No, they never do.

7052. They act leniently?—Very leniently.

7053. Then do you see any valid objection to, or is there any hardship whatever in, the sale of book debts to a professional man, where there is the trouble of collecting these small debts which are, perhaps, payable by a series of instalments over a long period?—I do not.

7054. To a professional debt collector?—Some of them are harsh, but the judge stands between them and prevents any great injustice.

7055. I understand you to say that even the harshest debt collector cannot inflict hardship on the debtor unless through the county courts?—That is so.

7056. It is the county court judge who is responsible if harshness is inflicted upon him?—Sometimes execution will be issued, and that the county court judge has nothing to do with. That is where the harshness comes in.

7057. In levying execution upon small amounts of furniture?—Yes.

7058. Is not the debtor's property protected to a certain extent?—Only with regard to his bedding to a certain amount.

7059. At all events at present this delays the closing of estates and the realisation of assets?—It does.

7060. And for that the official receiver is not responsible in any way?—He cannot help himself, he has to do justice to the estate and get in all he can.

7061. You said something about calling the first meeting earlier. Do you think it would be practicable. The official receiver can at present call the meeting immediately after the receiving order is made?—Yes, he can, but it gets to fourteen days as a rule.

7062. He is not required to spend fourteen days?—No, he can call the meeting within fourteen days certainly, but he has to wait until he gets the statement of affairs and prepares his observations.

7063. He cannot shorten the time for lodging the statement of affairs?—Not very well.

7064. He can urge the debtor to be as quick as possible?—And that we do.

7065. Is it possible to shorten the time in any way?—Not for the statement of affairs.

7066. Or the first meeting?—I think it might in many cases be shortened.

7067. Why is it not shortened at present?—As I understand in many cases they are kept back by the debtor, and we cannot be sure when the statement of affairs will come in.

7068. In those cases where the delay is caused by the debtor's action you could not shorten it?—No.

7069. And you do not see any way of shortening it?—Not practically.

7070. I wanted to know, if you really thought that it was possible to shorten it, whether you could suggest a way in which it could be done. My own impression is that it is impossible to shorten it where an official receiver does all he can; at present, with the powers at his command, it would be impossible to shorten the time?—We have to gazette it.

7071. You would not propose to do away with that?—No, I would not, but you might have it a little shortened; I cannot say how much. We do the best we can to get the meeting called as soon as possible.

7072. (Chairman.) Perhaps you might agree with this view, which I am quoting from one of the Judges' judgments, as to not keeping proper books. "To my mind the debtors have committed that not slight but serious offence against morality which is struck at by the Bankruptcy Act if they have failed in the keeping of books of account in an ordinary and proper business way. They have hardly kept any books at all. It is suggested that this is a slight offence; it is not a slight offence, it is a serious offence which ought to be met with punishment"?—I quite agree with that.

7073. (Mr. Barker.) You said it is only women in business that should be made bankrupt. Do I understand you to say you would confine it to women engaged in business?—Yes, women engaged in business.

7074. Supposing a married woman gets into debt considerably, and makes bets, and gambles at cards and borrows money, you think she should not be made bankrupt?—Where she does not carry on business.

7075. Yes?—That is a very special case.

7076. It is not an uncommon case?—I think she should be made a bankrupt

Mr. Charles Edwin Harrop, called; and Examined.

29 May, 1907.

7077. (Chairman.) You are a director of Sam Harrop, Limited, of Fennel Street, Manchester, and have been in the provision trade for about seven years?—Yes.

7078. I think the customers of your trade are mostly shopkeepers?—Yes.

7079. You have had a considerable practical experience of dealing with that class of traders in cases of insolvency?—I have.

7080. I think you have been interested in about 100 cases in the last four years?—Yes.

7081. In the course of that I think you have attended many meetings of creditors?—I have.

7082. One of the questions that engages the attention of this Committee is the operation of deeds of assignment with creditors. I want to know if you could give us some illustrations of your practical experience as to how these things work?—The conclusion I have come to in connection with deeds of assignment is that there is no oversight; the law charges, to me, have seemed excessive; the trustees' remuneration has been heavy; and there is no information to be gathered from them. If you want to make any inquiries from them, they do not take any notice of you, practically, in my experience, in cases where I have consulted them. There is a trustee appointed under a deed of assignment, and the only thing we get, possibly, is the statement when the estate is wound up saying that there is a dividend of so much; and usually they say they will be pleased to answer any questions; but when the questions are asked it is a question whether they are so ready to answer them as you are to put them. The thing became so bad in the provision trade that the Wholesale Provision Association of Manchester brought the matter up in connection with the appointment of a secretary; and they have appointed a secretary who is an accountant, and they later on got, in connection with the association, a solicitor to take care of the insolvency cases, so that the secretary of the association might get the trusteeship of the matter, so that they would be able to have some oversight of the matter by the Committee of the Wholesale Provision Association.

7083. So that when the assignment is under the supervision, as it were, of that Association with its responsible accountant as trustee and its solicitor to manage the case, it is pretty satisfactory, is it ?—Yes, that is what we find is satisfactory.

7084. But when it is outside that ?—We try all in our power to get the Secretary of the Association made the trustee.

7085. When the thing is quite outside the influence of that Association, is it then that you find difficulty and trouble ?—The trouble is to get it from the accountant who has got the matter in hand, and get it into the hands of the Secretary of the Association.

7086. Can you give me one or two illustrations ? I think there is one parti ular estate which you would mention ?—Yes.

7087. Was your company a creditor of that estate ?—Yes, for £9 5s. 7d. ; quite a small amount, but still with the frequency with which they come it gets serious. We got a dividend of 6¾d. in the £ on that £9.

7088. In that particular case ?—Yes. That is a case where I have written to the accountant in the matter several times, and can get no report. I returned the dividend that we received, and he did not acknowledge that at all.

7089. Do you remember what the assets and liabilities were ?—The assets, according to the statement presented to the meeting, were £317 11s. 4d.

7090. Do you know what the assets realised were ?—£141 14s. 6d

7091. In that case you say the dividend was 6¾d.?—Yes, it was that in one case and 4¾d. in another case that the accountants sent particulars of to the Secretary of the Association. 6¾d. is what they sent.

7092. I think there is another case you wish to bring to our attention. ?—In that case there was no meeting of creditors called, simply the solicitor sent a notice.

7093. Was that the case of a deed ?—Yes.

7094–5. Was the trustee an accountant ?—I presume so.

7096. You merely presume so, you do not know anything about him ?—I understand he is an accountant.

7097. I see you say in your statement to us that he showed one item of sale of £115 17s., and that the total amount distributed in dividend was £11 5s. 11d. ?—Yes.

7098. Had you any difficulty in that case in the way of obtaining any information, or anything like that ?—I got this letter of the 23rd January, 1906: "In reply to your favour of this morning, we have had no communication from Messrs. Harrop, and as the time has expired to close the matter we presume them to have assented to the deeds under the late decision of the Court of Appeal. I do not suppose they would be in any better position at the present time if they had not assented, as the debtor does not seem to be making any headway." I might say in this case that the man, previous to the deed of assignment, had been fined £53 odd by the Court for selling margarine as butter; and that was put down as the reason of his having to call his creditors together, although there was a deficiency of £551 set down in the statement.

7099. What is the conclusion that this case and various other cases leads you to: that there ought to be more supervision over trustees under deeds, or what ?—Without any official oversight we have no means of getting a check on the accountants at all as to what they put down.

7100. You would like to see some kind of official control over them ?—Undoubtedly; so that we could ask questions if we thought things were not satisfactory to us. In such a case, with a statement of this sort, we would have lost all the money and not gone to any bother at all. We got no benefit out of it. Out of a matter of £87 we got £1 9s. 1d. as dividend.

7101. Have you also been creditor in many bankruptcies of small traders ?—Yes, we are continually having them.

7102. Have you been led to any conclusion as to such matters as fraudulent preference by a debtor, or not keeping books, and whether he ought to be more severely punished than he is now ?—I have two cases in mind, one that happened last year, where the man had been trading on the co-operative principle, and giving a dividend of so much, 3s. in the £, and he paid that dividend a week or a fortnight prior to consulting his solicitor. We got, in that case, a composition of 5s. in the £, I believe.

7103. Was that a bankruptcy, or under a deed ?—Under a deed. The other case was a case that has been under Mr. Winder's notice, a case where the Christmas club creditors had been paid out before he failed. He paid anything between £70 and £100 odd to those in the Christmas club ; we had no proof of it, only it was said so.

7104. You say that was a fraudulent preference ?—I think it is. The man in that case certainly bought turkeys and geese from Ireland, and the people in that case never got a cent, except what composition they may get out of the bankruptcy. That is just a matter where the people who supplied the best part of the goods for the Christmas club did not get their money, or only a composition.

7105. You mean the members of the Christmas club were paid, and the other people get nothing ?—Yes, that the creditors had to pay for the Christmas club practically.

7106. Would you be in favour of making that sort of thing punishable ?—Yes, because it seems to me a very easy matter from what I see of it ; if the man has no conscience, or he is a dishonest man, he can get through very easily, because he tells lies after lies, and there is no proving he is telling lies, so far as I can see.

7107. You would like to see the law made more stringent upon debtors who did that sort of thing ?—Yes, because they must know very well how much they are owing, but we can never get at the assets. The trouble in my experience is in finding what they have done with the money. I know of two cases in bankruptcy where they could not tell, a month before the bankruptcy practically, what had become of the money. I think at least a month before the bankruptcy they should know pretty well where the money had gone to. They are the only two cases in bankruptcy that I have gone into at all. In one case we did get some £23 or £24 I believe out of a composition, where the man said practically he had no book debts, stocks or profits, where we were in for £280 odd, within a very short period, say a month or six weeks, prior to his bankruptcy.

7109. Your view as a man engaged in trade is that the debtors get out too easily ?—Yes, to the detriment of the creditors.

7110. Do you find many cases in which debtors have lost money by betting ?—Only this case, as far as I know of, in which the debtor said he had betted £20 in the street, but I am told by people who know that that is an impossible thing to do.

7111. (Mr. Chamberlin.) It would spoil the market ?—I do not understand betting, but I applied to people who know, and they said it was impossible, that a man like that would have to make his bets at a club, perhaps £5 at a time. He said he had done it in the street, and we could not prove to the contrary. He never brought in the evidence of the man with whom he had made the bet, and he did not know who he was, and would not get at him. I found three sets of statements from different books, and yet we could not bring that home to him, he said he had lost them, and that was the end of it. That is all I could get out of it. I went to a great deal of trouble in that case. I went round personally, as far as I could find them out, to the persons he had done business with, to get copies of their invoices, to see if I could find out about it by that means. I did prove to my own satisfaction that his stock was not accounted for. In that case the receiving order was made, and I think between two or three days afterwards the business was going on as usual in his wife's name. I expect our stock had gone into the business, the business was carried on under the same conditions exactly, the only alteration was that it was carried on in his wife's name, it was M. M. instead of F. M.

7112. (Chairman.) Is there anything further you would wish to add ?—I have made a note that I think where a trader who is hopelessly insolvent makes bets, he should be treated criminally. I think also in connection with books, if they put their receipts in a cash book it would tell what money they had received, and that would help anybody to check off what they had done with the money. At the present time we cannot get that. I have gone through some particulars and I would briefly like to put before you the question of absconding debtors. Five cases have come under my own notice, in which we have not been able to make any headway at all, they have got out of the country, and we cannot trace them. We thought the law was too cumbersome or difficult to get to work so that we could arrest them before they got away. I have a case here where the man had owed nearly £20, and he told us to call on Monday for the account, but he had gone away that very day. Another question is the length of time that these men trade after insolvency. I have a case where the debtor knew of his insolvency in 1901 and the receiving order was not made until 1905. I think in such cases as these, something ought to be done. Then there was a case where the unsecured debts were £254 3s. 11d. and the deficiency was £254 3s. 11d. I would suggest punishment by imprisonment for continuing to trade with knowledge of insolvency. Some consideration should be shown to creditors. We suffer also from the credit which grocers give ; we often find, after letting the grocer have his stuff, that from his not getting his accounts from his customers he is unable to pay us.

THIRTY-NINTH DAY.

Wednesday, 5th June, 1907.

PRESENT

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE, Esq. (Chairman).

JOSEPH ADDISON, Esq.	W. M. RICHARDSON, Esq.
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.	JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. JOHN HENRY HADWEN, called ; and Examined.

Mr. John H. Hadwen.

7113. (Chairman). There was a matter that was mentioned to us which we understand you were desirous to correct. One of the witnesses who came before us, Mr. Carrington, stated, I think, that you had said to him that in your opinion hire purchase agreements need not be registered, or something to that effect ; and we thought it best that any correction of that statement should appear on our shorthand notes, which will ultimately go before Parliament, in the same way as the statement. Would you kindly tell us what is the correction that you would like to make ?—I have not a copy of Mr. Carrington's statement, but I understood that he attributed certain statements to me which I perhaps made to him in a confidential interview that I had with him. Exactly what they are I do not know. I may say I have seen Mr. Carrington since I received the invitation from your Secretary to attend this Committee to-day, and he has told me the purport of his evidence. I do not know that I object really to what he told me, except as representing the London Association for the Protection of Trade or the Association of Trade Protection Societies.

7114. I will tell you exactly what Mr. Carrington said to us : " I, on April 11th, of this year, was making special enquiries from the principal trade-protection societies, and on that day I went to Messrs. Stubbs, Gresham Street, and interviewed a gentleman, who, I believe, was their manager, Mr. M'Kenna, who said if all hiring agreements were to be registered it would positively be valueless as regards any protection to traders ; the number would be so great that the keeping and entering of the same would be almost too enormous, even if a Government Department were set aside for it, and certainly as regards making a weekly gazette of same, it would be absolutely impossible ; and he also said if there were a barrier like bills of sale, and hiring agreements were registered above a certain amount, he still could not see how they could issue a weekly register. On that I made a remark that without a weekly register in the gazette it would no doubt be valueless. On the following day I interviewed Mr. J. H. Hadwen, the Secretary to the London Association for Protection of Trade, Berners Street, W., and also the Secretary to the Association of Trade Protection Societies of the United Kingdom. I asked him his views as regards registering hiring agreements, and he said at once that it would be a very vast and expensive business, and positively of almost absolute uselessness. No trade-protection society could keep a record of same or issue a weekly gazette, and it would be a serious injury to the commerce of the country, and ruination to the employment of many thousands of people. He further was good enough to tell me that a motion that came before the Association of Trade Protection Societies in 1904, to register hire agreements or, as an alternative, to affix labels to hired goods, was beaten by an overwhelming majority as to both movements. Mr. Hadwen was good enough to point out how little registration would be of any use to the general tradesmen, for the reason, he said, that they had any number of subscribers who made use of their debt-collecting department ; and often a subscriber would come to them and say : ' I want you to collect this debt.' The society would then look the debtor's name up on their books, and say to the subscriber : ' Whatever made you trust this man ? If you had come to us, with your privileges as subscriber we could at once have told you the man was not worth trusting with twopence ' ; and the subscriber generally answers : ' Oh, I did not give you a thought ' " That is the interview which he described. Is there anything you would like to say upon that ?—I was informed by Mr. Chamberlin, a member of your Committee, that certain statements had been attributed to me ; and I wrote him a letter which really conveyed my views ; and if you will allow me, I will just read that letter. I said : " The interview was a confidential one and I was not informed that any expression of opinion that occurred would be quoted publicly before an official enquiry. I gave no authority for my views to be expressed. I specifically stated that the matter had never been brought before the London Association for Protection of Trade, and therefore, I had no authority to speak on behalf of the association in the matter. The only reference to the Association of Trade Protection Societies was that I informed the interviewer that a resolution dealing with the necessity of registering hire purchase agreements and providing for a distinctive mark on goods obtained under such agreements was submitted to the annual meeting on May 11th, 1904, and lost. I specially mentioned that any views I expressed were my own individual opinion and must not be taken to represent the associations I have the honour to be secretary to." I have only to add that at the annual meeting of the Association of Trade Protection Societies held on May 16th, this year, the following resolution was passed by the delegates: "That in view of the losses frequently sustained by traders through giving credit to persons whose household furniture and effects have been obtained on the hire purchase system, and in order to prevent fraud being practised by persons who, whilst appearing to be actual owners are merely hirers thereof, this association is of opinion that all hire purchase agreements relating to household furniture and similar effects exceeding £20 should in future be registered."

7115. (Mr. Smith.) Was that passed unanimously or by a majority?—It was passed by a majority. I will give you the history of that if you like.

7116. (Chairman.) Yes; as it was subsequent to the time when those witnesses were called it would be very convenient if you did?—At the recent annual meeting (16th May, 1907) of the association, the following resolution was moved: "Hire Purchase.—That in view of the losses frequently sustained by traders through giving credit to persons whose goods have been obtained on the hire-purchase system, and in order to prevent fraud being practised by persons who, whilst appearing to be actual owners, are merely hirers of goods in their possession, this association is of opinion that all hire-purchase agreements should in future be registered in the same manner as bills of sale." The mover of the resolution said cases had come before his notice of persons living in well-furnished houses where the whole of the furniture was held under a hire purchase agreement, and when it came to a question of execution, there was nothing to be had. The seconder of the resolution, who represented a society in the south of England, said it was a question that the small retailers on the sea-coast had continually brought before them, both with regard to boarding-houses and others. When action was taken, it was found there were no assets, the whole of the furniture being claimed by some hire purchase association. He foresaw very great difficulty in carrying out the resolution, but at the same time he felt something ought to be done to stop the apparent possessor of plenty of means getting in and making the retailer lose a good deal of money. The resolution was opposed by various speakers. The general feeling was that some special form of registration might be devised, but not in the way bills of sale are registered. After considerable discussion a resolution was subsequently passed in the form that I have already read to you, that all hiring agreements of more than £20 should be registered. The meeting realised the difficulty of securing an effective system of registration, but they thought that something should be done to protect the interests of trade creditors. How that could be brought about they felt disposed to leave to the Bankruptcy Committee.

7118. Does that mean a single transaction, or does it mean more than one? A difficulty would arise, if £20 was agreed upon, that a person might get two of £10 each, or three of £10 each or four of £10 each. Does that mean a person owing an aggregate of £20 on hire purchase agreements?—I think it would refer only to a hire purchase agreement of £20 and upwards.

7119. One single transaction?—Yes.

7020. (Chairman.) Goods of that value?—Yes; of course it was limited to household goods, furniture. I should like to point out the very great difficulty of keeping a register. Supposing it was decided that all hire purchase agreements were to be registered, I am informed by those who are competent to form an opinion that there are something like two million hiring agreements entered into every year. A register of those hiring agreements would be absolutely valueless unless a record was kept of them in the various trade protection offices. I have referred to the weekly gazette, and I find that bills of sale average about 7,000 a year. There are, I am told, about 10,000 hire furnishing agreements of over £20 entered into weekly, something like 500,000 a year. If they had to be registered, of course the labour and cost would be prodigious. The London Association keep a complete register of all bills of sale and county court judgments over £10, and bankruptcies, and so on; and the number of entries yearly amounts to about 200,000.

7121. (Mr. Smith.) Bills of sale alone?—Bills of sale, County Court Judgments over £10, bankruptcies, deeds of arrangement, and so on, and other information that comes into the office. That is, the complete register amounts to about 200,000 entries a year. If we had to enter 2,000,000 hiring agreements, it would necessitate a staff of about thirty clerks and an expense of at least £3,000 a year, which, of course, would be absolutely impossible, the traders would not pay for it; and unless we kept a record of those agreements in the office, they would be absolutely useless to the trader. A trader sending an inquiry in to us would expect us to tell him whether there was a hiring agreement in existence or not.

7122. (Sir Edward Fithian.) Have you any data for the 2,000,000 other than that furnished by the hire traders themselves?—No, I have not.

7123. There are no official statistics at all in the matter?—There are not.

7124. Probably the bulk of those hiring agreements would be under £30?—500,000 are said to be hire furnishing agreements over £30.

7125. That is, of course, a mere estimate of the people who are interested in the hirings on these agreements?—Yes. I am told there are 10,000 furniture dealers in the United Kingdom; and I suppose if you put them on an average of one a week that would be a near estimate, considering that I am told that some of the large houses in London issue as many as fifty to a hundred hire purchase agreements a week.

7126. Are you aware that we have had evidence here from the chief person who is responsible for the registration of bills of sale and deeds of arrangement in which he says that he expects there would be no difficulty whatever in effecting an arrangement of this kind for registering hiring agreements?—No; I am not aware. I have not seen any of the evidence that has been submitted to this Committee. Of course if there are 2,000,000 entries it is difficult to see how they are going to be recorded.

7128. Then, passing to another topic, as we have the advantage of having you here, I think the association passed some other resolutions at this meeting of May 16th, not dealing with this question, but general questions of bankruptcy, did they not?—Yes; they were as follows: "Bankruptcy.—That in the case of bankrupts who have committed offences, or who have neglected to keep proper books, the Judge, in passing the last examination, should order their cases to be enquired into by the Public Prosecutor's Department, and it should thereupon be the duty of the Public Prosecutor to investigate such cases, and where they demand or deserve it, he should thereupon prosecute. Deeds of Assignment.—That inasmuch as trustees under deeds of assignment are unable (by reason of a decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Davies v. Petrie) to sue debtors within three months of the date of the deed, a communication be made to the Committee on Bankruptcy Law expressing the hope that they will recommend an amendment of the law which now occasions liability to loss by defaulting debtors. That the time for a creditor to exercise his power to present a petition in bankruptcy—the act of bankruptcy being a deed of assignment—ought to be limited to one month after notice is given. Bankruptcy and deeds of arrangement.—That the following amendments are urgently required in the interests of creditors:—(1) The stringency of the Bankruptcy Law should be increased: (a) by enlarging the existing punishable misdemeanours; and (b) by placing a bankrupt, until he has obtained his discharge, under stricter supervision and control. (2) The Deeds of Arrangement Act should be amended with a view of bringing the trustee more under control by securing : (a) an early meeting of the creditors ; (b) the giving of security by the trustee ; (c) the audit of his accounts when required by creditors ; (d) power to the Board of Trade to remove a trustee on proof of his incompetency or failure to carry out the trusts of the deed. Assignment of Book Debts.—That it is very desirable all assignments of book debts should be registered as are bills of sale, and no unregistered assignment of book debts should be valid against a trustee in bankruptcy or deed of assignment. Bills of Sale Law Reform.—That this Association views with concern the unsatisfactory result of the Bills of Sale Law ; the Association considers that it should be made obligatory on persons applying for a bill of sale to give fourteeen days' public notice of intention to execute a bill of sale and that facilities should be provided for lodging caveats against the filing of the bill by persons who deem their interests jeopardised thereby. This association desires that representations be made to the President of the Board of Trade, to urge that the law relating to bills of sale should be amended on these lines. Hire Purchase.—That in view of the losses frequently sustained by traders through giving credit to persons whose household furniture and effects have been obtained on the hire purchase system, and in order to prevent fraud being practised by persons who, whilst appearing to be actual owners, are merely hirers thereof, this Association is of opinion that all hire purchase agreements relating to household furniture and similar effects exceeding £20 should in future be registered."

Mr. PETER MORISON, called ; and Examined.

Mr. Peter Morison.
5 June, 1907.

7129. (Chairman.) I think in fact you are Secretary in Scotland to the Association of Trade Protection Societies, but we are asking you for the benefit of your assistance, because I gather you have had very large experience in the administration of Scotch Bankruptcy Law ?—I am Secretary to the Scottish Trade Protection Society and I have a very large experience in the administration of the Scotch Bankruptcy Law.

7130. I think you date back as a Writer to the Signet to the year 1862 ?—Yes. S.S.C. we call ourselves in the branch of the profession to which I belong, Solicitor before the Supreme Courts.

7131. I think a good deal of your practice has taken you into the administration of insolvencies ?—It has.

7132. I think you were examined as a witness before the Committee which was appointed to consider the administration of justice in general in Scotland which led to the Court of Session Act ?—I was ; and I have been examined as a witness before several Committees, for example particularly Mr. Bass's Committee, which was aimed at the abolition of imprisonment for debt in England, and there was another Committee, of very much the same kind recently, before which I was also examined as a witness as to the practice in Scotland.

7133. The Committee have had the advantage of reading the Memorandum which you were good enough to send to us, but, you being experienced in these things, we want also to have your verbal evidence in order that it may be recorded in our shorthand notes. I think it would perhaps be most convenient if I took the matters which are referred to us in relation to the law of England and asked you what is the corresponding law in Scotland. The first of them deals with the investigation of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent, and his punishment. Perhaps we might ask you to assist us on those points ?—Taking the paragraphs of the Terms of Reference in their order with the corresponding paragraphs of my Memorandum, the first relates to the investigation of the conduct of a bankrupt and his punishment should his conduct call for such. Here I think it is proper to explain that there is a very great difference between the administration of the Criminal Law in England and that of Scotland. Speaking broadly, it may be said that all crimes and offences in Scotland are investigated by the Public Prosecutor, and in practice no private person prosecutes any person for a crime or offence ; indeed he has not the title to do so without the concurrence of the Lord Advocate or of the Procurator-Fiscal. Even where a man is assaulted, or his property stolen, the practice is for the public prosecutor to act against the offender. What the complainer does is to report the occurrence to the public prosecutor, who on his own authority investigates and decides whether there is to be a prosecution or not. In all the subsequent stages the person wronged is merely a witness pure and simple and nothing else. The Lord Advocate is the chief public prosecutor, but under him are the Procurators-Fiscal, numbering about 176 in all. That is to say, there is one Procurator-Fiscal for each county in Scotland, and one for each burgh and town of any size. The Lord Advocate has as assistants the Solicitor-General and four advocates of standing called Advocate-Deputies, and there is a solicitor of standing called the Crown Agent, with a considerable staff of clerks in the Crown office, where all crimes and offences of importance are dealt with. The Procurator-Fiscal in each county and burgh has a staff of deputies, assistants, and clerks sufficient to cope with the crimes and offences arising in his locality, and the police act under the orders of the Sheriff, the Lord Advocate, and the county and burgh Procurators-Fiscal. When a trustee or creditor has reason to suspect the conduct of a bankrupt all he has to do is to report the matter to the Procurator-Fiscal who investigates the charge, and if he is satisfied there are grounds for it he brings the offender to trial. With all this machinery at command the Committee can readily believe that there is little need for strengthening the law in Scotland with regard to the investigation and punishment of offences against the Bankruptcy Laws. Moreover, the influence of the Public Prosecutor pervades the whole system. A trader hovering on the brink of a crime knows that he has little chance of escape if once the Public Prosecutor is put on his track, and he knows that there will be no creditor anxious to hush the matter up for fear of diminishing his already too slender dividend by the expense of a costly prosecution.

7135. Is that at a meeting of creditors, or before the Court ?—Both at meetings of creditors, and also at the public examination of the bankrupt before the Court. The Commissioners, or what you would call the Committee of Inspection, also investigate the conduct of the bankrupt, and the trustee is bound to make a report to the creditors upon it ; and, if there is anything wrong or suspicious, all that has to be done is to make a complaint either to the Lord Advocate, if it is a very serious matter, or, if it is a smaller matter, it will go to one of the Procurators-Fiscal of the district.

7136. Coming to the next point, as regards the discharge of a bankrupt, you favoured us in your original Memorandum with information on that point. Perhaps you could give it to us concisely now. In your Memorandum you gave us the three ways in which a man gets a discharge ?—I did : By composition, by deed of arrangement, and without a composition. At the first statutory meeting of the creditors, that is at the meeting for the election of the trustee, the bankrupt may submit an offer of composition, and if the creditors resolve that it be entertained, the trustee forthwith intimates the same to all the creditors, supplies them with a vidimus of the estate and notifies them that a second meeting shall be held after the public examination of the bankrupt to decide upon accepting the offer. Here I may explain why the second meeting is postponed until after the public examination of the bankrupt. It is this : that if there is anything suspicious or anything that requires investigation in the conduct of the bankrupt, it may have an influence upon the resolution which the creditors arrive at at the second meeting. If a majority in number and nine-tenths in value of the creditors assembled at the meeting accept such offer it is forthwith reported to the sheriff, who, after hearing any objections by creditors, if he finds that the offer is reasonable, and that it has been duly made and accepted, confirms the resolution which discharges the bankrupt. You may ask me what is the meaning of "if the offer is reasonable." I will give you an example of a case which was decided to be not reasonable where the state of affairs showed a dividend of 5s. in the £, and the bankrupt came forward and offered 7s. 6d. in the £. That gave rise to a suspicion that there was something wrong in the state of affairs, although they had not been able to investigate it, and the sheriff held that that was not a reasonable offer. Of course if the state of affairs showed 7s. 6d., and only 5s. was offered, I have no doubt the sheriff would hold also that that was not a reasonable offer. Then the second is by deed of arrangement. Usually the deed of arrangement takes the form of a composition contract, and the main difference between it and the composition arrangement is that the deed must be subscribed by four-fifths in value and number of the whole creditors of the bankrupt. You will observe that that is of the whole creditors; in the other case it was the majority of the creditors assembled at the meeting. There may also be a question as to the reasonableness of the deed of arrangement, and if the sheriff finds that it is not reasonable he may refuse to interpose authority, but if he does not object to the deed on this ground it becomes final, and the bankrupt obtains his discharge in terms of the deed of arrangement. That is to say the deed itself provides for his discharge. Then the next matter is where the bankrupt neither makes an offer of composition nor of a deed of arrangement. He may apply to the court for his discharge after the second statutory meeting of creditors—that is after his public examination—on condition that every creditor concurs; on the expiration of six months from the date of the bankruptcy, if he has the consent of a majority in number and four-fifths in value of his creditors; at twelve months from the date of bankruptcy provided he has the consent of a majority in number and two-thirds in value of the creditors, and at the expiration of eighteen months if he has a majority in number and value of his creditors, and after two years he may apply without the consent of any creditors. Where there is nothing against the conduct of the bankrupt and no suspicious circumstances attending his failure he has very seldom difficulty in obtaining the necessary consents of creditors, and the vast majority of bankrupts are discharged at one or other of the periods mentioned. A great number of them are discharged about the second period, the first is rather high, but most of them, I should say, are discharged about the second or third period.

7137. Then comes a very important provision in your Memorandum I think?—There is an over-riding provision contained in the Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881, to the effect that a bankrupt shall not at any time be entitled to his discharge unless it be proved that a dividend or composition of not less than 5s. in the £ has been paid out of the estate of the bankrupt, or that the failure to pay 5s. in the £ has, in the opinion of the Judge, arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible. The minimum dividend is in my opinion too small and ought to be increased to 10s. in the £, especially in view of the proviso which enables the judge to grant a discharge if he is of opinion that the bankrupt should not be held responsible for the smallness of the dividend. The Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, Section 13, makes it a punishable offence for a debtor if, being indebted to an amount exceeding £200 at the date of his sequestration, he has not for three years before said date kept such books or accounts as, according to the usual course of any trade or business in which he may have been engaged, are necessary to exhibit or explain his transactions. That provision appears to be pretty wide, and it is thought that it would not be improved by making the penalty more severe. The difficulty arises from the unwillingness of juries to find that the failure to keep books arose from an intent to defraud, and it is thought to be doubtful whether Parliament would grant power to punish a bankrupt merely because he kept no books, provided that this failure did not arise from an improper motive. I may say there are two propositions put forward. The first being to make the failure to keep books absolutely an offence—i.e. whether the failure springs from a dishonest intention or not. The second proposition is to continue the proviso contained in the Act of 1880, which enables a bankrupt to escape if he proves that his failure to keep books did not arise from an intent to defraud. The Society which I represent, and which largely consists of the leading merchants in Edinburgh, objects to the first proposition, because it may give rise to injustice. Failure to keep books on the part of a solvent trader is no crime and no one suggests that this should be made a punishable offence. A sudden calamity for which a trader is in no way to blame may cause his bankruptcy. Until this calamity happened his failure to keep books was in the eye of the law innocent. The three years which have elapsed cannot be recalled, and thus a course of conduct which was innocent while it was going on may be converted into a crime by a subsequent event unless the proviso of the 13th Section of the Act of 1880 be maintained. It is not proposed to make it a punishable offence for any merchant not to keep books. We could understand that, and if that proposition be enunciated, possibly we would agree to it, but that is not the proposal; the proposal is, after he has been sequestrated, if for three years before his sequestration the bankrupt has failed to keep books. Now, it not being an offence not to keep books if a man is solvent, some supervening event for which the bankrupt is not liable may occur: to take an example which is very familiar in Scotland, the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, which ruined a great many people in business. These people were committing no crime when they were carrying on their business without keeping books, but because the failure of that bank rendered them bankrupt, they have become guilty of an offence. That is the objection that our Society has to the second proposal.

7138. Do your society, and do you, not approve of the provisions in Section 13 of the Act of 1880?—Yes, as it is. There has been a suggestion to change it, and to abolish the proviso which renders it a crime only if the failure to keep books is with a fraudulent intention.

7139. Do you approve of its being limited to debtors whose total liabilities are over £200?—Yes. The reason of that is that there are a great many street hawkers, for example, and you must draw the line somewhere; people who really do not keep books, people in a very small way—fishermen and one thing and another, who are in one sense traders and liable to be sequestrated—and that is the reason of the limitation. I believe it was our society who had something to do with originally putting in or suggesting the limitation to £200.

7140. In your experience has this offence often been the subject of prosecution?—Not very often.

7141. When it has been so has there been any difficulty in proving the case?—No. Here again you must go back to the Scotch administration of the law. The Procurator-Fiscal investigates a case, and, if he is satisfied that he will not be able to prove it, he does not go on with it; therefore there may be a great number investigated although they have not been brought to trial, but when they are brought to trial they are almost always successful.

7142. How is the case proved? Are the books shown to the Judge or the jury, or is evidence given by the trustee who says that they are insufficient?—Evidence is given by the trustee; he is almost invariably the first witness. Of course, in Scotland the evidence of one witness is not sufficient, and there is generally a supplementary expert who states that it is impossible, from the books which this bankrupt has kept, to ascertain the true state of his affairs at any time. Then the other side may lead expert evidence to the other effect, and it is for the jury then to decide between the two classes of evidence.

7143. The jury or the Judge do not look at the books themselves unless they wish to see them?—That is so, but they would not as a rule. If the books are of any extent a jury or a Judge at the trial could make nothing of them.

7144. Do these offences usually come before juries, or are they dealt with by the magistrates?—That is an offence which is considered sufficiently grave to require a jury trial.

7145. That is generally before the sheriff, I suppose?—Yes, very seldom does it come before the High Court.

7146. Have you considered at all the question of whether the area of offence might with advantage be enlarged to embrace not only not keepingbooks, but other offences?—There is quite a schedule under the Act of 1880; I am speaking of Scotland only. I should not like to enumerate them from memory, but under the

5 June, 1907.

Act of 1880, for example, failure to disclose a true state of his affairs is a punishable offence in Scotland; and absconding from justice, or going away in certain circumtances, is also a punishable offence according to the law of Scotland; and attempting by a fictitious statement of osses to account for the insolvency is also a punishable offence.

7147. And, of course, a good many others?—Yes.

7148. (Mr. Smith.) Gambling?—That is a somewhat doubtful term; if that is speculating on the Stock Exchange, No. Betting is not an offence.

7149. Is there any reference in that section to gambling?—No, not as that, but I think there is a reference to reckless dealing, like reckless trading, and one which I have marked is selling goods below cost within a certain period of having obtained them on credit.

7150. (Mr. Addison.) These are all set out in the Act of 1880?—Yes.

7151. (Mr. Smith.) Are they all qualified by intention to defraud?—Yes, the qualification is unless he proves that it was done without an intention to defraud. The onus of proving it is put upon the bankrupt. It is assumed against him to begin with that it is a crime, but he may discharge the assumption by proving that it was done innocently.

7152. (Chairman.) Are you troubled at all in Scotland with the undischarged bankrupt, or generally does the system produce some finality so that he gets a discharge in some way or other?—No, we are very much troubled, as almost everyone is, with the undischarged bankrupt. He is a man who does not obtain his discharge in Scotland. The trustee is bound, when a bankrupt applies for his discharge, to make a report to the Court upon his conduct, and to state whether in his opinion the bankrupt has been guilty of any improper or undue conduct—it does not mean fraudulent conduct, but if it is improper or undue—and whether he has given the necessary assistance for realising and distributing his assets, made a full and fair surrender of his estates, and acted correctly throughout; and if the trustee makes a report adverse in these respects, the bankrupt will not obtain his discharge. I am merely mentioning that a discharge may be refused in cases somewhat less than fraudulent cases.

7153. Do you have any instances of men who never apply for their discharge at all?—A large number. Then, again, there is the 5s. limit; unless the bankrupt can show that he is not responsible for the 5s. limit he will not obtain his discharge; he must satisfy the Court that the small dividend has not been due to his conduct.

7154. Do you find at all that undischarged bankrupts trade in other names, as they do here?—If we could prove that it was the bankrupt trading in the other name, the Court would not regard the other name, because it does not matter what name the bankrupt trades under in Scotland. A man can trade under any name; the whole question is, who is the trader? If it be the bankrupt that is the trader, the trustee would seize the property at once, as part of the bankrupt's assets, but the difficulty is, since the passing of the Married Women's Property Act a woman can carry on business, and she and her husband arrange that the wife is to be the trader. They both say that that is the case, and it is almost impossible to get behind that. She says: "I pay my husband his wages, so much, I keep the house and I do all the trading." The difficulty is to prove the fact that the bankrupt is in reality the trader, although there is very strong suspicion that it is just a subterfuge; the thing is put in the wife's name in order to defeat the Act, but the fact is so obscure that we cannot get below it.

7155. We have been practically relieved from the third clause of our reference, which refers to solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, by an Act of Parliament which has been passed. Passing on to our fourth question, could you tell us whether the system of realisation in Scotland works effectively and expeditiously?—Very much so. I think I can describe it. There are elaborate provisions of the Scottish Statute (the Act of 1856) which act as a powerful check upon any lax conduct on the part of a trustee. Section 125 requires a trustee within four months after the award of sequestration—you would call it the date of adjudication—to make up accounts of the whole funds of the bankrupt recovered by him, and if any property be not realised he must specify the cause which prevented this, and within fourteen days after the expiry of the four months the Commissioners must meet (that is, the Committee of Inspection, as you would call it) and audit and examine the trustee's accounts, and state in their docquet whether the trustee has lodged the funds of the estate in bank according to the requirements of the Act. Section 126 requires the trustee within the said fourteen days to examine and adjudicate upon the claims of the creditors, admitting such as he deems valid to a ranking, and rejecting those which he thinks ought not to rank. There is an appeal to the Court by any creditor whose claim may be rejected and also by any creditor who thinks that any claim is improperly admitted, but these provisions need not be noticed here. Section 128 requires the trustee, within six months after the date of the award of sequestration, to make up a scheme of ranking and division of the funds, and Section 129 requires him forthwith to pay the creditors their dividends. Not only must he pay the creditors who are there to receive the dividend, but if the creditor does not come forward the trustee cannot keep the dividend in his own hands, he must consign it forthwith in bank so that it gets out of his hands. Similar processes are to be repeated on the expiry of eight months from the date of the award, again on the expiry of ten months. Similar processes are thereafter to be repeated after every period of three months. Copies of the trustee's accounts are transmitted to the Accountant of Court, who examines them, and if he sees any item standing unrealised, he considers the reasons stated by the trustee to have prevented its realisation, and if dissatisfied he calls upon the trustee for an explanation, and failing a satisfactory explanation he may complain to the Court. Then there are the Commissioners who are bound to audit and examine the trustee's accounts at each of these periods and docquet them. If they see any cause of complaint they can state it in their docquet. This notification going to the Accountant of Court, as it must go along with the accounts, would certainly cause him to call upon the trustee for an explanation. But failing all this any creditor can go to the Accountant of Court, who files the trustee's accounts, and if the creditor can point to anything unsatisfactory or even suspicious the Accountant will immediately call upon the trustee for an explanation. But the mere existence of these powers is sufficient to keep trustees up to the mark. Most trustees are Chartered Accountants who derive a considerable part of their incomes from such appointments and the mere fact of a complaint to the Accountant of Court would exercise an adverse influence on the trustee from obtaining similar appointments, while a complaint by the Accountant to the Court would certainly be fatal to the trustee's future prospects of obtaining trusteeships. I may say here that there are very few cases of a complaint by the Accountant to the Court; it is generally where a man commits some serious crime and absconds and goes wrong altogether that it goes that length. The machinery which we have in practice generally suffices to keep trustees up to their duty. You will see that four months is not a very long period to enable a trustee to realise an estate. Of course, there are two months allowed them to deal with the claims, that is to say the trustee must examine the claims of the creditors and see whether they are good or invalid, and two months is allowed for that. At first the processes are repeated every period of two months, and then every period of three months; and at all these statutory periods the trustee's accounts have to be examined by the Commissioners, and they also go to the Accountant of Court.

is real property every sequestration is recorded in what we call the register of inhibitions and adjudications, and that is a public document, and any person can examine it, in fact there are searchers who search these documents for a small fee, and that at once discloses the fact that the property is owned by an undischarged bankrupt, and no man would lend money upon that, and if he neglects to search that register it is his own fault.

7157. (Mr. Addison.) Is that kept for each county, or where is it kept ?—For the whole of Scotland there is a general register kept in the Register House in Edinburgh. It applies to the whole of Scotland, and it is kept up.

7158. There are no local registers ?—There are local registers in one sense, of sequestrations kept for the convenience of the creditors in the locality to deal with the affairs of the bankrupt, for example if there is a sequestration occurring at Inverness, all the accounts of that bankruptcy are kept in Inverness.

7159. But no separate register of sequestrations ?—The register of sequestrations is a register kept by the Accountant of Court in Edinburgh, and it is kept for the whole of Scotland. It is indexed up, and very easily searched. There is no difficulty whatever in searching out who is a discharged or an undischarged bankrupt. There is a provision in the Act that when a bankrupt obtains his discharge a notification is placed on the margin of the register that he has been discharged.

7160. (Chairman.) If there is no second bankruptcy then the after-acquired property goes to the trustee of the bankruptcy ?—That is for the discretion of the Court. There is no absolute rule. It is put in the discretion of the Court, and in all my experience what the judge has done has been to allow the creditors of both bankruptcies to rank in it. If the first trustee has resigned or ceased to act, then the second trustee gets the property, but he is compelled to rank the whole of the creditors of the bankruptcy, the first creditors as well as the second, pari passu.

7161. Passing on to the subject of married women, can a married woman be made bankrupt under the Scotch law ?—Yes, if she trades, or even if she has separate debts and separate estate of her own. She is just treated exactly the same, so far as bankruptcy is concerned, as a man or an unmarried woman.

7162. Does that occur at all frequently ?—Not frequently. Occasionally there has been a married woman made bankrupt; they are more under the Cessio Acts (which is the form of small bankruptcy that generally applies) than under sequestration, because the sums are not very large. There is nothing in the law of Scotland to prevent a married woman, if she is trading, or if she has debts to a sufficient amount, being made a bankrupt.

7163. Is the law of Scotland in respect of settlements becoming void on bankruptcy like ours ? May a voluntary settlement be set aside ?—A voluntary settlement if made in insolvency, or within a certain period of it, is liable to be set aside in certain circumstances. In Scotland the law is this, that if there is a voluntary settlement in favour of a wife it must have been made at a time when the settlor was solvent, and the settlor must be able to prove that, apart from the settled property, he was solvent. Secondly there must be a trustee interposed; the settlor cannot keep the property in his own hands; and, thirdly, it must be what the Court, in the exercise of its discretion, will say is a reasonable provision for the wife, taking into consideration the circumstances of the parties.

7164. Is there any disability in a wife to prove in her husband's bankruptcy if she is a creditor ?—Yes, there is a great disability. She is what we call in Scotland a conjunct and confident person; she must therefore have very clear evidence of being a true creditor. How a wife's claim generally arises is in the case of money lent. For example, a bill by a bankrupt in favour of his wife, standing by itself alone, would not be sufficient to vouch a wife's claim in her husband's sequestration; but if she could prove that she had a sum, say, £500, in bank in her own name that she drew it out at the date of the bill, and when she drew it out she gave it to her husband, and it appears in his books that that money was got, there is no doubt that woman would be entitled to rank as an ordinary creditor on her husband's estate. What the law does is, it requires very clear and distinct evidence that the debt is a true debt. A wife stands in the position of a suspected person, and therefore she must prove by very clear and distinct evidence that it was a bona fide debt; if that is proved, then she ranks as a creditor.

7165. Is it found, in your experience, that the debts of married women are sometimes manufactured, as it were, for the purpose of giving the wife a large share in the dividend ?—Often, and I have had many such debts set aside.

7166. Now with regard to the deeds of arrangement outside bankruptcy altogether ?—Those are what we call private trust deeds.

7167. Are they subject to any control at all ?—No, and we say there is only one respect in which we wish this altered. I have brought under the notice of the Committee the elaborate checks which in bankruptcy act upon the trustee; but a private arrangement—or, as we call it, a trust deed—is just a private contract between a debtor and his creditors, and no creditor is bound by it at all unless he binds himself, and no creditor can be compelled to agree; but many creditors do, and occasionally it happens that the trustee will not give an account of his intromissions, and it is very difficult to compel him to account. Each creditor must sue the trustee for his share of the estate, and a large number do not trouble, but it was suggested that the trustee under these deeds ought to be placed under the supervision of the Accountant of Court in the same way as the trustees in bankruptcy, and we think if that were done it would create very little additional expense and would obviate any evil which arises in Scotland upon that head.

7168. If a creditor does not assent to a deed of that kind, does he retain his full right to have the debtor sequestrated ?—Yes, if he does not assent. You will observe in many cases these deeds contain a clause discharging the debtor, and a creditor is entitled to say, "I do not assent to that deed, but I say I must "have my share of the estate in the same way as if I did "assent, because you, the debtor, have no right to make "any conditions. I am entitled to a share of your property "whether I assent to your discharge or not, and if you "want to have your discharge you must go to the court "and obtain it in the proper way."

7169. If a dissentient creditor obtains a sequestration does that make the deed void ?—No, it does not make it void in this respect, that suppose that a trust deed had been granted in favour of A and he had sold the estate to B, that transaction would stand, but the proceeds would be in the hands of the seller, and the trustee in bankruptcy would sweep the whole estate into his hands and deal with it according to the law of bankruptcy.

7170. Is there any length of time limited within which after a voluntary deed has been executed, a creditor can petition the court ?—No, but unfortunately in Scotland a trust deed does not constitute what you call an act of bankruptcy, but what we call notour bankruptcy, and therefore a creditor has to make his debtor notour bankrupt by ordinary diligence before he can petition the Court, and by the law of Scotland a deed of that kind will become final in sixty days, so that there is very often a race between the trustee and the creditor who is seeking to set the deed aside. If the trustee is able to divide the estate before the creditor obtains sequestration there will be nothing left for the trustee in bankruptcy. The trust deed is effectual if it stands sixty days without being set aside.

7171. As I understand, the remedy which you suggest would be that every trustee under a voluntary deed should have his accounts audited by the Accountant of Court ?—That is so; that is the only remedy we would suggest.

7172. Is the Accountant of Court an officer of the Court ?—Yes. He is paid by salary, but he charges a very small fee for auditing each account and it goes into exchequer.

Mr. Peter Morison.
5 June, 1907.

7173. Are general assignments of book debts a common thing with you ?—No. It would not work according to the law of Scotland. A particular debt may be assigned, and the assignment is not effectual until intimation of the assignment is made to the debtor. You will thus see that it is practically impossible to have a general assignment of book debts, because each debt must be specifically assigned and the intimation must specify that the debt is assigned unto a particular person or creditor. If the cedent became bankrupt before the intimation of the assignment, the trustee would oust the assignee because he had not intimated the assignation to the debtor, and therefore the assignment would not be valid.

7174. So you would not see any advantage in registering such instruments ?—No, there is no necessity for it, because the fact of intimation being necessary renders it unnecessary.

7175. You have already heard earlier this afternoon that we have had under discussion the question of the registration of hire purchase agreements. Does that arise to any extent in Scotland ?—They are coming in from the South, but we do not like them. Curiously enough there is just now before the Courts a question with regard to these hire-purchase agreements. It is one which relates to household furniture, and the question is whether such deeds are not merely a device to evade the law. According to the law of Scotland you cannot have an assignment of moveables in such a way as to create a security over those moveables, if you allow them to remain in the hands of the original owner. The property must be taken out of the owner's possession altogether. What the framers of these hire-purchase agreements want to do is in reality to create a security over these moveables for payment of the price. It is absurd to say that beds and bedding, for examples, I mean mattresses, blankets, and sheets, and articles of clothing are bona fide hired. These articles perish in the using, and it is merely an elusive device on the part of the hirer, as he is called, but as we say in reality the seller, to endeavour to obtain a security for the payment of the price, payable by instalments. The law ought to look beyond the mere form of the transaction, and if satisfied that it is in truth a sale, with the price payable by instalments, one set of traders by the mere use of certain words or forms ought not to be allowed to obtain an advantage over others. The words used are "hire purchase." Why should so much force be given to the word "hire" and none to the word "purchase"? The matter has never come before the Courts to be decided upon, but the question is up just now. It has arisen in this way. Imprisonment for debt has been abolished in Scotland, and there is a man, we will call him A., who deals in furniture, and he has canvassers who go round the country and visit working men's homes in the absence of the working man; they get his wife to sign a hire purchase agreement, taking cabinets, curtains, pillows, bolsters, sheets, blankets, made-up carpets, wax-cloth stuck on to the floor, and pots and pans, and that kind of thing, on the hire-purchase system. When the wife fails to pay an instalment of the price (an event which very soon happens) the so-called hirer presents a petition to the Court, to ordain the defender, the husband, to deliver up these articles. If he gets a decree against him, that is what we call in Scotland a decree ad factum praestandum, he is able to enforce that by imprisonment against the husband. I do not want to give an opinion, but I think that is a very bad form of dealing, but its validity in point of law is the question which is to be decided by the Court just now. If he took an ordinary action for the price, or the hire, he could not imprison the husband, but taking it in the form he does he is able to imprison the husband. In fact there was a warrant of imprisonment obtained against a working man who never knew of the transaction; the wife had gone away and disposed of the goods that she had got in that way.

7176. You would wish to see that sort of thing prevented ?—Certainly. If it is a bona fide hire I do not think any person would object to it, but if it is merely a device to obtain a security for the price, that ought to be struck at.

7177. (Mr. Richardson.) Would you kindly tell us if there are many prosecutions in Scotland for fraudulent bankruptcy ?—Not many.

7178. Not in proportion to the number of bankruptcies ?—No.

7179. When there are any, do you say they are invariably successful ?—Well, I have seen a man get off, but it seldom happens.

7180. What are the terms of imprisonment ?—That depends upon the Judge; two years is the maximum.

7181. Generally, I suppose, six months ?—Six or nine months.

7182. With regard to book-keeping, I take it you still think the Court should have the power to inflict punishment for the non-keeping of books. They should have the power ?—Yes, if the failure arose from an improper motive.

7183. There should be the opening for the Court to enquire whether books have ceased to be kept, for the purpose of covering a fraudulent transaction; and that they should have the power to punish ?—Certainly, that is our resolution.

7184. Would you kindly tell us who appoints the trustee ?—The creditors.

7185. The majority of the creditors ?—Yes.

7186. Does he give a guarantee ?—Yes.

7187. He has to give a guarantee ?—Yes, to the satisfaction of the creditors.

7188. From a guarantee society, or something like that ?—Yes, it is generally given now by a guarantee society, that is the modern practice.

7189. You said that there were practically no assignments of book debts ?—Yes.

7190. Do I take it that the fact that when book debts are assigned it has to be made known to the debtors deters people from assigning book debts ?—The debt must be in existence, and the assignment of that particular debt must be intimated to the person owing it.

7191. I quite understand that, but I would like to know does the fact that those debts have to be made known, deter people from assigning book debts ?—It practically renders it impossible.

7192. It stops them ?—It stops them because, you see the merchant may have 1,000 debtors. You would have to make 1,000 assignments and 1,000 intimations, and such publicity practically stops it.

7193. (Mr. Addison.) Do the costs of prosecutions come out of the estates ?—No, they are borne by the Treasury.

7194. With regard to the 5s. in the £ limit, that applies to discharges under bankruptcies ?—And under cessio also.

7195. Does it also apply to compositions and deeds of arrangement ?—No, not necessarily, unless the Sheriff would say that a smaller sum was not reasonable.

7196. It does not necessarily apply to compositions and deeds of arrangement ?—No, that is a matter between the debtor and the creditors, the offer is made and the creditors may accept or reject it if they please.

7197. Are there many cases where married women, either traders or non-traders, are made bankrupt ?—Not many where they are sequestrated, but there are a good number where they are put under what we call the Cessio Act, that is somewhat equivalent to your small bankruptcies in England.

7198. Is the number of such women who are not traders, large or small ?—Small.

7200. Supposing it was a dishonoured bill ?—If there is a dishonoured bill, that is not an act of bankruptcy. We require to record the protest on that bill, and charge the debtor thereon; that would take seven days. Then we petition the Court setting forth that he is notour bankrupt for failing to obey the order of the Court to pay, and the Court would ordain the bankrupt within seven days to show cause why sequestration should not be awarded, and he will not be allowed to show cause unless he instantly pays or provides for the debt of the petitioning creditor, and if he does that he is allowed a reasonable time to show cause why sequestration should not be awarded, and it is generally very quickly awarded, because the debtor can very seldom pay or provide for the debt of the petitioning creditor, so that if he wishes by litigating to gain time, the fact that he must pay or provide for the debt of the petitioning creditor stops him.

7201. So that when he has committed an act of bankruptcy, you would get your sequestration in ten days or less ?—Yes, in ten days or less.

7202. You cannot dispute the petitioning creditor's debt without providing security ?—No.

7203. Is there any advertisement of the petition, as there is with us in England ?—Yes, in the Edinburgh Gazette.

7204. Before sequestration ?—Before sequestration.

7205. The whole process could be readily gone through under a fortnight at the outside ?—Certainly.

7206. You were saying the law of Scotland does not permit a man to give security over goods which were his own and remained in his possession ?—No.

7207. You see the difference in the hire purchase case is that the goods never were his, they were the goods of the trader supplying them ?—Yes.

7208. And the object of the scheme is that they never shall be the debtor's ?—Yes ; part of the scheme is that a certain number of hires are paid and then they become his property.

7209. The distinction is that they are not to be his property until he has paid the price, whereas the law of Scotland applies to goods which were the man's ?—That is so.

7210. That is the distinction ?—That is so. What I said was that if it is a bona fide hire of the articles it will be perfectly valid according to the law of Scotland ; but the whole point is that there is a suspicion that it is an attempt to evade the law by acquiring security for the payment of the price. It is just a device to evade that law—the transaction being truly a sale, though, for a purpose, called a hire purchase.

7211. Is there any Court to which the creditor can go to enforce the trusts of a private deed of trust. With us, if a private trust deed for creditors were executed, a creditor could go to the county court, if its jurisdiction applied, or if it did not, he could go to the Supreme Court at once, to enforce the trust and make the trustee account ?—That is an impossibility in Scotland. What would be done would be to throw the estate into bankruptcy or each creditor could sue for his share of the trust estate.

7212. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I see from your proof that you recommend the establishment of a register of the partners of firms ?—Yes.

7213. In order more readily to identify undischarged bankrupts ?—That is so.

7214. Could you tell me whether that opinion is generally held by mercantile men in Scotland ?—It is.

7215. And by trade protection societies ?—It is. I could give you a very striking illustration, which has come under my own notice, of the disadvantages of the want of such a register. There was a gentleman in Glasgow who was carrying on business as a furniture dealer. He was sequestrated, but he removed the greater part of his stock to Edinburgh and started under a fictitious name, I forget really the name he adopted. I was acting for the landlord of his premises, and put in a distress warrant for his rent ; suddenly the whole effects disappeared again. There was a client came to me, and he asked me : did I know so and so ? Part of the name that he had taken was part of the name of this bankrupt in Glasgow. I said : " I want to see his handwriting." I discovered it was the same man who had been bankrupt in Glasgow, and removed his goods from his creditors to Edinburgh, and put them into my clients' house and did not pay his rent and went away. Curiously enough he never appeared himself during business hours in any of his premises. He left a man in his shop in Edinburgh, and when any person wanted to see the owner, he was " not in," he was in "Glasgow" ; when they asked : " When will he be in ? " they were told he did not know when he would be in. He took precious good care that he was never seen, and nobody ever saw the man or knew him. When this was spotted I immediately gave notice to the police ; they were on his track, but he got away.

5 June, 1907.

7216. You think there is really a very great need for the establishment of such a system ?—Certainly.

7217. In Scotland as well as England ?—A very strong need.

7218. (Mr. Smith.) Can you tell us if the mercantile community in Scotland generally are satisfied with the working of the Bankruptcy Act there ?—Yes, with the Scotch Act.

7219. There are no complaints or a strong desire for any reform ?—No, except in some minor points.

7220. In your Memorandum (I do not know whether this has been referred to in your evidence), you say in Paragraph 2, that is to the discharge of a bankrupt, it is thought that some amendment of the law should be made. What is the nature of the amendment which is suggested ?—To raise the minimum dividend from 5s. to 10s.

7221. With regard to deeds of arrangement, these are deeds of arrangement which are recognised and sanctioned under the bankruptcy law itself ?—Not in Scotland.

7222. One of the methods of the realisation was by deed of arrangement ?—Yes. I mi understood the question.

7223. Are those common ?—Very seldom. The difficulty is that they require the sanction of four-fifths of the whole creditors, and it is sometimes difficult to know who the whole creditors of a bankrupt are.

7224. What is the general nature of a deed of that class ? What is the object of it ?—It is a composition contract.

7225. A composition contract is a third branch of the procedure ?—Yes.

7226. Are deeds of arrangement also composition contracts ?—Mostly.

7228. It supersedes the ordinary procedure under the bankruptcy ?—Yes, the procedure when a proposal is made to wind up the bankruptcy by means of a deed of arrangement, is that they apply to the sheriff and he sists the procedure in the bankruptcy proceedings for two months. During that two months the bankrupt and his friends can produce to the court a deed subscribed and executed by four-fifths of the creditors. Then the sheriff interposes his authority and the bankruptcy is wound up in terms of that deed.

7229. Can you tell us what is the usual object or purpose served by such a deed, when it is not for the purpose of a payment of a composition. Am I right in supposing it is simply to modify the working of the clause requiring 5s. in the £ to be paid on a bankrupt's discharge ?—No, the same law would be applicable to a deed of arrangement as to a composition contract in that respect, but it stops the proceedings under the sequestration at an earlier stage ; it may be carried through quicker ; and then under the composition contract it is a statutory requisite that security for payment of the composition must be found, and for payment of the expenses of the seequestration. That may be dispensed with in a deed of arrangement, and the bankrupt need not undergo a public examination. Those are the main differences.

7230. Do I understand rightly that a deed of arrangement under that course of procedure would not be sanctioned by the Sheriff, unless it provided for the payment of 5s. in the £ ?—That depends on whether he would say it was reasonable or not.

7231. But unless the deed is executed, or a composition agreed to, he must pay 5s. in the £, if the estate is wound up in bankruptcy ?—No, he must satisfy the Court that the failure to pay 5s. did not arise from circumstances for which he ought to be held responsible.

Mr. Peter Morison.

5 June, 1907.

7232. And if he did not satisfy the Court of that ?—Then his discharge is refused, or rather the Sheriff would refuse to sanction the deed of arrangement, with the result that the sequestration proceedings must run their usual course

7233. For ever ?—No, not necessarily for ever.

7234. There is a time, I suppose, when he gets it ?—It is generally continued to enable him to pay 5s. in the £.

7235. Practically to some extent it is like granting a discharge subject to a condition that he remains liable for a portion of the debts ?—Yes, but a discharge is not granted until the condition be purified.

7236. You said the trustee reported on the bankrupt's application for discharge; does he also report on the facts in the case of a deed of arrangement or composition contract ?—No.

7237. The sheriff has to approve of that ?—Yes.

7238. And he approves without very much information, I suppose ?—If there is no opposition at all he generally approves as a matter of course, but if there is opposition then he has to hear the circumstances.

7239. But there is no independent report of the facts by the trustee in that case ?—No.

7240. Are there many voluntary deeds outside the Act in Scotland ?—A large number.

7241. Does any inconvenience arise, or is there any matter of complaint generally on the part of the public that these deeds are so difficult to enforce, that no discharge is granted under them to the bankrupt by a dissenting creditor. In this country it has been suggested that the voluntary deeds work hardly upon the general body of creditors by enabling a single creditor to present a petition when all the other creditors concurred in the voluntary arrangement ?—The feeling we have in Scotland is this, that if the voluntary deed be fairly just and proper there is very little difficulty in obtaining the assent of all the creditors. If there is anything wrong then some creditors stand out, and they are at liberty to throw the estate into bankruptcy. Therefore it works its own cure, because you cannot have a mode of winding up an estate partly under the Court and partly voluntary; it must either be the one or the other. If it is under the Court then the Bankruptcy Law ought to apply; if it is to be voluntary then it ought to be purely voluntary.

7242. My question was simply to ask whether the public in Scotland are satisfied with that ?—Yes.

7243. They do not want any change in that ?—No; the only change they would want would be to have the trustee put under the supervision of the Accountant of Court.

7244. With regard to the working of Section 13 of the Debtors' Act of 1880, I think you said that there are not many prosecutions in Scotland ?—Not many.

7245. Have there been any under that section ?—Yes.

7246. For not keeping books ?—Yes, several. There was one last year. I forget who it was, I think my son had it.

7247. Is the feeling general that it would be unfair to delete from the Act the words "with intent to defraud ?"—Yes, so far as books are concerned.

7248. Are books generally well kept in cases of bankruptcy ?—Of course you know a good deal depends upon the ability of the man; they may not be what you may call well kept, and yet they may be sufficient to show his transactions.

7249. Are they sufficient, as a rule, to disclose the bankrupt's transactions ?—Yes.

7250. There are no serious complaints on that head ?—No.

7251. There are no evils to be remedied by legislation on that subject ?—No.

7252. You recognise, I suppose, that in England there is an allegation that a very great evil arises from the non-keeping of proper books ?—Yes.

7253. Probably they are further back than Scotland in that respect ?—I do not say that, but, as I have already said, the existence of the public prosecutor has a great effect upon the conduct of all Scotchmen.

7254. I have no doubt of that, but would you see any objection to a law even in England which laid upon the debtor the onus of proving that the non-keeping of books was not fraudulent ?—That is the law of Scotland at present, and we desire to maintain that.

7255. I understood you to say you had to prove it was fraudulent. I am suggesting it should be held to be fraudulent unless the debtor can satisfy the Court that it is not ?—You have probably misunderstood me; what I meant was this, that you could not make it absolute without any safety-valve.

7256. Does the onus lie upon the bankrupt to satisfy the Court that the non-keeping of books does not arise from any fraudulent intention ?—It does.

7258. The thing will not be adjourned ?—It will not be adjourned, and then there is this provision that he must instantly satisfy the debt of the petitioning creditor, and if he satisfies the debt of A., then B. immediately comes forward and takes up the matter at the stage at which A. left it, and again he must satisfy B.'s debt, and C.'s, and so on all through the alphabet, so that practically staving off cannot work.

Mr. EDWIN LEADAM HOUGH, called; and Examined.

Mr. Edwin Leadam Hough.

12 June 1907.

7259. (Chairman.) I think that you have been an Official Receiver in Bankruptcy since 1884?—Since the passing of the Act I have been an Official Receiver.

7260. And in London since 1890?—Yes.

7261. I think you have been Senior Official Receiver since 1896?—Yes.

7262. Of course an enormous number of bankruptcy cases have passed through your hands?—Yes, I should think over 4,000.

7263. You have kindly considered the terms of our reference. I think it will be most convenient, both for saving your time and that of the Committee, if I just take the terms of reference as they are, and ask you to be so good as to express to us your opinion upon them as the result of your experience. The first of them is: "Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor and the imposition on him of punishment or disabilities should be amended"?—Can I do better than read the Memorandum of the Board of Trade which contains the official view on that point and the other points submitted to the Committee? I was one of those who had the honour of drafting those remarks and observations, and they contain in fact the official view on the various points submitted to the Committee. I should be prepared to give my own views on all the points except No. 8, which is really a matter which does not come before me at all: that is, the deeds of arrangement question. That I know nothing of.

7264. Personally, I have had the printed Memorandum by the Board of Trade since yesterday, but I am bound to say that I have not yet been able to give it quite the attention that I ought to; but assuming that the Committee have that before them, would it be inconvenient to you to give us, in such form as you think proper, just your personal view on these questions so far as it is convenient to you to do so?—I should be pleased to do what I can, but, of course, any view which I may express outside the Memorandum must be understood not to be the view of the Board of Trade but to be my own view unofficially. I should like to guard myself in that respect. The first question which is touched upon by the Memorandum of the Board of Trade is this: "The Board consider that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts are sufficient for a full investigation of the debtor's conduct." I fully agree with that. They go on to say: "Minor offences under the Debtors Act and the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, might be made punishable by summary conviction, and the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, might apply as if such offences were specified in the first and second columns of the first schedule to that Act, provided that punishment by fine should be excluded." That touches two points which have been before you: first, the point as to whether the present machinery for punishing bankrupts is not too cumbersome, troublesome and expensive; and, secondly, what official department should undertake the prosecution of bankruptcy offences. The matter has been considered, I think I may say almost up to to-day, by the Board of Trade, and I think I am justified in saying that the conclusion come to is this, that all bankruptcy offences namely, those included in the Bankruptcy Act and the Debtors Act, might be placed in the schedule to the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879; not only the minor offences, but all offences. The result would be that it would be open to a magistrate, if he thought the case was of minor importance, to deal with it summarily; that is to say, of course, with the consent of the person who is being charged. He would not be likely to deal summarily with a very heavy case, a very important case: he would send that to trial in the usual way. We have found great difficulty in bankruptcy prosecutions; at present the machinery is most cumbersome. An Official Receiver, when in his opinion an offence has been committed, sends a report to the Board of Trade, a draft of the report which he proposes to submit to the Court. That is then considered by the Board of Trade. If they agree with the Official Receiver's view that an offence has been committed, the report is returned to the Official Receiver in order that it may go before the Court. It is then presented to the Court, and the Court has to consider it. Of course, the Court has before it only the report itself; the Court does not see the witnesses, and the Court can only get explanations on various points from the person who prepared the report, namely, in nine cases out of ten, the Official Receiver. The Registrar has to consider two points. He has to consider the report and see whether an offence has been committed, and whether there is a likelihood of conviction, If he thinks that there is an offence, however trivial the offence may be, and that a conviction is likely to be obtained, he considers that he is bound by the terms of the Act of Parliament to make an Order to prosecute. Assume that an Order is made, it goes before the Public Prosecutor, and the Public Prosecutor then takes the matter up. We have to go, first of all, before the magistrate and the case is heard. Then if the debtor is sent to trial, we go either to the Central Criminal Court or to one of the sessions. It may be a comparatively small offence that the debtor has committed, it may be a small Section 31 offence, or it may be an offence which is of no serious character. Say we get to the Old Bailey, and we get sandwiched in amongst possibly a number of highly important cases; in our view the bankruptcy case, if it is of a trivial character, is more or less laughed at, and so we find that the punishment inflicted for bankruptcy offences is not, in our opinion, commensurate with the commercial importance of the question which is really involved. If you were to make all offences punishable by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction (I assume the consent of the debtor), you would get your conviction before the magistrate and he would be in a position to inflict three months' imprisonment, which I venture to think is sufficient for most of the less serious bankruptcy offences. Assuming, however, that he will not deal with the case summarily, then it goes either before a Judge, or the Recorder, or Common Serjeant, whoever it may happen to be. You have had some evidence, I believe, from the Public Prosecutor's office on this point. He thinks that he ought to have a discretion as to what prosecutions he ought to take up.

7265. That is so?—Of course, everyone will concede at once that there ought to be a discretion if the evidence is not regarded as sufficient to obtain a conviction. I would be idle to go on merely because an Order to prosecute has been made, where it is perfectly clear that the evidence is not sufficient to convict a man. But that is not all: the Public Prosecutor wants to go further and say: "I should have an absolute discretion as to whether I shall or shall not take that matter up." I think the Board of Trade does not agree with that view: certainly I do not agree with it. I do not think there should be any such discretion. But it has been suggested that some of the difficulties which the Public Prosecutor feels might be got over by the Board of Trade themselves taking up, what I may term for brevity, the minor prosecutions, that is to say, prosecutions for offences which are likely to be dealt with summarily by the magistrate, and themselves prosecute through their solicitor. That would, I believe, get rid of a great number of the Public Prosecutor's objections, he not taking the comparatively trivial offences which he says are occasionally brought before him.

7266. But, who would, in an ordinary case, go before a magistrate? Would you suggest that the Official Receiver should himself prosecute and conduct the prosecution, or that it should all be done through the Public Prosecutor in the grave cases, and through the Board of Trade solicitor's department in the smaller cases?—I should suggest the solicitor, or some one from the solicitor's department, of the Board of Trade in the smaller cases, and the Public Prosecutor in the large ones. It would be absolutely impossible for an Official Receiver in London to give the time for a prosecution of the sort. I do not know how it would be in the country, but I should think very likely the same objection would apply.

7267. I think you originally began your official life in Carlisle?—Yes.

7268. And supposing there was such a case there, the Board of Trade would have to appoint an agent, I suppose?—Yes, as is already done in a large number of cases where prosecutions are undertaken by public departments in London.

7271. On the next branch of that one of our Terms of Reference, the question is: "Whether the conduct of the debtor should in every case be brought before the Court for consideration whether he applies for a discharge in his bankruptcy or not." I daresay you are aware that a good deal of evidence has been before the Committee in respect of that, and it is needless to say we should value your view upon it having regard to your immense experience?—I think it would be a mistake. It is in my opinion undesirable that any provision should be made that the conduct of a bankrupt should at some specified date automatically come before the Court for consideration. There are two great grounds I think against the suggestion; the first and principal being that of expense. As you are aware at present bankrupts applying for their discharge have to pay a 30s. fee on the application and 1s. for every notice which is sent to creditors. In the High Court, after making allowance for deaths and annulments about 40 per cent. of the bankrupts apply for their discharge, but in the country the percentage is very considerably less; it is a curious fact that it is so, that the percentage of bankrupts applying for their discharge is very much higher in London than it is in the country. I want you to bear that in mind because I shall have something to say about it hereafter. If you require a bankrupt to come up for his discharge at a certain fixed date, you will hardly be able to require payment of the fees which you at present get, because a bankrupt will simply say this, if he is brought up automatically: "I have not got any money; if you are going to bring me before the Court, you must pay the expense of doing so." In the years 1905 and 1906, the fees taken in the High Court on applications for discharge amounted to £1,810, that is to say an average of about £900 a year. In 1904 and 1905, (I cannot get the statistics for 1906), it is found that the number of applications in country cases was about double the High Court number. Assuming they are double the High Court number, and I believe it to be the fact that they are, the fees throughout the country on applications for discharge would if the country fees are on the same scale as they are in High Court cases amount to something like £3,000 a year. You are going to lose those fees, I apprehend, if you require automatic applications for discharge. That is not nearly all, because a report on every application for a discharge, or on the hearing of every automatic application, would be required, and that report would probably have to be made, as reports on applications for discharge are at present made, by the official Receiver: that means this, that in 60 per cent. of the High Court adjudication cases reports will have to be made in excess of the number already made, and in the country the proportion will be very much greater. Of course, that means additional staff, but that is not nearly all, because if you are going to have this application, are you not going to require the debtor to attend it? If you do require him, and you ought to require him, I take it, because it is required at present that every debtor be present on the hearing of his application for discharge, as the Court may require to question him or the Official Receiver may require to question him. If he is to be brought up, who is to bring him up assuming he says: "I will not come"? Are you going to find his railway fare from perhaps the other end of England? And supposing he still does not come, are you going to arrest him and bring him; or what are you going to suggest? I know that the advisability of arrest was suggested by a learned counsel here. If you are going to bring him up, you will have to pay the fees of the tipstaff to possibly some remote corner of England, and bring this man up at very heavy expense to the country. I regard that as being one of the two serious objections to an automatic application for a discharge, but I venture to suggest this to the Committee, what is the good of bringing him up? What end are you going to serve by bringing a bankrupt up for his discharge? It is perfectly true that there will be less bankrupts, as I think somebody said, walking about England; but the 70,000 I have seen mentioned as being the number of bankrupts who are undischarged at present: what harm do they do? You are not going to capitalise these bankrupts by giving them their discharge; all you are going to do is to free them from a disability which they are under at present as to incurring debts without any limit. At present an undischarged bankrupt can trade himself. It is right he should do so, because an undischarged bankrupt is very likely to have people dependent upon him and somebody has to find the living expenses of those persons. How are those heavy expenses to be provided unless you allow the man to trade? You might say he ought to take a situation. It is a very difficult thing for an undischarged bankrupt to get a situation; we find every day that bankrupts, as a reason for obtaining their discharge at an early date, say they are desirous, or have an opportunity, of obtaining employment. I do not see any great hardship in a man who has paid his creditors nothing or a very small sum being restricted to the £20 limit of indebtedness. Up to £20 he has a free hand, after that he has to disclose the fact, otherwise he is guilty of a misdemeanour under Section 31.

7272. What do you suggest for the evil that is suggested, that there are these numbers of undischarged bankrupts trading in defiance of that section, and under different names, in the name of their wives, or in firm names ?—I believe that evil has been exaggerated. I do not believe there are many cases. It is our duty, whenever we find that an offence under Section 31 has been committed, to make a report to the Court with a view to the prosecution of the debtor who has committed the offence. As a matter of fact we do not find there are many persons who, in an assumed name, or in their own name, contract debts when they are undischarged bankrupts. Of course there are some, but I say, advisedly, many such cases do not come within the cognisance of the High Court Official Receivers.

7274. Is that a suggestion with which you agree personally ?—Thoroughly. It is not by any means a new suggestion. I believe a Bill dealing with that question was drafted some years ago. It is a most valuable suggestion in my view that there should be registers kept. I do not care much where they are kept; they may be kept at the local County Courts, or the Inland Revenue Offices, or somewhere or other, in which every firm name should be registered, so that a person giving credit to a firm should know who constitute the firm. There should be annual registration, otherwise your register would get unwieldy. A small fee for registration should be exacted, and a small fee for inspection. I do not think it need cost the country any very large sum. At present, as you are aware, it is open to the Court to make a receiving order against a firm in the firm's name, but when we come to adjudication, we cannot adjudicate a firm, we must adjudicate the partners, and we find very often great difficulty in finding out who are the partners. Somebody comes in as the A.B. Café Company, the judgment has been made against the A.B. Café Company, the receiving order has been made against the A.B. Café Company, the case comes into the court, and then it is a conundrum for the Official Receiver to solve who are the A.B. Café Company. We find great difficulty in making up our mind who the A.B. Café Company are, and in getting the necessary evidence. I apprehend the same difficulty must present itself to creditors.

7275. In conclusion, as far as I am concerned, on this point, one of our witnesses of large experience in the Court said—what I confess struck me very much—that in a good many cases all that happens after a receiving order and an order of adjudication is that the debtor is very thoroughly and completely examined, that then there is an excellent transcript of some shorthand notes put on the file, and then he goes away, and nothing more happens ?—That is so, of course. I do not see what else can happen unless he has committed an offence. If he has committed an offence, then proceedings follow, but I do not see what else can happen. Of course this happens, that if by any chance it comes to the ears of the Official Receiver that there is any after-acquired property, it is promptly seized, if it can be seized, but beyond that I do not know what could be done.

7276. There has been a suggestion made that a man should in some way or other report himself to the Court, that that would keep a sort of hold upon a man's future property, and perhaps get money for the creditors ?—Then comes in the old question of expense, because, assuming that your figures are right, and there are 70,000 undischarged bankrupts, who is going to look after them annually or semi-annually ? Of course it would be an excellent thing that bankrupts should be compelled to report themselves, and say what they were doing, and what property they had acquired, but look at the expense to the country! You have to consider the likelihood of your labours resulting in legislation. Who is going to pay for overlooking 70,000 bankrupts ? It is the question of expense, it is the question of staff. Supposing these persons do not report themselves, what are you going to do; are you going to arrest them, and bring them up for examination ? There would be many such cases; I do not think I should be wrong in saying there would be hundreds every year. The expense to the nation would be immense, otherwise it would be a most excellent provision.

7277. Passing on to No. 2, I do not know that one could do better than ask you to read the paragraph on No. 2 in the Memorandum, supplementing it by anything further you could tell us upon it ?—I will read No. 2: "In about 66 per cent. of applications for discharge, the offence of not keeping proper books of account is proved. The board consider that the failure to keep simple accounts sufficient to show the bankrupt's transactions and financial position, e.g., cash book, journal or day book, annual balance sheet, or statement of assets and liabilities, should be made a criminal offence punishable by not more than three months imprisonment, but the making of an order to prosecute for such offence should be within the discretion of the Court. This provision should not come into operation until the expiration of (two years) from the commencement of the Amending Act."

7279. Do you feel that difficulty at all ?—Yes, naturally one has considered the French and German law in connection with this matter. There the non-keeping of books is a criminal offence, whether there is bankruptcy or not; but here we have not got that, but yet at the same time it is, I venture to think, very necessary that the offence of not keeping any books should be made a criminal matter.

7280. Would you restrict it, as I think it is in Scotland, to cases in which the indebtedness is up to or not exceeding £200 ?—There would certainly have to be some restriction. As to whether you would limit it by the amount of unsecured liabilities incurred, or whether you would leave it to the discretion of the Court, not to allow a prosecution except under certain circumstances I am not sure which is the more desirable course to take. It is perfectly clear it would be absurd to prosecute a village sweet-seller or a costermonger for not keeping proper books of account. At the same time we have this, that dishonest debtors will not, and do not, keep books of account, in order that offences which they are committing may not be ascertained, and it is extremely difficult where there are no books of account, to convict people for various offences. You get fictitious bad debts; you get loans from relatives which are repaid—fictitious loans from relatives, which are repaid under alleged pressure shortly before the receiving order. You cannot disprove these things, there are no books, you have no evidence, although you have the shrewdest suspicion that no such bad debt has been incurred, and no such loan has ever been made. There are a number of persons in the East End of London who do not keep any books at all; it is a very wise thing for them that they do not, because if they had kept books of account they would most certainly have been prosecuted to conviction; but in the absence of books we have not got the necessary evidence, and the consequence is these people escape.

7281. Arising out of that matter do you find in your experience what I think Mr. Hansell told us about, that there are aliens who first trade in one district in London and go bankrupt, and keep no books, and then migrate to another ?—No, I do not find that. I find any number of aliens who do not keep books, but I do not find them assuming different names.

7282. They do not turn up a second time in the Court ?—No, my impression is that the incurring of debts by an undischarged bankrupt has been very greatly exaggerated, certainly experience in the High Court shows that there are not very many of such cases; at least that come before us.

7283. Are there any other, of what are called in Section 8, facts that you think might be made punishable in the same way that you recommend with respect to not keeping books?—There are others which might be, but you have to consider, I apprehend, whether the country is ripe for legislation of the kind. Of course in other countries you find unjustifiable and gross extravagance in living, and betting and gambling are punishable, and my own opinion is that they ought to be punished, but I doubt whether public opinion in England would allow the passing of a law to that end at present. I attach the greatest importance to the books offence being made criminal, and I should be very sorry, if that met with the approbation of your Committee, to see the ship overladen with other offences to which no doubt great exception would be taken.

7284. Now as regards the realisation and administration of property, do you think that the law could be advantageously amended so as to secure a more immediate realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt, or that the present procedure is in general sufficient?—I think it is amply sufficient. I remember in the old days exception used to be taken. The old practice was not to have the first meeting of creditors until after the statement of affairs had been filed by the debtor. There is very often great delay in getting the statement of affairs from the debtor, and the consequence was that the meetings were held at some considerable period after the receiving order had been made. That was most disadvantageous. Creditors complained; they said the matter remained too long in the hands of the Official Receiver, or that the estate had been prejudiced by the delay. The consequence was that the old practice was abandoned and a new practice was instituted, a practice which was certainly, I think, contemplated by the Act which is that in every case now, I think in every case, unless the circumstances are very exceptional, the first meeting of the creditors is held within fourteen days of the making of the receiving order. The consequence is that within fourteen days from the date on which the receiving order is made, it is open to the creditors to appoint their own trustee, or, if they prefer it, to give directions for realisation by the Official Receiver. The creditors have it now in their power to say what ought to be done with an estate within fourteen days after the making of a receiving order, and I venture to think that that is a very short time.

7285. The next question is as to the status of the undischarged bankrupt, and we have had a good deal of complaint there as to the hardship on persons who deal with an undischarged bankrupt, and have the transactions upset, especially with regard to real estate. Do you think that the law requires amendment for the purpose of protecting such persons?—Yes, I think it does. It is a very thorny point, but the Memorandum of the Board of Trade is in these terms on that head:—"The Board are of opinion that the law should be altered so as to protect the rights of a person acquiring title through the bankrupt to after-acquired property, whether real or personal, in good faith, for valuable consideration, and without knowledge of the bankruptcy." You will notice that the crux of the paragraph is in those last five words, "without knowledge of the bankruptcy." I do not know that this has actually been discussed between the Board of Trade officials and myself, but in my view Hunt v. Fripp is an objectionable decision; that is where it was held that although a purchaser from the bankrupt knew that the trustee had title to a policy yet nevertheless he was protected although he bought from the bankrupt, knowing well that the trustee would have claimed had he known of the existence of the asset. I regard that as an unfortunate decision. The New Land Development Company v. Gray is equally unfortunate. That is the case in which it was held that a bankrupt could not make a good title to real estate. I think both decisions are unfortunate. I think the golden mean is the better rule, and that the transactions should be protected only if entered into bonâ fide, and without knowledge of the bankruptcy.

7286. Then, as regards the claims of creditors whose debts have been incurred subsequent to the bankruptcy?—I should let them in pari passu with the others. That is a rule of thumb suggestion, nothing else. It is almost impossible to get a fair rule. Assuming that the undischarged bankrupt is carrying on business and that the bulk of the second lot of liabilities are business debts, you would say then that the second lot of creditors had the greater right to the assets, but there is another side to the question. Supposing, for the sake of the argument, a young fellow who imagines that he expects to come in for a very considerable interest under a will, borrows money from moneylenders and others, and then becomes bankrupt before the death of the person from whom the fund is expected to be derived, then a new set of creditors comes into existence, say for ordinary household and personal debts. It is very difficult to say then that the second class of creditors have higher rights than the first. The probablity is the first creditors' claims are in such a case quite as strong as those of the second class. In that case you must have some rule, and the only rule that I can suggest is that the two sets of creditors should come in pari passu. You remember, in one section of the Act of Parliament it is already done. Where a composition has been approved by the Court—a scheme of arrangement—and it falls through, and subsequent debts have been incurred between the approval of the scheme of arrangement and its annulment, those subsequent debts are put in alongside the original debts.

7287. It is Section 3 of the Act of 1890?—I am not quite sure about the section. At all events there the second lot of debts come in alongside the first class. I really do not think it is possible to make a rule which would be just in every case, therefore you have to make the best rule you can. The suggestion of the Board of Trade is that they should come in pari passu with the other class.

7288. You think it is fair, this giving the second class of creditors a sort of lien on the after-acquired property?—I can imagine cases where the equities are not in favour of the second class.

7289. Quite so. Then, as regards Paragraph 6 of our Terms of Reference, we have had a good deal of evidence one way and the other with reference to the position of a married woman, as to whether she should be made subject to the Bankruptcy Laws when she incurs debts on her own account?—"The board consider that married women carrying on business, whether apart from their husbands or not, should be subject to the Bankruptcy Laws." "There is not the same necessity for enacting that married women who do not trade should be subject to bankruptcy, while it would be open to the objection that it would enable a creditor to bring improper pressure to bear upon the husband in order to obtain payment of the debt due from the wife." I thoroughly agree with that.

7290. And as regards the next part of the paragraph?—"The claims of husbands on the estates of their wives in respect of money lent or property transferred to the wife for purposes of her business should be postponed to the claims of other creditors." That is simply assimilating the proposed new law to what already exists in the case of husbands and wives. If the wife lends the husband for the purpose of the business she is postponed. I suppose if the wife is to be made bankrupt the husband's debt should be postponed.

7291. As regards Paragraph 7 and any amendment of Section 47, simply expressing my own view, the difficulty that I always feel is that created by proofs by a wife under a settlement or by trustees under a settlement coming into competition with the trade creditors?—That course was much adopted at one time. We have not met with so many cases recently. It was curiously enough mainly confined to one religious persuasion, or traders of that particular persuasion, Whether it originated in the brains of one particular solicitor who acts for that particular class, or not, I do not know, but we found a great number of instances of young men going into business who married, and entered into a contract to pay their marriage settlement trustees a sum of, say, £5,000, something utterly beyond their means. The result was that, when the assets were comparatively small, you had this sweeping claim brought in against those assets by the trustees of the marriage settlement, and the Chairman will certainly know that an attempt was made to upset a claim of the kind, and failed. It is certainly found by me, and I think found by everyone, that that is an unbearable situation.

7292. In the case you referred to, the wife's claim swept up three-quarters of the dividend?—Yes; I have known quite a large proportion of dividends taken in other cases.

7294. On the question of Paragraph 8, I do not propose to ask you anything beyond one thing, which I ask, quite on my own account. Do you think that the time within which a dissenting creditor ought to be allowed to present a petition could, with advantage, be shortened, that is to say in a case of a voluntary deed of arrangement a creditor who does not present a petition within a month should be precluded from presenting a petition at all?—Really, if you will forgive me giving an answer to that question I would rather not do so; it is one that does not come within my experience at all. It would be merely an ex parte opinion on my part.

7295. (Mr. Addison.) You will see it is answered on page 3 of the Memorandum in the third paragraph.

7296. (Chairman.) That is an extract from a Report of the Inspector-General?—I think the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy, who is thoroughly competent in the matter, will give evidence upon that. I only mean it does not come within my province.

7297. (Mr. Addison.) It is dealt with in this Memorandum; it is there suggested it should be a month.

7298. (Chairman.) Dealing finally with Paragraph 9, is it your opinion that it would be of advantage to provide that assignments of future book debts should be void?—Certainly so, absolutely void. I have never known a case in which an assignment of future book debts has served any useful purpose. You will say all the unfortunate cases come before me. That is true. I have known many cases where assignments of future book d bts have worked grave injustice, and I have known other cases where assignments of presently existing book debts have worked injustice, but I feel this, it would be a most unfortunate thing to provide that all assignments of book debts should be void. It is within the everyday experience of a man in a large way of business that large contractors have to borrow on their retention moneys and so on. If those things had to be registered it would be a most serious blow to the credit of the person borrowing, although it might be a legitimate transaction on his part.

7299. We have had evidence from persons professing to have large experience in the matter, who say that general assignments of book debts are very uncommon, and others equally experienced saying they are very common. What is your experience?—They are not an everyday occurrence by any means, but at the same time I should hesitate to say they are actually uncommon, but it is a difficult thing to say, because sometimes you find two or three cases within a very short period where such assignments have existed, and then possibly you go for some long period without finding a case at all. It is a difficult thing to lay down a rule, it is not of infrequent occurrence.

7300. I think you would not recommend registration of assignments of existing book debts?—No.

7301. Could you just give us your views of the reasons for opposing it?—Take the case of an extravagant building, take a board school, which is perhaps as good an illustration as any other, the retention moneys are very heavy indeed, and the builder may be a man of very considerable capital, yet at the same time he may not be able to bear the loss of his money for so long as the retention moneys are kept. Surely it is not an improper transaction for a man of that kind, engaged in business of that kind, to go to his bank and say: "I want some money; there is £80,000 retention money; will you lend me £20,000 to go on with my contract if I give you a charge on the retention money?" If you were to register that, I expect it would be a very serious blow to the credit of that person, because people do not realise the delicate distinction there may be between retention moneys and other book debts.

7302. With regard to hire purchase agreements, we have had a great deal of evidence on one side and the other; one side advocating registration and the other opposing it very strongly. What is your opinion on the subject?—I think it would be a very unfortunate thing to register all hire purchase agreements and all hiring agreements. I do not think the register would be very much use, it would be a most unwieldy thing. I do not think it would be of very much good. The only reason why hire purchase agreements should be registered would be to enable the trader to know whether the property in the hands of the person to whom he is giving credit is his own or not. In the great majority of instances that property is household furniture; at least that is the experience I have had, although one is aware there is a practice existing now of hiring almost everything, large machinery, printers' type, and every class of machine. If you register everything of that kind you will have a most unwieldy register. I do not think that a trader now-a-days is justified in giving credit merely on the ground that the person to whom he is giving credit is in possession of such things as those I have mentioned. There is a custom now of hiring pretty nearly everything, and I think that a creditor would be a foolish man if he gave credit to a person merely because he happened to be the possessor of household furniture which might be hired, or something else to which the hiring custom extends.

7303. We have had memoranda and complaints from such persons as sheriff's officers and high bailiffs that it is a hardship to them that they find when they are instructed to levy execution that the goods are subject to a hire purchase agreement of which nobody knows anything. Do you think that can be cured without a system of registration?—Do you mean with a view to the protection of the official?

7304. Yes?—I do not see why an official should not be protected so long as he acts without notice. Let the true owner follow the moneys in the hands of the sheriff or the official whoever he may be. It is very hard that an official who is only doing his duty and acting in ignorance of adverse claims should be saddled with a trespass action, or any other action, when he has realised goods which he believes to belong to the person on whose goods he had an execution to levy.

7305. (Mr. Evans.) Have you considered at all the terms of the Section of an Act of Parliament which you would suggest in order to carry out Paragraph 2 of your Memorandum, namely, the non-keeping of books, which is there described as a criminal offence?—Yes, I have considered the way in which I should put it if it were left to me.

7306. I should like very much to hear it?—This is again non-official.

7307. There is nothing here with regard to the limit of time, there is nothing with regard to the ability of the person to keep the books?—May I deal with that point first? I do not think it is possible to deal with the ability to keep books in the Act of Parliament. I think you would have to leave that to the discretion of the person who authorises the prosecution. I think that any statutory provision must leave the prosecution in the hands of a responsible official to say aye or nay to the prosecution. I do not think it would be possible to lay down any exact lines on which that discretion should be exercised. I am again speaking absolutely unofficially. The Board of Trade suggests that the discretion should be in the Court. Whether that is altogether right or not, officially I do not know.

7308. You mean the discretion to institute a prosecution?—Yes. The way I should put it would be this (as I say again, unofficially): "A person who either alone or in partnership with any other person or persons has carried on any trade or business and is adjudged bankrupt shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour and on conviction therefor shall be liable to be imprisoned for any time not exceeding three months: (i.) If he shall not during the two years immediately preceding his bankruptcy have kept, or caused to be kept, books of account containing a record of all cash received in connection with such trade or business, and from whom and on what account and when the same was received, and of all cash paid in connection with such trade or business, and to whom and on what account and when the same was paid, and of all goods, materials and other property (if any) purchased or acquired in connection with such trade or business, and from whom and for what price or consideration and when the same were purchased or acquired, and of all goods, materials and other property (if any) sold or otherwise disposed of in connection with such trade or business, and to whom and for what price or consideration and when the same were sold or disposed of, and shall not at least once in each year of such period have prepared or caused to be prepared a statement disclosing the financial position"—or "the assets and liabilities," if you prefer it—"of such trade or business. (ii.) If he shall not have carefully preserved and does not deliver up to the trustee (or Official Receiver) of his estate all and every of the said books and statements, unless he satisfies the jury that his failure to deliver up the said books and statements or any of them is due to causes for which he cannot justly be held responsible." Now comes the provision I should make: "A prosecution for an offence under this section shall not be instituted without the consent of the Court." That is a course which is adopted in various Acts of Parliament where an offence may be a very serious one or may be a very trivial one. The two Acts which occur to me at the moment are the Criminal Libel Act, where the Attorney-General's fiat is necessary before a prosecution can be undertaken, and the Prevention of Corruption Act of last year, where again it was provided that a prosecution should not be undertaken without the consent of the Attorney-General. If you are going to leave it to the Court you will probably have to indicate the lines on which the discretion is to be exercised. I think you might use the words: "Who, on application for such leave, shall take into consideration the nature of the business carried on by the person, the amount of the liabilities incurred, and all the circumstances of the case." I have purposely omitted education there.

7309. Or ability to keep the books?—Yes, because you may be perfectly certain if books are not kept the very first excuse would be: "I am not able to do it." I do not want that to be a valid excuse. Let the Court consider all the circumstances of the case, including, if they think right, education, and let the Court then say whether the prosecution should be instituted or not.

7310. Then, if the prosecution is sanctioned by the Court it would be assumed apparently against the man that he is a person able to keep all these books and prepare these balance sheets and so on?—Quite so.

7311. Ought it, in your opinion, to be a defence to the proceedings initiated by the prosecution that they were unable to keep them?—No, I do not think so, because I think this, that if a trader is going to contract large amounts of liabilities, he ought to employ somebody; there are numbers of accountants and clerks who are able to keep books. Let him employ one to do it for him. If he is of sufficient education and sufficient ability to incur large debts, I think he ought to be of sufficient education and sufficient ability to keep books or to employ others to keep them. Of course, the words in my proposed section sound rather terrible, but the words I use are really the words which are used by the Court when they order a cash and goods account of debtors who have not kept any accounts at all. There are so many columns, there is the name of the person to whom the payment is made, the consideration for the payment, the date and the amount. As I say, the words look rather terrible, but I think that it does not amount to very much; it means really that a trader should keep an account showing the amount of the cash he got, where he got it from, and on what date, and what he did with it; and so with the goods, he should say where he got them, and what he paid for them and how he disposed of them.

7312. This suggestion of yours is confined to a person carrying on a trade or business?—Yes, undoubtedly, I think you must limit it in that way certainly.

7313. (Mr. Chamberlin.) Following up that point, I assume that it would follow, as a matter of course, that where a prosecution was instituted this question of education would be considered in mitigation of the punishment?—I should think that would be very likely indeed. If the magistrate dealing with the case was satisfied that the case was not of very great importance and that the man was an illiterate man, naturally it would affect his judgment in determining the sentence which he should inflict.

7315. And that a great difference should be made between dealing with a man who is not keeping books of account for a fraudulent purpose evidently and a man who is not keeping books of account through inability to do so?—Of course, if there had been fraudulent non-keeping or destruction of books you could get him under the Debtors Act already, but this is something outside fraud.

7316. I used the word "fraud" to cover everything?—That is so.

7318. And, as a matter of common sense, I take it from your evidence that the work of overlooking undischarged bankrupts would be so great as to render it almost impossible to get any action taken?—Quite. I am perfectly certain you would not do it. Just think what the overlooking of 70,000 persons means, not once in their lives but every year or every half-year; and then again, the other point, which I put before you, is perhaps even a stronger one: What are you going to do if they do not do it?

7319. It is a great grievance on commercial classes in this country that it is impossible sometimes to trace with whom you are trading?—I agree.

7320. Therefore the Board of Trade, I take it from what you have told us to-day and from your Memorandum, are quite in favour of what some of us have been pressing for a good many years, that is to say, registration?—Yes, and I believe you will find that a Bill was drafted and is lying in some pigeon-hole somewhere on that very point.

7321. In that registration the disclosure of a woman trading would also be made?—Yes, you might extend it to any disability, and so catch your undischarged bankrupt.

7322. Do I take it from what you have said that the Board of Trade considers it undesirable to interfere with the voluntary arrangements?—I know really nothing about voluntary arrangements; it is out of my province altogether. I have carefully avoided saying anything about Paragraph 8, because my opinion is not worth having on the point.

7323. You need not answer this question unless you like: May I take it in your judgment the grievances against the present law are somewhat exaggerated?—I should say so. I have never heard any very serious grievances urged against the present law.

7324. (Mr. Richardson.) I would like to ask you one question with regard to the non-keeping of books, that is where books have been kept by respectable firms, kept for a series of years, and they have ceased to keep them, would you make it absolutely certain that punishment should follow?—I think my suggested clause would do it.

7325. I mean that there should be absolutely no excuse ?—There would be no excuse. The first part of my clause is that he shall keep books, and the second part punishes him if he shall not have carefully preserved, and does not deliver them up; so that first of all you impose upon him the obligation of keeping throughout the two years preceding the receiving order, and then the obligation of preserving and handing over, so I think that would meet everything you suggest.

7326. I do not say whether I am in favour of bankrupts reporting themselves or not, but do you think there would be any serious difficulty in bankrupts reporting themselves, if the onus of reporting themselves were put on them, that they should report from year to year, so long as they remained undischarged, with a limit of say ten years, that after ten years a man's discharge might follow as a matter of course; in the meantime do you think there would be any serious difficulty in getting a report from him if it was made penal, if he was subject to punishment if he did not make his report ?—It would be quite open to the Legislature to enact that, but I say this, your corresponding advantage would not be equal to the enormous expense which I fear would be involved.

7327. Did I understand you to say that as far as you knew there were not many undischarged bankrupts trading under assumed names ?—And incurring liabilities ? My experience is not that there are none of course, but that there are comparatively few undischarged bankrupts trading under names other than their own and incurring liabilities over £20, without disclosing the fact. I have not met with them; that is my experience.

7328. I take it you have no official statistics to prove that ?—No, except this, that we prosecute in every case of the kind, and I find that the number of our prosecutions is very small, and not only prosecutions, but our reports to the Board are very few in number. If there were many such cases brought to our knowledge reports would be made in every case, therefore they would be many in number; as a matter of fact they are very few. I do not think there is much breach of the provisions of Section 31. I have not found it so in my experience.

7329. You say that you would limit the making of married women bankrupt to those women who are trading in business ?—Yes.

7330. And that married women generally should not be subject to being made a bankrupt ?—No.

7331. Would not such a provision only affect the higher sections of society ?—I should think so. The higher sections of society and the lower class of traders I should think it would affect.

7332. Do you not think that most of the cases in which married women ought to be made bankrupt are in the higher grades of society ?—I do not think they ought to be made bankrupt at all. I think that bankruptcies ought to be confined, so far as women are concerned, to trading cases.

7333. And you say, and the Board of Trade say, that the creditors would be able to bring improper pressure to bear upon the husbands ?—Yes.

7334. In my opinion I do not think any pressure would be improper in the cases which I have read. Most of the married women have incurred enormous expenses for expensive goods, which the husband must have known of, and yet that is the great trouble. It is not among the people that trouble of this kind comes in. It is in the higher grades of society, where women can go to tradesmen and can buy, simply because of their position in society, and they get credit for extravagant things, the husband all the time knowing of it. Are they to be protected ?—No, I do not think so, but you must remember it is not compulsory on the tradesmen to give credit; the tradesman deals with a person whom he knows to be under disability, and if he gives credit under those circumstances he must look after himself.

7335. I do not see myself why it should not apply to married women generally. If a married woman in trade, why not married women generally ?—I will put it in my own case, because I do not like to put it in any other. Supposing my wife were extravagant, and supposing I were to see her having extravagant things beyond my station in life, I might find it very difficult to stop her doing so, but supposing the person who was giving credit says, "I am going to make your wife bankrupt," I should pay, although there was no moral reason why I should do so; on the contrary I should regard morality in the transaction as entirely wanting on the part of the tradesmen. My impression is that an improper amount of duress would be imposed by the tradesman upon the husband, who might be a perfectly innocent party.

12 June 1907.

7336. At present the unscrupulous husband and the unscrupulous wife, can do what they like, and they are unscrupulous so far as I have experience——

7337. (Chairman.) Perhaps that is rather a matter for argument.

7338. (Mr. Peat.) Is there any other objection to a bankrupt coming up for the consideration of his conduct at a specified time, except the question of expense ?—Yes, one other, I think, and that is that I do not think the creditors would get any practical good by his doing so. I know the suggestion has been made before the Committee that there would be likely to be a money order made upon him, and that apparently is the object of requiring a bankrupt to come up after a certain period, in order that the creditors may have an opportunity of requiring a money order to be made, but I doubt whether the creditors would get much advantage from a money order of the kind. We find at present that where judgments are entered, that is where money orders are made under the present procedure, we get practically nothing out of them. We get very little indeed. The money order is made and the man is compelled to set aside everything over and above so much a year. He is required to file annual accounts. Then his name is entered in a register, and once every year he is required to file accounts. If he has to set aside everything above £400 a year, he makes £399 a year, and so we get nothing, and we find that the yield of judgments in the High Court is extremely small. We do get money out of judgments, but we get it under another form of order, a form of order which I dislike, namely, where a man says, "I will consent to judgment, say for £500, and I will pay it at once, in order that it may not be registered against me." That means that pressure is put upon friends and relatives to find that £500. If the man is a rich man, possibly the amount may be paid, but if he is a poor man, the amount cannot be met. In fact, no such order would be made in the case of a poor man, but it is not right that a rich man should buy his discharge in that way. We find that really that is the only way in which money is got for creditors out of a bankrupt applying for his discharge. We do not find the money order effectual; that has been the experience of a long number of years.

7339. Would there not be an advantage from this point of view? You gave us an example of a man pledging something which was to come to him from a relative not yet dead, he becomes bankrupt, and he does not get his discharge, his conduct is not examined into, and he trades again, and those who trust him again a second time find that they are not the only block of creditors, but they are in addition to a block of creditors in the previous bankruptcy ?—Yes.

7340. If the man had come up and got his discharge, the second lot of creditors would have been entitled practically solely to the second lot of assets ?—Yes.

7341. Would there not be an advantage from that point of view ?—I think it would be a cause of very grave unfairness to the first class.

7342. You think it would be unfair for that particular man to get his discharge ?—In the particular case you put before me. Mind you, he would not get his discharge under the present practice in a case of that kind. In a case of that sort a money order would be made, at least that is the view we should urge on the Court. In the case of a bankrupt having expectations, we should urge the desirability of a judgment being entered up.

7343. We have been met with the suggestion that there are 70,000 bankrupts derelict, who do something in the way of trading, and when they become a second time bankrupt, it is found that the assets, against which the creditors thought they had a claim, are attached by somebody who is the trustee of a bankruptcy ten years before?—Yes.

7344. If these 70,000 came up automatically for consideration, they would then be in the position of trading with people who would be entitled to rank upon their subsequent assets to the exclusion of previous traders. I understand that does not weigh with you?—I think that is so manifestly unfair to the first class of creditors.

7345. That is your view?—I cannot help thinking that.

7346. I cannot press it, that is clear and distinct?—That is the view I take.

7347. I would like to ask a question with regard to the registration of firms. You say you would register the partners in firms. You may have a firm trading as "James Watson & Company" with half a dozen partners, none of whose names happens to be "Watson"?—That is so.

7348. Has that a serious connection with this question to which I have just been referring of catching an undischarged bankrupt trading?—I think so. At present, as I understand, the difficulty which constantly arises is this, that a man is trading under a name other than his own: he may be an undischarged bankrupt, and there are no means of ascertaining whether he is or is not.

7349. Let me assume that the person who so trades does not desire to be known to be trading, and the registration, therefore, is that A., B., and C. are trading as "James Watson & Company"?—Yes.

7350. That does not disclose that D. is also trading in that firm; how much better off are you?—How do you mean, how much better off am I? I should make it penal if the man does not register. Exactly what form of enactment would have to follow I do not know; whether the non-registration should entail a fine or invalidate the contracts, I am not certain. You would probably have to follow the Money-lenders Act in some way there, but it is no use making a provision unless you also make a punishment for its non-observance.

7351. You would never find out if it was not observed until they ceased to pay?—Then you would prosecute them.

7352. That might remedy it, but it might be within six months?—You have not to be too hard and fast in your provisions. At all events, the register would do some good.

7353. It is a very, very large whale to catch a small sprat?—There is not only one sprat, there are several sprats. We have it that the undischarged bankrupt is carrying on this business; we have it also complained that the undischarged bankrupt is carrying on business under an assumed name, and we have it also in a way which comes practically before me. I cannot find out who is trading in a certain trade name.

7354. That is you, I understand, the Official Receiver, but ordinary trading men dealing with matters of that sort can get the information nine times out of ten from an inquiry office unless it is a very low-down firm?—That is not my experience. I am bound to say I have not much experience in the matter; your experience is very much wider than mine on that point, but I should have thought there was a great deal of difficulty in a trade inquiry office giving the names or getting the information.

7355. They give the information as far as the firm will give it. I am aware the firm may say, "We have three partners," whereas in fact there are four, but you do not catch the fourth man unless you register them, and you never find out if they have registered him till they are bankrupt?—That might still be a good position for the creditors; if they find out that D. is an affluent man and in fact a partner in the James Watson firm, they would come down on him for the payment of their debts.

7356. I will depart from that because I have exhausted all I have to say on it. Now, who is a trader? Is an accountant a trader?—I do not think an accountant is a trader.

7357. You do not think so?—I do not think an accountant is a trader within the old definition of "trader," I believe not. Under the 1869 Act, I do not think he is a trader.

7358. You would have to define who is a trader?—In what connection?

7359. For registration, if you went on with the registration?—I am not going to confine my registration to traders; I am going to make my registration that of persons trading or carrying on business.

7360. You have put in your memorandum "all persons trading"?—That is not exhaustive. I should certainly extend it to persons carrying on business.

7361. You would extend the register not only to traders, but to professional men?—Yes; I do not think this memorandum is meant to be exhaustive. They were only suggestions. If it is necessary to come to actually framing an Act of Parliament, all these small points will have to be considered. A financial agent is a gentleman in whom I take a great interest very often; certainly he is not a trader.

7362. (Mr. Addison.) About after-acquired property, you told us you considered it unfair to the old creditors if it went altogether to the new?—Yes.

7363. Do you apply that to property which the man has acquired we will say for value, goods delivered by the subsequent creditors, or only to property which comes to him from some voluntary source?—As I said, in the case of a second trading clearly the second creditors have the greater right, but I put it that in other cases the first creditors had a better right. You have to find out some rule which will apply to both; therefore, I say that your rule can be but one of thumb only. Therefore, let both come in pari passu. I see the greatest difficulty in framing any enactment which will meet the justice of every case.

7364. (Mr. Peat.) When you say pari passu there, supposing the first set of creditors had 5s. would the second set get 5s. before the first come in?—No, I think we guard ourselves against that, by suggesting that they should be entitled to payment out of after-acquired property not already distributed pari passu with the creditors under the prior bankruptcy.

7365. (Mr. Addison.) You were saying that when a person takes property from an undischarged bankrupt without notice of bankruptcy and for value, you would let him hold it?—Yes.

7366. Do you not think it would be desirable to give some power to the Court to settle by decision whether he was a purchaser for value and without notice? I am speaking more of real estate, where the title depends on want of notice. It cannot be forced on the purchaser. It is not a marketable title?—No.

7367. Do you think it would be well to give power to the Court to determine on an application when it was without notice and for value that he was a person entitled to hold?—It would be rather difficult to frame a clause to that effect, would it not? The point which has always struck me is this, that there is something not quite bonâ fide in the position of a person who is dealing with property which he knows another might successfully claim if he was aware of its existence. That is Hunt v. Fripp. It seems to me that although it was held that the purchaser there acted bonâ fide, as a matter of fact there was a want of bonâ fides to be implied from the circumstances of the case.

7368. My point is really confined to real estate. I was thinking of the case of a man who went from the country, came somewhere else, and dropped one of his names, bought land and mortgaged it, and there was no means by which the person dealing with him could discover it. Would it not be right in that case that the court should make his title a good one by some declaration?—He would get it under this provision.

7369. Not a marketable title, because his title would depend on want of notice, and such a title is a bad one?—That is the effect of the present decisions, I agree; but if you were to amend the law by protecting a transaction without notice, then he would get a marketable title, would he not?

7370. No.—Then I should certainly allow him to get it. I thought he would have it under the suggested provision.

7371. Now about the sheriff and the sale of goods; I was thinking of a furnished house. Supposing someone let a furnished house for a couple of months and went abroad. It would be very uncomfortable when he came home to find that his goods had been sold by the sheriff and he had no remedy except to ask for some odd shillings or pounds which the sale of the furniture had produced ?—We provide, I think, as it is, that the sale has to be duly advertised.

7372. That is a difficulty ?—I quite agree there must be difficulties, but in the present state of the law it is very hard that a person, who does his duty, should nevertheless be saddled with an action for trespass when he thinks he is doing his duty all the time, and thinks he has exercised every care.

7373. You do not find assignments of book debts in what I may call mercantile failures, but failures of small traders ?—Yes.

7374. Are those mostly for money lent or to secure past advances ?—You may take it in the greater number of instances they are to relatives who have advanced money.

7375. At the time ?—No, they are very often given to secure a past debt. I think I may say generally so.

7376. You find it amongst small traders ?—Yes.

7377. Any particular class of traders ?—No, I do not think it is confined to any particular class.

7378. (Mr. Smith.) With reference to that last answer you gave, do you mean that you would object to the registration of an assignment of debts by a small trader. Do you see any objection in principle ?—No, it would be a good thing if you could do it, without doing more than a corresponding amount of evil. That is the fear in my mind.

7379. I suppose you recognise at present there is a great evil arising from the risk of the assignment of book debts by a small trader ?—Of future book debts, a very great evil indeed, but an assignment of present book debts cures itself in a short sime, because unless notice is given to the persons owing the debts they are gradually paid to the trader and so the creditor loses the security.

7380. I understand you make void any general assignment of debts present and future ?—I would make absolutely void any assignment of future book debts, all book debts that were not in existence at the time of the assignment.

7381. Or any general assignment of all the debts of the debtor. Would you see any objection to that ?—I am really in doubt about that, whether it would be advisable or not. I think you would find it very difficult to enact that a general assignment should be void and yet allow a particular assignment. I should imagine there would be difficulties in the way. I do not think it would be wise to provide that registration should be necessary in the case of an individual book debt.

7382. There is a suggestion which has occurred to me. You may perhaps consider it rather a wild one. I put it merely with a view of ascertaining whether there is any way of meeting both difficulties. Supposing in such cases of assignment as you refer to, of a builder or a shipbuilder, where advances are made on the security of book debts: supposing a provision could be made that in these cases there should be a reserve of a portion of the security for the benefit of unsecured creditors—an automatic reservation so that a man should not be able to assign his whole debts and take them away from his estate, that would probably lead to a smaller advance ?—Naturally it would.

7383. Would that be a real evil ? Would it not be some protection to the general body of the unsecured creditors who, after all, have some grounds for consideration ?—I think I adhere to my opinion that it would be a mischief to require registration at all, and also not to allow a person advancing money on an existing book debt, to have the full benefit of his security. I think he ought.

7384. (Mr. Evans.) A future book debt requires to be very carefully defined, does it not ?—Of course, it would have to be.

Mr. Edwin Leaiam Hough.

12 June 1907.

7385. In the case of the retention money it is only a chose in action till it becomes due ?—It would have to be guarded.

7386. (Mr. Peat.) "On existing contracts" is how you put it in the Memorandum ?—Yes.

7387. (Mr. Smith.) As to Paragraph 5 of the Board of Trade's Memorandum, I do not know whether I quite understood its effect. They are of opinion that the law should be altered so as to protect the rights of a person acquiring title through a bankrupt to after acquired property, whether real or personal, in good faith, for valuable consideration, and without knowledge of the bankruptcy. Does that mean that a person who has knowledge of the bankruptcy acquiring a title from the bankrupt would forfeit his title ?—Yes, he does not get a good title.

7388. Then what about the case of an ignorant or innocent transferee or mortgagee from that person, who has no knowledge of the bankruptcy and no knowledge of the defect in the title ?—I am afraid you could only invalidate the transaction as against the original purchaser.

7389. You would extend those words "without the knowledge of the bankruptcy" to any subsequent transferee who had no knowledge ?—Yes, if there was an innocent sub-transferee it would be a very hard thing to take the property away from him.

7390. Very hard indeed ?—I think by this clause the direct purchaser does not derive a good title if, after having notice, he still buys.

7391. That is a matter which could be met in drafting the clause ?—Certainly. This is not meant to be exhaustive.

7392. (Chairman.) Arising out of that question of the assignment of book debts, I wonder whether you would mind my asking you a question, not as an officer of the Court, but as a lawyer, if I may put this case. I argued the case of Tailby v. The Official Receiver, in which a general assignment of book debts was alleged, and I tried to argue that a general assignment of book debts ought to be void on public grounds, and Lord Macnaghten said:—"Why should not a man be able to borrow money and pledge as security the debts which are to become due to him ?—The future book debts ?

7393. Yes; he put an instance of a man starting a whaling expedition, and said: "Why should not he be able to borrow money on the profits which he expected to clear ?" And he said that the equitable jurisdiction which had sanctioned such assignments had grown up because it was thought that that ought to be given effect to ?—You were concerned as to the validity of it ?

7394. Entirely. However, that is rather a lawyer's question ?—Yes, and of course that is an exceptional case too.

7395. (Mr. Addison.) Under Section 47, about property, would you apply that to a contract on marriage to settle property coming from a relative, such as a father. I mean a covenant that on his father's death and out of his estate he would transfer so much. That is property which comes voluntarily to the bankrupt, as distinguished from property which he may acquire for value. It does sometimes happen that on the marriage a man undertakes to pay out of money coming from a relative, or on the death of a relative, so much ?—From a specified relative ?

7396. Yes. That is property which never was his own ?—Yes, I see your point.

7397. It may become part of the marriage contract ?—I should say certainly, when the fund is specified, that the settlement ought to be good.

JOHN SMITH, ESQ., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, ESQ. (Secretary).

Mr. WILLIAM EVANS, called ; and Examined.

Mr. William Evans.
19 June, 1907.

7398. (Chairman.) I would mention to the Committee before we begin with the Inspector-General's evidence, that there has been forwarded to this Committee a letter addressed to the President of the Board of Trade, from the Bradford and District Chamber of Commerce, saying that at a meeting of the Council of that Chamber considerable discussion took place upon the experience of tradesmen which in the past has proved that it is a very easy matter for a debtor to avoid the consequences of a proper examination of his affairs by stating that he has never kept any books ; therefore they offer for consideration the following resolution : " In the event of any alteration or strengthening of the Bankruptcy Laws, this Chamber is of opinion that in all cases of failure the non-keeping of books should be made a penal offence." I thought as they are an important body it was well to have that on our record.

7399. I think that from 1884 to 1889 you were Official Receiver in bankruptcy for the Chester and North Wales District ?—Yes.

7400. Which comprised four Courts ?—That is so.

7401. I think at first you were paid on the system of remuneration by fees, and afterwards on a salary, your duties being extended to inspecting official receivers' offices ?—Quite so. It was an experimental inspection then, it was the first attempt at inspection.

7402. I think in 1889 you were appointed inspector of Official Receivers for the whole of England and Wales ?—Yes, and brought up to London.

7403. On that work I think you were engaged for about seventeen years ?—Yes.

7404. Since 1906 you have been Inspector-General ?—Yes, acting since December, 1905.

7405. I think previous to 1884, when you acquired your first public appointment, you were engaged in a bank ?—I was.

7406. As branch manager and afterwards manager ?—Branch manager for fourteen years, at Chester most of the time.

7407. So that we may take it that you have had a very large practical experience, both of the working of official receivers' departments in the country and in London, and also in the general administrative work of the Board of Trade in its Bankruptcy Department ?—Yes, a varied experience.

7409. Upon the next subject we have had a good deal of evidence before us that it would be a useful change to make the consideration of the bankrupt's discharge as a matter of course within a fixed time instead of being subject to his applying for it. Are you in favour of that change of the law, or that the law should remain as it is : that the bankrupt should apply if he desires to obtain a discharge ?—There is a good deal to be said on both sides In my opinion the balance of the argument is in favour of leaving things as they are, so as not to deal with the question of discharge until there is a movement by the bankrupt himself.

7410. You are aware that one of the things that has been most complained of before us is that the result of the present system is that there is a large number of undischarged bankrupts, and that they are persons who do not think of applying for their discharge ?—I think the number is smaller than has been estimated, 70,000. The calculation has been made as though all were living who have ever been bankrupt. A good many of them are dead ; there can be no doubt of it. In the next place most of them do no harm ; it is only when they begin to incur credit and trade again, that they are not harmless. I should prefer to leave the harmless ones alone ; many are in situations earning livings in other ways than by the business where they had been unsuccessful, and very often incompetent. I should emphasise rather the present disabilities of bankrupts who endeavour to trade without discharge ; make that a little more difficult for them ; I do not know if you would like me to go into the question how to make it more difficult. That comes up presently. The only real trouble, I think, is the trouble of after-acquired property, which I should so alter that the incidental circumstance of being an undischarged bankrupt as it affects the public would be very largely removed ; and then leave it to the man himself to apply for his discharge.

7411. That is to say you would alter the law so as to protect people who deal with an undischarged bankrupt more than they are protected now ?—I think that is the remedy the public really requires. The undischarged bankrupt is no greater peril to the ordinary tradesman than the discharged bankrupt, who is no better for being discharged. A. is undischarged, B. is discharged ; A. and B. are equally poor. In what way can the undischarged man, living privately, damage me, if I am a boot-maker or a grocer, more than the man who is discharged? When you deal with after-acquired property I think we shall meet the difficulty. There is this important fact against arranging the discharge until the bankrupt applies himself, that not unfrequently, by some luck, money comes which benefits his creditors, and that sometimes when very little, if anything, has been paid to them previously. I have been struck by examples of this which occurred last year, in a single receivership—not a large one—in the Midlands. I will mention them briefly, with initials only, and the date of the bankruptcy:—

"C. J." 1888. On his death, property discovered by his will was claimed by the official receiver, and resulted in 8s. 8½d. supplemental dividend to the creditors.

"R. B." 1897. £41 12s., received for his interest under a will; further dividend, 5½d.

"T. C." 1898. £65 from two life policies; further dividend 3s. 1d.

"R. S." 1895. £250 received under compromises from people with whom the bankrupt had dealings in real property. Further dividend, 6s. 5½d.

'J. W. H." 1904. £47 by surrender of a life policy—supposed to be fully mortgaged when the estate was in the trustee's hands.

"E. B." 1890. £200 was received by the official receiver, under will, in favour of the bankrupt. He and his friends found another £100, so that 20s. in the £ could be paid, and an annulment of the bankruptcy applied for.

"J. A." 1888. £61 beneficial interest in a life policy; further dividend about 8s.

"G. T." 1886. One of two partners in a bankruptcy twenty years ago; undischarged trading under cover of his wife's name. Under pressure he will probably pay up to 20s. in the £ to the joint creditors and to his own separate creditors. About £4,000 must be forthcoming for this.

"W. E." 1893. "H. E." 1901. In both these cases legacies sufficient to bring up dividend to 20s., with interest at 4 per cent. for thirteen and five years, respectively.

This is in one year and one district. If these men had been brought up for discharge by some automatic rule, most of them would have obtained their discharge long ago, and the creditors would have lost these advantages.

7412. Was there any special reason made apparent why they did not apply for their discharge for sixteen years?—I have not inquired, but cases are very rare indeed where the conditions are not such as would be met within a moderate suspension. I can inquire and let you know precisely whether, looking at the conduct of these men, there was a block to their discharge which the court would not have removed. But that is very unusual.

7413. Do you think it would be advantageous to increase and enforce more strictly the disabilities of undischarged bankrupts so as to afford them greater inducements to apply for their discharge?—On the whole I think not, except as regards incurring credit.

7414. I meant more such disabilities as being unable to hold a public office, and so forth, whether they might be extended?—I do not think so. How long does the disqualification now exist?

7415. Seven years. You have pointed out to us by illustration how occasionally benefit may arise to creditor from bankrupts remaining undischarged. I think the upshot of your evidence on this point is that on the whole you would rather see things remain as they are in this respect?—I do, after the difficulties as to after-acquired property are dealt with.

7416. Let us pass to our second branch, that is as regards offences under the Debtors Act and the Bankruptcy Act. Are you in favour of making them punishable under the Summary Jurisdiction Act instead of having them to go before a jury?—Most decidedly, for I think that short and sharp penalties certainly following would be much more effective than few and heavier punishments. I think I would also make this distinction; to give men who are conscious of their guilt the inducement to submit themselves to summary jurisdiction, rather than go for trial before judge and jury. Under the first procedure, the maximum penalties are three, or, in some cases, six months' imprisonment; while under the other procedure the maximum may be two years.

7417. Would there be any practical difficulty in the official receiver prosecuting before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction?—I do not think so. We might have, and ought, to pay him something for it, but I think generally they would be quite capable and it would connect the punishment obviously with bankruptcy administration.

7418. I suppose you would authorise in country districts the official receiver to appoint a local solicitor to prosecute?—Yes; broadly the recommendation is that the Board of Trade undertake it. To what extent the bankruptcy department would deal through the official receiver or through the solicitor's department is a matter of detail. Probably we should deal generally through the solicitor of the Board of Trade, who has local agents for other purposes; for instance, the purposes of the Shipping Acts and so on.

7419. Akin to that question are matters which are not now punishable criminally, but which many witnesses have advocated should be punished. In other words, what new penal offences should be created? Are you in favour, as so many witnesses are, of making the non-keeping of any kind of book or record a penal offence?—I should certainly: for, by making the non-keeping of books a penal offence in bankruptcy, it would enforce a valuable lesson not yet learnt in England, that all who are in trade ought to keep books. I am convinced that many people would avoid bankruptcy if they only kept simple books, that would show what money they received and what they had done with it. To borrow a metaphor from the Marine Department—"when you are sailing in shallow waters, you must use the lead frequently, and not move too fast."

7420. Would you be in favour of confining the punishment to cases in which the debts exceeded a certain sum, as it is in Scotland?—Perhaps it would be a rough way of sparing people who are very small traders; otherwise I should be disposed to leave it to the discretion of the official receiver, with the consent of the Board of Trade, when not to take up a prosecution. But a limit would do very well, £50 or not more than £100, of indebtedness.

7421. By proper books would you mean a sort of simple record of cash receipts on one side and of payments on the other, and of goods received and sold?—Yes, goods sold may seem an awkward thing to record when you are selling over the counter in small quantities, but it is simply recording the sales of each day for cash, or credit.

7422. From your large experience in the provinces, do you see any practical difficulty in the way of making this an offence, having regard to the great varieties of trade?—No. The essential thing is that the definition of obligatory book-keeping should be wide; making it clear that expert accountancy is not required; for the keeping of plain books is not too much for any honest and fairly careful man. People soon become more careful with practice if their intentions are honest. A record of all the money they receive on one side, and of its application on the other side—that is the cash book; a filing of all invoices, and an entry of goods bought for cash or on credit on one side, and on the other side the amount of goods daily sold for cash, which would be known from the cash book, and the amount sold on credit, which would be taken from the simple record which all traders must now keep of what they sell on credit—that makes the goods' account.

7423. (Mr. Peat.) Would you add to that a statement of affairs or an annual balance sheet?—Yes, that is essential; that also must be enforced.

7424. (Chairman.) Besides the suggested offence of not keeping books, do you think that failure to account for any loss of assets where the deficiency exceeds, say, 50 per cent., is a thing which might be made an offence?—I really think that sometimes a man does not know the true reasons of his insolvency. When a man who has kept a small shop assisted by several members of his family, not continuously the same members, is asked what it cost him to maintain his family he is often only able to answer at random—he may say £2 a week. If pressed, he will say that he paid for everything his family wanted from the till ; he kept no record. Such a man, with perhaps sons and grown up daughters assisting him in the shop with free access to the shop till, cannot really know what went to keep his family. Where there has been no effort at all to keep accurate accounts, I am inclined to make the failure to account for the deficiency one of the penal offences. The punishment must of course be applied with much discretion, yet if the meshes of the net are made too large, some very bad men will wriggle through.

7425. Then, as to loss of assets by gambling, do you think that is a matter which should be made an offence ?—I think so ; for I believe that losses by gambling are sometimes pleaded to mask secret misappropriations. I remember a case where a man on his public examination had acknowledged losses by gambling and betting, which the Official Receiver charged him with on his application for discharge. The bankrupt's solicitor turned it off by alleging that he had not really lost the money in that way ; but that he had helped his brother or friend ; in other words, he had helped himself or his relatives to money which was not his to give, and, rather than acknowledge it, had falsely pleaded betting losses. This increases the importance and propriety of making losses by gambling a penal offence.

7426. Lastly, would you include also culpable neglect of business ?— That is a fault on which the judiciary would have to exercise much discriminating judgment, but I think it would be well to bring it in.

7427. In every case you would make this subject to the discretion of the Court ; the Court would give an order to prosecute ?—Yes, I think so.

7428. (Mr. Addison.) Are those offences limited to traders ?—No, as to gambling I would bring other people in, certainly.

7429. (Chairman.) If it brings on bankruptcy ?—Yes. If a man owes hundreds of pounds to his tailor and for rent and to hotels where he has lived, and says : " I lost it by gambling " ; why should not he take the same punishment as the trader ? That is my reason for holding that it applies all round.

7430. Passing on to the fourth subject of our inquiry, which is also the fourth subject of the memorandum with which the Board of Trade have favoured us, do you think that with any advantage there could be an extension of the power to realise in cases of urgency, either by the Court or by the Official Receiver ?—There are cases where urgency may be pleaded, but they are not very many. As to the sale of businesses as going concerns, very often the power to sell is there long before a purchaser can be found. Finding the purchaser is a greater difficulty than want of power to sell. Then if you leave it to the creditors too much, there are cases in the drapery trade and the public-house line especially, where the principal creditors may have an indirect interest in forcing a sale quickly. They have the incoming tenant at hand. A single large creditor, or a combination of creditors with special connections must not be given too much influence with the Court or with the Official Receiver in the disposal of businesses, for it may be used to the detriment of the creditors at large.

7431. But to the detriment of the general body ?—Yes, I have seen plenty of cases where one is told, " Sell it to so-and-so, he will take over the fixtures at a valuation," while there is good-will also to be had if that sale is not forced.

7432. If the Court had power to order a sale on a short notice of application in a proper case, that might be an advantage, might it not ?—I should say so, but on the application of the Official Receiver.

7433. With the approval, I suppose, of the principal creditors ?—I should think you would consult a man knowing the class of business, especially in cases—there have been in London a good many of them—where the debtors are not yet bankrupt and want to avoid adjudication. They appeal against the Receiving Order, they appeal against everything for delay, and the Official Receiver being still only Receiver cannot touch the asset, he can only hold it. If there be property deteriorating in value, or perhaps costly to protect all this time, the estate diminishes by every adjournment. I think in those cases it would be well to give the Court power, on the application of the Official Receiver, to say : " Yes, you may have the adjournment, but that portion of your estate which is deteriorating must be sold unless you can prove that the Official Receiver may go on holding it without risk of ultimate loss to the creditors." If that line were taken, it would tend probably to diminish the resistance of some debtors to being adjudicated, and put a stop to wasteful delays in the efforts to buy off the pressing creditors.

7434. Passing on to Paragraph 5 which deals with the question of after-acquired property of an undischarged bankrupt, would you be in favour of altering the law so as to protect the title of a person who acquires title through a bankrupt to after-acquired property, whether real or personal ?—I think I may meet the views of the Committee by expressing myself as agreeing altogether on this point with the witness you had here a week ago, Mr. Leadam Hough.

7435. That is to say you will confine it to those who honestly acquire property or deal with the bankrupt without knowledge of the bankruptcy ?—Yes, in the memorandum referred to, the word " honest " is not used. The Board of Trade memorandum conveys this as a recommendation :—" The Board consider that the claims of creditors whose debts have been incurred subsequent to the bankruptcy should be recognised whether there is a second bankruptcy or not, and they should be entitled to payment out of after-acquired property not already distributed." I should put in a word the Board of Trade have not put in the memorandum, " whose debts have been ' honestly ' incurred." That is to say, we should guard against the creation of debts by friends and relations which are very difficult to disprove, however much open to suspicion. I should myself be inclined to say also, " whose debts have been incurred for goods supplied to him in his trade or for his maintenance."

7436. Now passing on to No. 6, do you agree with, and adopt the memorandum with reference to married women, that is to say that those in trade should be subject to the bankruptcy laws, but that those who do not trade should not ?—At present I understand a woman must be trading separately from her husband to be made bankrupt ?

7437. Yes ?—I should equally bring her in to be made bankrupt if she is trading with her husband, but as to married women who are not traders, I try to look at these phings not from the administration point of view only, but in the general interest of the community, the body politic as a whole ; and I am rather slow to allow a married woman to be harried with bankruptcy proceedings by people who have trusted her recklessly. Credit is too freely given to married women. It would be given still more freely if moneyienders and traders in certain classes of goods were able to say " We can make her husband pay by threatening his wife with bankruptcy." I think we should not increase the inclination to give credit to married women, in that way ; for everything that a married woman living with her husband really needs she can get on her husband's credit. When she wants things that are not necessary, why should not the trader who is going to trust her, or the moneylender, make inquiries just as a banker would ? A banker does not lend money without making inquiry ; why should a jeweller sell diamonds without making inquiries first ? Let him put plain questions, then if he finds she has means, he will trust her, but unless she can prove that, let him not trust her. I try to look at this question in the public interest generally, not the professional, nor the traders' point of view. That is why I do not favour the extension of credit to married women who are not in any business. It requires very strong reasons, which do not, in my opinion, exist, for exposing the marital relation to the blight of bankruptcy, merely that traders may more freely trust married women.

7438. Would you at all give any remedy to a judgment creditor of a married woman who is not a trader in reference to her estate ?—It occurred to me lately that when a married woman who has property declines or neglects to pay her debts knowing that she cannot be made bankrupt, and because the property she enjoys is vested probably in a trustee, and therefore more difficult to get at, bankruptcy proceedings might be instituted against her property upon a judgement debt, subject to the same checks as a bankruptcy petition, and in that way the property would be brought under the control of the Court and the Official Receiver. He would be enabled to prosecute inquiries; to examine witnesses under Section 27; in short to apply all the resources of the Bankruptcy Acts for the investigation and reclamation of the property of a married woman who is not in trade without entailing upon her the personal disabilities of bankruptcy. Some publicity there must of course be to ensure the equal division among her creditors of her property. I would even go so far as to put a check to some extent on the "restraint on anticipation" in order to pay debts which a woman has incurred. The removal of the restraint, pro tem. for that purpose would affect only herself. When a lady with a certain known income without power of anticipation has obtained luxuries and pleasures, for which she has not paid, it would not be unfair to give a Court discretion to apply her income, or a portion of it, for a time, to liquidate her debts. It would be as if the Court should say: "Madam, until your debts are paid or compounded for through the Court, you must live on less than your full income, notwithstanding the restraint on anticipation." This may seem a crude idea, but it occurred to me in view of a hard case which reached me two days ago. This is written on the 12th June, "It appears to me to be high time that the Act of Parliament, which exonerates married women who dishonour their just liabilities, was removed from the Statute Book, for I can assure you that at the present time the fullest advantage is being taken of it by many well-to-do married women. The practice is causing a terrible annual loss to many tradesmen. In my own business"—I do not give the name, but the nature of the business will appear presently—"I have recently had two cases of this kind. The first is a married woman who has become possessed of over twenty houses under the will of her father. I did various works on several of her houses, and although perfectly satisfied with the work, which was obtained by competitive estimate, I have had to summons her for the balance of the account. I have obtained judgment against her, but have failed to get any money, and my solicitor says we cannot do any more in the matter as she is a married woman. To go further would mean great expense and possibly even then without result." As one can imagine, the solicitor sees the difficulties. "The second case is that I have done a lot of work in a house for a well-to-do lady who was married shortly after the completion of the work, and since then she continues to make delays and numerous excuses, apparently because she knows the law is on her side." In a case like that if a man could go to the Bankruptcy Court and obtain an Order for the Official Receiver to make inquiries (he must get a fee for it), investigations under Section 27 and the other powers of the Bankruptcy Act would be quick, direct, and very much cheaper than certain processes which Mr. Addison knows better than I. I do not see why we should not help creditors in cases like that where the debts have been incurred for the benefit of a lady's property, if it can be done without going to the length of making a married woman, who is not a trader, bankrupt, except as regards an attachment of her property.

7439. I think what you would really do is, you would rather extend the principle which now applies where a married woman brings an action, that is to say she can be ordered to pay the costs and a receiver appointed of her separate estate to collect that money, and to pay the successful defendant?—There is a power like that under the Act of 1893, I believe, even to touch moneys which are guarded by restraint from anticipation. That shows that the principle is already known to the law. What I say is not the Board of Trade's considered view; it is my own notion from my observation of affairs both in, and apart from, bankruptcy.

7440. I think that as regards any amendment of the law relating to settlements of property, you agree with what is set out in the Board of Trade memorandum?—I do. There is a drafted clause there, is there not?

7441. Yes. I think that was explained last time a good deal by Mr. Hough, so I will not take up more time with it. I come now to a question with which Mr. Hough did not deal, namely, the question of voluntary arrangement between a debtor and his creditors. The Board of Trade memorandum deals with this to a considerable extent, but, as far as regards myself, I should rather like, if it is not inconvenient to you, to ask you particularly about the points that are referred to in our terms of reference, namely, whether you think that it would be advantageous that a trustee under a voluntary arrangement should be made to give security. I see that the Board of Trade memorandum is in favour of that?—That is because we have seen so much that is wicked done by trustees who cannot be got at.

7442. The sort of trustees who are nothing at all?—Trustees who are nothing at all. There is one class of deeds of arrangement which I believe is working very well. It is confined, I might say, almost to one trade; it is an organised system in the wholesale drapery trade. There you have both competition and supervision. The largest creditor names the accountant who shall be trustee. In the next case another firm may be the principal creditor, and he names another accountant. These accountants are well-known men, and the fact that several of them work out these assignments under the observation of the same groups of firms ensures energy, honesty, and fair economy, for if A.B. nominated by a certain firm were often slower and dearer than the accountants nominated by other firms, then he would in time be passed over. When a certain trade is organised like that I do not know that you need even demand security; though the creditors might arrange for such trustees to give a continuing guarantee to obviate the necessity of considering the question of security in each case. While providing in that way a possible option for any group of commercial houses who combine to work these deeds to the satisfaction of the creditors, and where a minority is not bound by the assignment, I am sure it would be well to enforce security on these trustees in every case. One very desirable result would be to exclude a class of what one may almost call predatory trustees, for they would not be able to obtain security.

7443. Would you also advocate that the costs of the solicitors of the proceedings should be taxed by the bankruptcy taxing officer?—We would recommend that. I need not give the reasons, they are pretty obvious.

7444. Would you be in favour also of the Board of Trade having power to audit the accounts of a trustee if it was desired?—Yes, upon cause shown.

7445. Not as a matter of course?—Oh, dear no. If you made us auditors of them, then we should see advertised all over the world, "This deed is under the supervision and audit of the Board of Trade," and the deeds would compete with bankruptcy proceedings, where we inquire into the bankrupt's conduct. The public would not understand the essential difference between the two systems; and very many people would think, contrary to fact, that the Board of Trade audit carried with it control over the expenses. I should be glad if you would allow me to give facts to show it is most important not to fall back on the very loose system that prevailed under the Acts of 1861 and 1869, in which insolvencies were much more rampant than they are now.

7446. You can recollect the administration of the Act of 1861?—Yes, I remember it was bad enough to bring about the Act of 1869, which was an attempt to cure its evils. It caused grave scandals, and lived only eight years.

7447. Under the Act of 1869 had you considerable experience?—Fortunately I made no bad debts as a banker, but I was in touch with commercial men who had their share of them, and I knew the class of solicitors who worked petitions for liquidation under that Act. In every town there were some solicitors who lived chiefly by managing those cases. When a man was in difficulties, they said, "Come to us, we will put you through;" and they did it with a vengeance. The man went "through," and came out jubilant. A wholesale merchant in Liverpool told me in 1887, "The difference between the Act of 1883 and the Act of 1869 is this: Under the Act of 1869, when we pressed a debtor he turned on us, and said airily, 'If you will not give me time, I will file.' Now the man does not say that; it is we that tell him to some purpose, 'If you do not pay, we will file.'" As to the Act of 1861, in one of those books of reminiscences that are so frequent nowadays I read this (it is by the late Mr. J. G. Witt, K.C., in his book "Life in the Law") under a headline "The Sins of the Law," "In 1849 a fresh effort was made, and some years later Lord Westbury tried his hand" —that is the Act of 1861—"and in those happy days a debtor could get a deed written out, have it executed by his cook and his housemaid, and three or four friends as creditors, and then say to the rest, 'Look here, a majority in number and two-thirds in value of my creditors are ready to release me at half a crown in the £; you can sign it if you like, but if you do not it does not matter to me because you are in the minority.' Thirty or forty years ago these dreadful deeds used to be pleaded as defences to actions, and counsel were driven wild with efforts to support or upset them. The scandal became at last outrageous, and they were consigned to outer darkness, but the frauds which were committed under that law demoralised thousands of people; there were fictitious creditors, debts falsely multiplied by five or six, persuasion and bribery to sign, every imaginable iniquity, all the necessary results of a wicked law." I do not know whether Mr. Witt had suffered, but he writes as if he had.

7448. I should rather like to know to what extent you would put trustees of deeds under any supervision as distinct from the position they hold now, namely, of being only subject to the same responsibilities as an ordinary trustee, that is to say the Court of Chancery will enforce the trust and they have to file once a year accounts at the Board of Trade?—I think there should be all the interference we mention in this memorandum.

7449. You would not add to that?—I do not think I should, mainly for this reason. A great deal has been said, and will be said, that creditors have a right to manage their own affairs in their own way, and I feel there is great deal of force in that, provided you do not let a majority bind a minority. That is the reason I do not want to meddle with deeds.

7450. Would you shorten the time within which a bankruptcy potition may be presented by a dissenting creditor in the cases in which a large majority of the creditors have agreed. I do not think that point is exactly dealt with?—We say that a creditor might be disabled from presenting a petition unless he does so within one month after receiving notice of the deed. I would like to add this: "Upon proof that he had received notice being given."

7451. Would you at all reduce the limit of a petitioning creditor's debt below £50, in a case where there has been an assignment of all the debtor's property?—With that proviso I think I should. If a man puts out of the way all his assets and prevents a creditor getting at him by the usual processes of the law, I think the right of the creditor to petition should be reduced to cases where the debt is £20. Otherwise he is helpless unless he finds someone else, or two or three to join him in a petition. He sees everything swept away perhaps by the action of two or three men, relatives or friends of the debtor, and he is entirely helpless. I think that if you allow a man to be deprived, by the deed, of the ordinary resources of the recovery of his debt, you should enable him to fall back on another resource. I do not necessarily mean that the power of petitioning on debts not under £20 should apply to every act of bankruptcy.

7452. I think that you adopt personally the views set out in the Board of Trade memorandum, that assignments of future book debts should be void?—I do, and I personally go a little beyond that. I do not find from my own experience, nor by inquiries from Official Receivers or from bankers—you have had one banker here, Mr. Spencer Phillips, who, being the chairman of a bank, is not concerned with details. I have spoken to the general managers of great banks, one of them with about 100 branches, and they assure me that general assignments of book debts seldom come under their notice. Still they are occasionally met with, and are mischievous where the assignment is soon followed by bankruptcy, and cannot be set aside as fraudulent preferences; therefore I have some few suggestions which I submit, not for the Board of Trade, but simply as my own.

7453. Would you mind giving them to us?—I do not think that the registration of all assignments is necessary; for the practice of assigning debts does not prevail greatly, and assignments of future debts should always be void. An assignment of debts accrued, or accruing, under existing contracts have a certain analogy to the transfer of debts by means of bills of exchange; but there are debts for which it is not usual to draw bills and the debtors who would not accept bills; it is not their line. In such cases the assignment of a debt growing due, or which has just become due, which waits, perhaps, for the certificate of a surveyor or an architect, is not essentially different from the transfer of a debt by means of a bill of exchange. A compulsory public registration is in such cases undesirable, for such assignments are quite recognised as expedients for obtaining money and goods in executing contracts. Yet to make them valid in case of bankruptcy, a notice of such an assignment to the debtor might be made obligatory, say within seven days of its execution, and its validity made dependent on proof of its bona fides as a transaction for goods or money obtained for the purposes of the contract. On such proof being established it is doubtful whether it should be voidable even if a bankruptcy petition followed within one month. Other checks against fraud might be devised without requiring any public registration that might unfairly hamper useful and frequent financial transactions between quite solvent people in the ordinary way of trade.

7454. Do you agree with the views expressed in the Board of Trade memorandum that general registration of hire-purchase agreements is unnecessary?—I think I do, and that mainly because it is impracticable. The practice of hiring is so very extensive.

7455. You would, I think, favour, would you not, some change in the law for the protection of sheriffs' officers and high bailiffs and so on, who are sometimes met by a hire-purchase agreement and then have an action brought against them?—I should. I do not know quite how to protect the sheriff and the high bailiff. I know how to protect an Official Receiver. Inasmuch as notices appear of bankruptcy receiving orders, I should make it obligatory on the owner of goods to give notice to the Official Receiver before he could claim damages when they have been sold in ignorance. Any loss should be thrown on the owner, who ought to keep a sharp eye on his hired goods.

7456. Passing to one or two matters that are outside the Board of Trade memorandum, have you found in your experience that there are fraudulent claims made by wives of bankrupts either to property, or that they prove large fictitious debts?—I have not much experience of proving such debts, and they cannot be paid until there is 20s. in the £ for everybody else, but as to claiming furniture it seems to be the universal practice. Bankrupts' wives appear to be better off than wives generally are. The furniture in the house, as a rule, is found to belong to her when the husband is approaching bankruptcy; she declares she had it as a wedding present from her mother, or perhaps her grandfather; or that she bought it with her own money, without any proof forthcoming as to how she got the money.

7457. What kind of remedy would you suggest for that. Do you think the registration of a woman's claim to furniture would be practicable?—I hesitate much to recommend compulsory registration, for it would invade the privacy of tens of thousands of families who never come near insolvency. Perhaps the mischief of fictitious claims by bankrupts' wives might be checked if married women who own furniture in houses which they occupy with their husbands should be required to specify their claims in a register at the local county court; a register open to search on the payment of a small fee but entailing no other publicity. Such registration would not be a very serious burden on honest solvent people, while it would greatly assist creditors in determining when to refuse credit in doubtful cases; and with proper guarantees to secure registration of bona fide rights only, would stop the unreal claims often made in bankruptcy.

7458. (Mr. Richardson.) Is your main objection to making married women, other than those trading, bankrupt, that it gives the tradesmen an opportunity of harrying the husband?—It does more than harry the husband, it brings an element of distress into families for debts that ought not to have been created.

7459. Do you not think, so far as the published evidence of this sort of thing occurring goes, that the husband is well aware of the wife incurring these extravagant debts such as you have mentioned, luxuries, purchasing diamonds and furs and so on—that the husband is well aware of it ?—Suppose it is, what can he do to stop it ?

7460. Do you not think it is desirable not to protect such people ? In the bulk of such cases where it is desirable to make married women bankrupt who are not trading it would be no disability to the husband, because he all the time has been aware of it, and probably has encouraged it. So far as I have read the more public cases, I have formed the opinion that the husband has encouraged the wife to get these things ?—I have not known such cases ; I cannot agree with you, because I have not the knowledge to be able to agree or to disagree, but if you ask my opinion whether the bankruptcy of the wife should follow, I say, No, there is no need to give credit. If you trust a married woman for things that are not necessaries, take your precautions as a banker does in lending money ; ask her for security.

7461. A trader is in a very different position to a banker advancing money ?—I do not like arguing with a member of the Committee. The answers are obvious. I made them in what I have said. There is no obligation to give credit without inquiry and he probably insures himself by high prices against a few bad debts.

7462. You gave the instance of a banker. A banker and a trader are totally different things. In the case of a trader a woman may be dealing with him for a long time, and the family dealing with him, and then she suddenly launches out into buying extravagant things ?—Then I should let the trader stop that.

7463. The trader cannot ; he is in a totally different position to a banker ?—I am looking at it from the public point of view, and I think the traders who do that insure themselves against loss. They do not lose in every case, they lose in a certain number, and the prices they charge, and get, are an ample cover for the bad debts they make.

7464. (Mr. Peat.) There is a little doubt as to what exactly you intended to cover when you referred to assignments of book debts being subject to registration. I think you said that if a debt was growing due under an existing contract that that was a debt the assignment of which would not require registration ?—With this qualification, an assignment to a banker ("banker" includes a good deal, I know) for cash, or for goods, supplied for the purpose of executing a contract.

7465. Do you mean necessarily it must be a banker or a seller of goods ?—I should say so always.

7466. Not to a lender ?—A lender of money at ordinary rates is a banker.

7467. Not necessarily, for valuable consideration ?—I have in view that money is supplied by bankers to pay wages in carrying on contracts.

7468. Your experience of bankers and mine are on the same lines, but there are other people besides bankers who lend. I understand you to mean if for valuable consideration it would not require registration ?—I would not encourage the ordinary money lender. You could put a limit on the charges, you might put it not above 10 per cent. The bank rate is sometimes at 7 per cent., and if the bank rate is 7 per cent. the ordinary bank charge is 8 per cent. or 9 per cent. Loans from London banks are one above bank rate, sometimes 2 per cent. We may agree in this, that the Act must be so drafted as to confine it in the directions that I mention to a person who finds money or goods for the contract on the payments for which an assignment is given.

7469. Just to elucidate your view, I would ask if a ship builder is building a ship—— ?—That is one of the cases I include.

7470. He gets a certain instalment on the keel being laid, and a certain instalment on the plates being put on, and a certain instalment when she is launched, and so on. Supposing he pledged any of those instalments on the vessel before the work was finally completed, is it in your mind that that would require registration ?—No, I would not register that, for it is a growing contract.

7471. It is growing due ?—Yes.

7472. So in the case of a contract for an annual supply to a railway company, say, of wagons or wheels or axles ?—Yes.

7473. It simply takes place under one contract, but it is extended over a period of twelve months ?—That would be an existing contract.

7474. Although the goods had not to be actually delivered, they might be in process of manufacture ?—Quite so.

7475. Therefore you would not register ?—No, they are so ordinary and so necessary that one would not like to hamper them at all. Another reason for not hampering them is this, other creditors do not suffer by it, for the money and the goods have gone into the business to produce the growing claim assigned.

7476. One question about voluntary arrangements. Is it your view that no majority, not even 99 per cent., should bind the minority ?—It is really.

7377. I will not ask you any question more than that, that even 99 per cent. should not bind the minority ?—I am rather conservative in matters of property. I regard a man's claim on his debtor as private property which the law should not interfere with except on grounds of public policy, and when it interferes on grounds of public policy it should only do so under the Bankruptcy Acts. The law does not step in to relieve D. from paying C. his debt to oblige D., but in the public interests.

7478. You are aware possibly that under a deed of assignment the title of the trustee to ask for payment of any debt or for the recovery of any money might be disputed by the debtor ?—I know, that is under a recent decision.

7479. Would you be in favour of that being altered ?—One would like to remedy what may become a growing evil, if possible ; but it must be done with caution. The precaution I would suggest is this, that the trustee under every deed of assignment should be compelled to give security to account for all he receives. The law as it now stands might then be modified, so that a debtor being relieved from the liability to pay again a debt which he had paid to a trustee under an assignment, would not be in a position to dispute the trustee's right to collect it.

7480. On the subject of culpable neglect of business, you are willing to consider that as a crime and punishable as a crime ?—Yes.

7481. Is it not a little difficult to say what is culpable neglect ?—I admit it is very difficult.

7482. You can put it in this way, there are two partners, one attends to the business and the other does not ?—It would be very difficult, I know, but I think for all that there are cases where the neglect has been great and obvious, and should be punishable. You must also prove that it has "brought on or contributed to" the bankruptcy. That would be part of the case. I admit the difficulty with partners ; even there you can provide for cases where one partner has provided the money on the clear understanding that another partner minds the business.

7483. Sleeping partners do not attend to the business at all ?—Not at all.

7484. That is culpable neglect of business that might occur in bankruptcy ?—I will not press my view ; I put it as a matter for the consideration of the Committee.

7485. (Mr. Addison.) As to a married woman, you had some, I think not very decided, views about registering her title to furniture ?—Her claim.

7487. Or furniture is bought by means of money provided for her ?—It is frequently done.

7488. Would you think those transactions should be registered ?—I think if we do it at all it must be done if she wants to protect it against executions or bankruptcy. We cannot have half measures.

7489. Is your point this, that it is desirable it should be done ?—I have said that I am very chary indeed of imposing obligations on thousands for the sake of relieving the distress of a few. The remedy may be more costly and more insufferable than the evil itself. I am with you there.

7490. The point of view I am rather putting before you is this : Is it wise for people to give credit because they see A., B., and C. are living in well furnished houses ?—No, I am very much indeed, broadly speaking, for not extending encouragements to giving credit ; on the other hand, it is very hard in bankruptcy that the wife always claims the furniture when there is no provable foundation for the claim.

7492. Arising out of the same position is the case of a father or relative who, on a marriage, provides a fund which he intends to be what I call a family provision, to provide an income for the wife and for the maintenance of the family. That is arrived at by giving the wife an interest with restraint on anticipation during marriage, and then passing on the fund to the children when she dies ?—That is, a trust is created.

7493. Yes, would you set aside the restraint on anticipation there for the benefit of persons who had trusted the married woman with goods or jewellery ?—In the case I mentioned I think it would be only things which she had not needed, for a wife living with her husband can obtain all necessaries suitable to her position on credit from a shop.

7494. And charge her husband ?—Yes.

7495. I am speaking of the fund, not her own money, not her husband's money ; but money given ?—It only follows in my scheme when she has incurred debts for things which she need not have got. I would only relax it to a certain extent.

7496. Would you to any extent interfere with the provision arising from such a fund as I suggest ?—Yes, I would till her debts are paid. I would only deprive her for a period of time of certain things which she would otherwise have enjoyed because she had run into debt for things which she had enjoyed or was still enjoying.

7497. I am putting before you the suggestion that the donor of that fund meant to provide family maintenance ?—He meant to provide the maintenance for his daughter and her children. I trust that if the Court did interfere they would still provide the necessary maintenance ; they would not put them on starvation wages, but as we do in the matter of salaries or pensions, we take a certain proportion of them. To take the illustration I put before, I would say, "You have been eating six cakes a day for some time, now you can go on eating one a day until those six are paid for. You have been overdoing it in things not necessary, you must for a while do without luxuries, until what you have had have been paid for." I make this suggestion in view of such cases as I have mentioned of even greater hardship to creditors—it may be found a via media between leaving a married woman's property unassailable in spite of her extravagance, or of expenditure on her property, and of putting her personally through the mill of bankruptcy.

7498. There is probably not much difference between us on that point. Has any other suggestion occurred to you either in the shape of improved procedure in obtaining bankruptcy or in avoiding delay ?—If the power I have mentioned went, I should be very glad indeed if the powers in the Companies Acts for bringing bankrupts up on occasions when they are recalcitrant were given.

7499. I was rather pointing to speedy adjudication in London ?—Where delays are in some instances rather serious ?

7500. It is too slow ?—Yes, that is quite my conviction. The protection of the Bankruptcy Courts to debtors who allege insolvency or locked up assets is given only in the public interest ; for no man can say "I have a natural right to go on as before with my debts extinguished by going through the Bankruptcy Court." There can be no right of absolution from the payment except on grounds of public policy : for otherwise why should the law prevent C who may be poor from recovering an old debt from D when he may perhaps be rich, or at least quite able to pay C.

7501. (Sir Edward Fithian.) According to the Annual Reports of your Department, is it not the fact that some 75 or 80 per cent. of the cases in bankruptcy are never brought to a definite conclusion ?—We conclude the estate. You mean they do not get their discharge ?

7502. They never come to an absolutely complete conclusion ?—If you will define what you mean by "an absolutely complete conclusion" I will answer you.

7503. In those cases the conduct of the bankrupt does not come under the notice of the Court ?—The conduct of the bankrupt is not made the subject of judicial attention by the Court ; that is, he does not get his discharge until he applies for it.

7504. As applications for discharge are voluntary on the part of bankrupts, is it not reasonable to conclude that in the worst cases of bankruptcy no such applications are made ?—If such bankrupts were made to apply, the discharge would be refused, and they would be definitely branded accordingly.

7505. That is hardly my point. Is it not reasonable to conclude that in the worst cases of bankruptcy no application is made for discharge ?—In the worst cases no doubt they do not apply because they would not succeed. In most cases it is merely neglect, or inability to find the money to pay the fees. Applications in London are much more numerous than in the country. In London in about 40 per cent. of the bankruptcies there are discharge applications. In the country it is scarcely 20 per cent.

7507. (Chairman.) It used to be exactly the reverse, did it not ?—For some time after 1883 Mr. Aldridge, the bankruptcy solicitor, was made to take all public examinations himself—a thousand cases or more. Mr. Aldridge could not possibly be briefed and coached to examine a thousand bankrupts thoroughly. Since then the system has been changed, and the Official Receivers or the Assistant Receivers, conduct the public examinations themselves.

7508. (Sir Edward Fithian.) Do the Board of Trade consider that the existing state of the law under which a very small number of bankruptcy cases are determined is, in the public interest, satisfactory ?—If you ask me the Board of Trade's opinion I am afraid I had better not say, but I can give you my own opinion. I do not think it is satisfactory.

7509. But the official opinion is ?—I must not say. The official opinion is against forcing discharge on every man whether he wants it or not, and, as it were, seeking him out and saying to him. "My dear friend, let us discharge you." We do not want to do that, partly because they do not suffer any inconvenience by not being discharged.

7510. What, may I ask, is the advantage of putting a man into the witness box and examining him very carefully and obtaining a great deal of information as to his conduct if nothing further is to arrive as the result ?—The advantage is this, we relieve him from his debts if he applies for his discharge.

7511. But he carefully avoids applying for discharge in the event of his conduct being unsatisfactory ?—If you want my personal opinion, I should certainly propose, when the conduct is unsatisfactory, not to give him a discharge. I should, broadly speaking, say there are two classes of bankruptcy : where there is culpability and where it is the bankrupt's misfortune. The latter is the larger class probably for many become bankrupts through sheer mental or temperamental failings. It is well to distinguish between these and the culpability which should be brought before the Courts for penal proceedings. Bankruptcies of misfortune and sheer incapacity are sufficiently dealt with under the present conditions of discharge.

7512. Would you approve of the proposal that in every case in which the Official Receiver is dissatisfied with the conduct of the debtor he should be required to report to the court, and the court should then deal with the matter as if an application for discharge had been made ?—

I must guard myself in answering in the affirmative because "dissatisfied" is a very wide word. I should be inclined to say that such a report should be made in every case which the Official Receiver considers to be a culpable bankruptcy, and there might be to start with a presumption of culpability whenever the assets were not equal to 10s. in the £ of the unsecured liabilities, unless it was due to some misfortune for which the bankrupt could not reasonably be held responsible. Yet I would distinguish between such a report and an application by the bankrupt for his discharge. There are some useful suggestions in a proof of an Official Receiver, whom the committee will not, I understand, have time to examine. He is one of our best officials, and an able man. The following are some of his views as to what should amount to a culpable bankruptcy open to penal proceedings on a report to the Court by the Official Receiver: "If any person having been adjudicated bankrupt, and whose estate according to the statement of affairs is not of a value equal to 10s. in the £ of his unsecured liabilities, and (here are the things which in such a case would constitute culpability) who, first, has failed to keep such book or books of account as are specified in the schedule hereto (his schedule is a rough draft of an amending Act) for the three years preceding his bankruptcy, or, having kept such book or books, fails to hand over such book or books to the Official Receiver intact, or by departing out of England or, being out of England, remaining out of England, or departing from his dwelling house or otherwise absenting himself, has defeated or delayed his creditors or embarrassed, delayed, or prejudiced the realisation or distribution of his estate, or has continued to trade for a period of twelve calendar months after knowing himself to be insolvent, provided that the loss to his creditors has by such trading been increased" (that is a very necessary stipulation, because a man may trade to the advantage of his creditors; he may be better off at the end of the twelve months than at the beginning) "or has contributed to his bankruptcy by gambling or living at an extravagant rate, or at any examination on oath before the court has made untrue statements whether under such circumstances as would amount to the offence of perjury or not" (that is if he made untrue statements on oath before the court though it might not amount to indictable perjury) "or has on any previous occasion been adjudicated bankrupt or made a composition or arrangement with his creditors, shall be deemed guilty of being a bankrupt with circumstances of aggravation"—what I have called a culpable bankrupt—"and shall be liable on summary conviction to (blank) months of imprisonment or on indictment to two years' imprisonment with or without hard labour provided that no prosecution shall take place under paragraphs 1 and 2" (that means in regard to the keeping of books) "above of any person adjudicated bankrupt within three years of the passing of the Act." The Official Receiver endeavours, you will observe, to distinguish what may be called culpable bankrupts and others, and suggests that they should be dealt with penally by summary jurisdiction. This suggestion is not put forward as for the Board of Trade.

7514. That is not the Board of Trade proposal?—No; that is my idea. You see the Board of Trade have not yet thrashed these things out in detail; but they will be thought of when the time comes to draft an Amending Bill, which should provide also for several obvious improvements of a non-controversial character.

7515. As a matter of fact, these general assignments withdraw from the assets, in favour of the particular creditor, sums which ought to be rateably distributed in the event of bankruptcy?—Yes, but what have I said? Have not I said that I am in favour of voiding them if they are general?

7516. No, I think you have not said that?—No, "void when applied to future debts."

7517. My question rather relates to debts that are due or growing due?—I have given my opinion on that question of book debts.

7518. You have really no remedy in a case of that kind?—No, I think the evil is not very general; it very seldom happens.

7519. Mr. Hough gave evidence, I think, that it was not by any means uncommon, and we have had other witnesses who gave evidence to the same effect, and that there was a growing tendency in that direction. I take it that the view of the Board of Trade is simply that all assignments of future book debts should be made illegal, and they do not propose any action with regard to growing debts or present debts?—I have said more than that. In my evidence I have suggested compulsory registration and prompt notice to the debtors.

7520. That is of very little use to the trade creditors?—It would make the assignments rare, for the notice to the debtors would very soon make the assignments known, and the result would be damaging to the business. I am not personally against having general assignments registered; but that would not prevent the property from passing any more than the registration of bills of sale does.

7521. That is the point we are asking for, that there should be registration of all general assignments of book debts?—Registration alone would not make them less valid. I doubt that it would be so effective a check as compulsory notice to every debtor would be, and making them invalid if an act of bankruptcy followed within three months.

7522. Can you tell me what distinction the Board of Trade draw in these two cases; the Board of Trade are willing to provide for the registration of mortgages or charges on book debts if created by a limited company, but appear to be opposed to the registration in the case of assignments of debts by individuals or firms?—A limited company is a corporation with neither soul to damn nor a body to kick, but here with the private trader you can get at him personally and bring him under the proposed penal clauses if he has done a wrong thing.

7523. But the interest of the trade creditor surely is the same?—The remedy is not the same, quite. You can make a distinction with companies different to what you do with private traders. I am not defending it by my argument. I am quite willing to give you the full value of that contention as regards dealing differently with companies and private traders.

7524. With regard to hire-purchase agreements, it is suggested by the Board of Trade that the custom is so well known that traders ought not to assume that a person is the owner of the goods in his possession?—I think they had better not.

7525. But if hire-purchase agreements are so generally entered into as to be a matter of common knowledge, what objection can there be to registration?—The one is that it is unnecessary, the other is that the registers would become so cumbersome and so vast that they would be of very little use.

7526. I suggest to you that knowledge of a general custom is no real assistance whatever to a trader. What he wants to know is whether the particular persons he is entering into business transactions with have entered into these agreements or not. How is he to obtain that information except by registration?—He should make specific inquiries. There are many forms of property on which charges are created without registration. Mortgages of real estate are not uncommon, but they are not publicly registered though the bankruptcy of great landowners is not entirely unknown; and real property encumbered by charges on it is frequently found among the assets of traders and non-traders who are insolvent.

7527. You consider the cases are analogous?—I do, in principle quite analogous.

7528. And registration is not satisfactory?—I go on to say that it is well known that landed property may be mortgaged up to the hilt and that people do not give credit on the conviction that everything a man has about him is really his own and is unmortgaged. May I say again I am endeavouring to regard these things in the interest of the public at large. It is a question of the wisdom of burdening the public generally with regulations which will be very far reaching in order to provide remedies for evils caused by giving credit indiscriminately; that is my point of view now.

7529. I suggest to you that a very large body of traders, not merely Chambers of Commerce, but Trade Protection

19 June 1907.

Societies and other organisations, are practically agreed as to the desirability of having this registration in order to be protected in their transactions?—I answer that question by saying that the opinion of such bodies will no doubt have due consideration by Members of Parliament; a Bill is now going through which may possibly deal with that subject.

7530. (Mr. Smith.) You do not approve of the suggestion that every bankrupt's conduct should come up for consideration before the Court?—I do not indeed.

7531. At present I believe that in every case the conduct of a bankrupt is reviewed, and carefully reviewed, by an Official Receiver?—Yes.

7533. You propose now to extend that?—Yes.

7534. That would of course increase the number of cases in which they would bring the facts to the knowledge of the Court?—It would.

7535. I suppose, with regard to the remaining cases, you say there is no public object to be gained by insisting on the bankrupt coming up in order that the Court may consider whether he should be discharged or not?—Not sufficient to make it advisable in the public interests.

7536. No, there is no advantage in fact to the bankrupt in coming up to get his discharge?—There are considerable disadvantages, in some cases to himself even.

7537. On the other hand, such things would involve a large increase of expenditure?—They would.

7539. Do you think that anything could be done to make the position of an undischarged debtor somewhat more serious?—I should extend Section 31, and make bankrupts who incur single debts of £20, without giving notice that they are undischarged, punishable by summary jurisdiction. It might also be well to make it a penal offence to incur debts amounting to £50 or £100 in all; and to throw upon the undischarged bankrupt the onus of proving that he had given notice in every case where the debt exceeds £10.

7540. Would you require him to render accounts of his receipts and payments during his bankruptcy?—You may do it, but I do not think it would answer much purpose.

7541. Can the Official Receiver require him to do it?—Yes, when the bankrupt is discharged subject to a judgment to be entered against him, or to any other condition as to his future earnings or after-acquired property.

7542. But under other circumstances not?—I think not.

7543. Do you not think it would be advisable that he should have power in special cases to call on an undischarged debtor to make an account of what his receipts and payments are?—I would give an Official Receiver the power, but without making it compulsory upon him to exercise it in every case. I remember a case where a bankrupt doctor who had left considerable debts unpaid in the country came to London and established a practice worth, it was believed, from £3,000 to £4,000 a year, but made no effort to pay his old debts.

7544. Would you allow him to trade otherwise than in his own name?—No; I am very much in favour of the registration of firms and of trading names which are not the real names.

7545. In the case of bankruptcy or generally?—Generally.

7546. You would have the real name of the trader published in some way?—Accessible, or available at any rate, on an affidavit supplied by themselves.

7547. You would not allow a man to trade under a fictitious name?—I would not. If a firm, I would have the names of all the members registered; and every trading name which is not the legal name of the trader should also be registered with the legal name added in some easily available registry—the local rate collector's office might be found convenient. The collector's contact with every ratepayer would tend to bring the register under a comprehensive check.

7548. With regard to penal proceedings for not keeping books, you would give a discretion to the Official Receivers and the Board of Trade as to cases in which the law was to be put in force?—Decidedly.

7549. And you would give a discretion to the judge, as to the punishment to be inflicted. Would you give him a direction as to the grounds on which that discretion is to be exercised? For instance, would you allow him to take into consideration the case of a costermonger, where it is not usual for men to keep books?—Certainly, where the transactions are really in the street, as you may say.

7550. That the case must contain some element of culpability apart from the mere fact that books have not been kept?—Yes, but I would not extend that too far, because I think it is really a culpable thing for people to trade at all without keeping books when it is possible.

7551. If a man can satisfy the Court that he did not intend to conceal his affairs but through invincible ignorance he acted?—It might be enough to make invincible ignorance and inability a sufficient excuse if the Court were also satisfied that by not keeping books the bankrupt had not concealed a fraud. I want to see traders keeping books that they may know better the condition of their affairs. A man is not allowed to navigate a ship though it be his own if he neglects necessary and established precautions; there should be a parallel compulsion to keep accounts when a man trades on credit.

7552. With regard to furniture claimed by a wife in bankruptcy, it is a common occurrence, I believe?—It is very general.

7553. Would you establish an assumption in law that the property in such a case belongs to the husband and the trustee can claim it unless it can be proved to the satisfaction of the Court that it belonged to the wife?—I would almost prefer that to the registration I have mentioned. I do not like to have rules which throw a burden upon the public at large to prevent wrongs committed by a few.

7554. You would throw the onus on her to prove it to the Court?—It would be fair that a wife should be required to produce reasonable evidence of the furniture being really her own.

7555. Do I understand you that cases of summary prosecution should be conducted by the Board of Trade?—Yes.

7556. In other cases I suppose you would refer to the Public Prosecutor?—If the case went to a jury we probably should. That would be a matter for arrangement between the Board of Trade and the Public Prosecutor. The Public Prosecutor's Department is better adapted to deal with important and intricate cases.

7557. I suppose you would refer, as a matter of practice, that the vast majority of cases should come up under the management and control of the Board of Trade?—I believe that in practice they would; and the 166th Section might be modified accordingly, but so as still to direct the Public Prosecutor to deal with the cases when the Court makes an order to that effect.

7558. You would not cancel that, but you would give the power to the Board of Trade?—I would give the power to the Board of Trade to proceed under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. The necessity for the Public Prosecutor's intervention would then seldom arise, but I would wish to retain the direction by the Court.

7559. With regard to deeds of arrangement, we were told by a witness from Scotland that in that country a deed of voluntary arrangement may be participated in by any creditor who does not assent to the provision for releasing his debtor; that is, that he can draw dividends? —Yes.

7560. Do you see any reason why that should not be adapted to the English law?—I do not think it just to deprive any man of any private right to recover a debt unless it is done by a Court on grounds of public policy. The Scotch practice you refer to appears to give a non-assenting creditor his share of the division by his own choice, not by the compulsion of other creditors.

7561. Is he not, to a very large extent, compelled at present by circumstances?—He is very much compelled.

7562. If he does not present a petition he is excluded from participation in the benefit of the deed?—Would you mind putting your question again as to the law in Scotland?

7563. That any creditor of the debtor is entitled to participate in the assets assigned under a deed of arrangement without releasing the debtor or losing his right to present a bankruptcy petition for the settlement of his debt?—With the result that no man making a deed of arrangement would feel that he was absolutely released from any debt unless it was paid in full.

7564. I suppose practically that would be the result?—That would kill deeds of arrangement, I think. I think it might be well that the trustee under the deed should set aside the dividend for a creditor who had not proved his debt. I would provide that that should be done, and that it should be held for at least two years or so. But if a creditor took the dividend, that should extinguish his claim on the debtor. I should not have him allowed to come in under the deed, and still leave him a right to sue for the balance.

7565. I do not know whether it is correct or not; I should think Mr. Morison was well informed, but it seemed a very strange state of the law?—I have always thought it would be right to provide that a creditor might come in if he chose within a year or two, provided he had taken no hostile course or obtained any preference in the meantime.

7566. With regard to the amount of insolvency generally, have you given consideration to it and can you tell us in rough figures what is the general proportion of insolvency to-day as compared with what it was at the commencement of the Act?—I have lately looked into that more closely than I had been able to do when occupied with inspection work all over the country. The figures that I have taken from Parliamentary papers, which are open to all, have much surprised me. A comparison of the number, and the amounts of all the insolvencies recorded during the last ten years (1874–1883) of the Act of 1869 with the number and amount of all insolvencies recorded during the last ten years (1896–1905), of which we have public returns, shows an astonishing reduction, and that in the face of a larger population, and of an immense increase in trade in the twenty-two intervening years. Insolvencies under the Act of 1869 fell into two classes, liquidations by arrangement under the provisions of the Act, or bankruptcy also under the Act. Including both there was an average of 9,769 insolvencies per annum in those ten years. In the latter period, including all the cases which passed through the courts under the Act of 1883, and all the private arrangements registered under the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, the average number of insolvencies per annum was 7,742. As to the amount of the insolvencies in the two periods compared, the totals of the unsecured liabilities, and of the estimated value of the assets, are made up in every case from the statements filed by the debtors themselves. In the former period (1874–1883), under the Act of 1869, the average liabilities, in round numbers, reached £22,000,000 per annum, and the estimated value of the assets only £6,500,000, leaving a deficiency of £15,500,000 a year. In the second period (1896–1905) the total unsecured liabilities in the two groups of insolvencies averaged £10,250,000, and the assets were valued at £5,000,000, leaving a deficiency of £5,250,000 a year, or little more than one-third of the loss to creditors in the earlier period.

7568. The deficiency would be greater if you were able to add to the statistics of the earlier period the figures representing the voluntary arrangements?—Yes.

7569. You have no information with regard to them? —We have no information. If they were private they were not registered in any way. There may be, of course, some not registered now.

7570. Do you think there is sufficient provision under the present Bankruptcy Act for the putting of the bankruptcy clauses into operation on the part of small creditors? —How do you mean?

7571. To what extent can small creditors petition? You know the limit?—£50.

7572. Have you any idea what proportion of the whole creditors the little creditors under £50 would be?— Our statistics do not show the creditors between £10 and £50. In all statements of affairs we have creditors under £10 and creditors over £10, and they are in our statistics so classified. I can tell you those under £10 are two-thirds of the number.

7573. Two-thirds of all the creditors in bankruptcies claim for debts under £10?—Yes.

7574. Therefore two-thirds of all the creditors in bankruptcies at least cannot petition?—More than that, because you must go to £50 before you can petition. I should guess, but it is only a guess, that of the remaining third between £10 and £50 three-quarters would be under £50.

7575. Which would bring it up to about 86 per cent.? —It would leave only about one-twelfth of them creditors above £50, who alone can file a petition against their debtor.

7576. Do you think that limit should be reduced?— Small creditors can combine, but I am in favour of reducing the limit when a man puts his property in the hands of a trustee.

7577. Do you think it would be a reasonable thing to reduce the limit to £20?—There are objections of some weight; for the very word "bankruptcy" creates an unpleasant impression dangerous to traders who are living not far from insolvency. I am, therefore, hardly prepared to bring the limit for a petition down to £20 unless a debtor has assigned all his property to a trustee of his own selection. When creditors are thus deprived by a debtor's own act of their ordinary remedies for the recovery of debts it would seem but fair to reduce the limit which bars the creditor's resort to another procedure, that of a bankruptcy petition.

7578. (Chairman.) A judgment creditor can always get a receiving order under Section 103?—Quite so. I had forgotten that. It is a proviso seldom resorted to. It enables the Court on an application for the commital of a judgment debtor, whatever may be the amount of the debt, to decline to commit, and in lieu thereof, with the consent of the creditor, and on payment by him of the prescribed fee, to make a receiving order against the debtor. If the creditor declines to pay the fee the receiving order will not be made. Prior to the Act of 1890, a receiving order so obtained was of little value, as there was no relation back of the debtor's title, and no power to cut down fraudulent preferences, but these defects are now remedied. The important thing to observe is the alternative power given to the Court without limit as to the smallness of the debt. It shows that there are circumstances when the law already grants a receiving order without the debtor's consent though the claim of the applicant may be under £50. It supports my argument for the extension of that concession in certain other circumstances.

7579. (Chairman.) You are the Registrar of the Bankruptcy Court at Belfast ?—I am.

7580. What we desire to obtain your assistance upon is to know what the procedure in Ireland is with special reference to the questions upon which we are asked to report, in order that we may see what there is which differs from English bankruptcy law, wherein it is better, and wherein it is not so good, and so on. I think you have been Registrar of the Court at Belfast for some period ?—For about seven or eight years.

7581. Before that what were you ?—I was practising as a solicitor.

7582. In Dublin or Belfast ?—In Belfast.

7583. I suppose I may take it that you had then a considerable experience in commercial matters and bankruptcy matters ?—Yes.

7584. Since then I presume you have had a large experience in the administration of the bankruptcy law particularly in commercial cases ?—Yes, that is my principal work.

7585. Will you kindly tell us what are the courts which administer the Bankruptcy Jurisdiction in Ireland ?—The chief court that administers the bankruptcy jurisdiction is the Court of King's Bench. There is a judge assigned for bankruptcy purposes. Then in addition to that there are local courts established at Belfast and Cork. These local courts have jurisdiction over two or three counties around each town. In addition to that there are powers for the court in Dublin to send down a bankruptcy matter to a county court and have it investigated there, but those powers are never availed of to my knowledge.

7586. Who are the judges of the local courts ?—The judges of the local courts are the recorders of Belfast and Cork.

7587. If a man becomes bankrupt in a district which is outside those he would become bankrupt in Dublin ?—Yes, or inside ; their jurisdiction is co-ordinate.

7588. I think the Irish Bankruptcy Acts are: the main Act, which was passed in 1857, and the amending Act of 1872 ?—Yes, those are the principal Acts.

7589. As regards making a person bankrupt in England, the petitioning creditor's debt has to be £50 ; what is it in Ireland ?—In Ireland it is £40.

7590. The acts of bankruptcy I think are not quite the same ?—They are not quite the same.

7591. Could you tell us shortly the differences ?—In the memorandum which I have prepared, I set them out. The third act in England, that is with regard to the conveyance or transfer of property which would be void as a fraudulent preference, does not appear in the Irish Act at all. As to the fourth act in England, in Ireland there is a limitation of that act to a trader in the case of departing from a dwelling house or otherwise absenting himself or keeping house. That limitation does not appear in the English law. I believe that the fifth act in Ireland differs from the corresponding act in the Act of 1890 in being limited to an execution of £20. As to the fourth act in Ireland, that is practically the same, the term is declaration of insolvency, and in England it is declaration of inability to pay his debts, and in England the filing of a petition against a man's self is an act of bankruptcy. That is not so in Ireland. It rather works a disadvantage to us because when a man files a petition against himself the court holds that there is no relation back to an earlier act of bankruptcy. The sixth act in Ireland is failure to comply with a debtor's summons, corresponding in the English Act to the service of a bankruptcy notice. The principal difference between the two acts in the two countries is that in Ireland it is not necessary to have a judgment first ; if you want to adjudicate a person bankrupt you can issue a summons, and if you have a debt for over £20, failure to comply with that debtor's summons, in a case of a trader for seven days, and in the case of a non-trader for twenty-one days, constitutes an act of bankruptcy, and the man could be adjudicated on that act. There is no Irish act to correspond with the notice of suspension in England. I believe there is no English act to correspond with the dismissal of a petition for arrangement as there is in Ireland.

7592. What does that mean, "dismissal of a petition for arrangement" ? Does that mean a petition to have an arrangement of your affairs by the court ?—Yes.

7593. And if that is refused you may be adjudicated ?—Yes.

7594. Then I think with regard to the acts of bankruptcy that the period of relation back is six months in Ireland ?—Yes.

7595. And I understand in Ireland you have no contest over the petition unless the debtor chooses to show cause against it ?—No, it is an ex parte matter in the first instance. The debtor has three days within which he can show cause against adjudication.

7596. I suppose the adjudication is not published until after the lapse of three days ?—No, not until the three days have expired.

7597. The main process is adjudication ?—Yes, there is no such thing as a receiving order.

7599. Who winds up the estate, the official assignee ?—The official assignee winds up the estate ; he is supposed to have the assistance of the creditors' assignee.

7600. Who is the property vested in ?—The assignees.

7601. Both of them ?—Yes.

7602. Who declares the dividend ?—The official assignee.

7603. Is he paid by fees, or is he paid by salary ?—In Dublin he is paid by fees, in Belfast the arrangement is that he receives a salary and pays his fees to the Government.

7604. Does the creditors' assignee get remunerated ?—No, he gets no remuneration whatever: he does not require any; he does not do anything: the creditors' assignee is a pure matter of form.

7605. So really the bankruptcy is conducted by the official assignee ?—Entirely.

7606. As regards granting a debtor a certificate of discharge, I think that is called a "certificate of conformity," as it was in the old English Acts ?—Yes.

7607. Is that applied for at a sitting of the court ?—Yes, the bankrupt applies for that, and he has to give twenty-one days notice to all his creditors that he is going to apply.

7608. Is there any report on his conduct, or anything of that kind ?—The official assignee makes a report to the court.

7609. If he has failed to keep proper books or traded with a knowledge of insolvency, and so on, is that a ground for refusing or suspending the certificate ?—These are all taken into consideration when the bankrupt comes up for his certificate. The solicitor for the assignee usually appears, and if there is any matter like that that has to be reported, that is reported to the court and the court is supposed to take that into consideration when it has the application before it.

7610. Can you tell me on that, are undischarged bankrupts common in Ireland ?—Yes, there are a great many of them; comparatively few apply for their certificate

7611. Is that because they are afraid it will be refused ?—Sometimes that, and sometimes they have gone out of the country altogether, and sometimes they have got into low water and do not think it worth while.

7612. Are there heavy fees to pay ?—Practically no fees except the solicitor's fees.

7613. No court fees ?—No. They have to advertise the certificate when it is granted, but that is only a matter of a few shillings.

7614. There is no fee on application ?—No, in fact the only fee that is payable in bankruptcy in Ireland in every case is the £2 stamp on the petition.

7615. That is a £2 stamp ?—Yes, on the petition. That is in every case; no matter how large the estate may be or how small it may be, the petition must have a stamp of £2 on it. On the realisation of the estate the official assignee charges remuneration.

7616. What fund pays the State for the whole of the machinery of the thing ?—The £2 stamp on the petition comes in first, that is a fee to the Crown. Then the official assignee's account, which is brought up at the end of the administration, bears a stamp, which is an ad valorem stamp and paid out of the assets realised.

7617. Do you know whether the court pays its way at all ?—I think it fairly well pays its way. The remuneration that is payable to the official assignee on the realisation of each estate roughly covers his salary, and then the stamp duty and the fees that are taken for preparing documents, and things of that kind, usually cover the office work.

7618. Practically the fee in England is £10, and the suggestion has been made to us that it is too high. Do you find that the £2 is sufficient ?—I think so. I think, perhaps, that in the case of large estates they would bear a higher fee.

7619. With regard to the official assignee's remuneration, is that a scale charge all round ?—Yes, a scale charge. He charges roughly about 5 per cent. on the assets that have been realised.

7620. As I understand, there is no provision in Ireland for making it a misdemeanour for an undischarged bankrupt to obtain credit ?—That is so.

7621. Do you think that would be a desirable provision ?—Yes, highly desirable. That is a great defect. The disabilities under which a bankrupt labours in Ireland are very few. As soon as he has finished with his bankruptcy, or as soon as he is adjudicated, if he can go on and trade and obtain credit it is a decided disadvantage. I could not say for certain, but I expect that with regard to a bankrupt who is undischarged in Ireland, if he obtains credit in England the law would not get at him in that way either. Mr. Thomas C. Houston. 26 June 1907.

7622. No. I think that one of the questions on which we have to report is as to the present state of the law relating to arrangements of debtors with their creditors. Perhaps you will tell us what the procedure is in Ireland by which a debtor can make an arrangement with his creditors without bankruptcy ?—That is regulated by Section 343 of the Act of 1857. There it is provided that "any debtor unable to meet his engagement with his creditors, and desirous of laying the state of his affairs before them under the control of the court, may present a petition setting forth the true cause of such inability, and praying that his person and property may be protected from process till further order, and the court on such petition shall have power to grant such protection, and may renew same from time to time." Those are the words of the Act. He formulates his proposal at a preliminary meeting of creditors, and this proposal is submitted to the court at two private sittings. These sittings are private in the sense that they are not reported in the papers. The creditors vote on the proposal, and unless three-fifths in number and value of those who have proved debts to the amount of £10 vote for the proposal at the first private sitting the matter is turned into bankruptcy. It is only at the first private sitting they can turn it into bankruptcy; at the second sitting they can have the petition dismissed, but cannot turn it into bankruptcy. When the proposal is confirmed by the court at the second sitting "it is binding and of full force against all persons who were creditors at the date of the petition, and who had notice of the several sittings"—those are also words of the Act—but the acceptance of a composition is not a discharge of the debt until the composition is paid. Then the court has certain powers to adjudicate bankruptcy at certain times after the filing of the petition, and I set out the three grounds: first, where the affidavit filed with the petition is wilfully untrue; secondly, that the debtor has not made a full disclosure of his debts and credits, estate and effects, and is not desirous of making a bonâ fide arrangement with his creditors; and thirdly, that his proposal is not reasonable and proper to be executed under the control of the court. Also, if within three months of the time of presenting his petition the debtor has assigned, transferred, or made away with any portion of his estate and effects, otherwise than in due course, or has voluntarily done or suffered any act whereby his goods have been taken in execution. Those are the powers that the court has for adjudicating the debtor. It has also powers in certain cases to dismiss the petition; one case is when the debtor refuses to obey an order of the court; another case is where he does not attend the meeting of the court. The dismissal constitutes an act of bankruptcy, and the debtor can be adjudicated on that act within six months. Then there is no receiving order in Ireland, as I stated, but the court has power at any time, if a case is shown, to direct that the debtor's estate should be possessed and received by the official assignee.

7623. As receiver ?—Yes; the usual course is to put the messenger in possession and the official assignee becomes responsible for what is in the debtor's place, or for any assets he may have. The voting is three-fifths in number and value in Ireland as compared with the majority in number and three-fourths in value in England. After the debtor has paid his composition, and the official assignee has made his report he is entitled to a certificate which operates as a certificate of conformity in bankruptcy.

7624. And discharges all his debts ?—Yes.

7625. I think you mention, which is very useful, the difference between the English and Irish law on certain points as to disclaimer of leases and reputed ownership; but those are not, perhaps, quite directly within our terms of reference. I see you refer to a method by which the winding-up of a bankruptcy is transferred out of the hands of an assignee to a trustee ?—Yes; there are powers to that effect in the Act of 1872.

26 June 1907.

7626. I observe that you say that this method of procedure has only been followed in two cases ?—I believe that is all; there is one case in the Dublin Court and one case in the Belfast Court.

7627. So that the community has preferred the older procedure ?—Yes; the only advantage is when the estate is very large, and where there is some technical knowledgt required. The case that was wound up in the Belfase Court was the case of a large linen merchant; he had a large quantity of linen goods to be disposed of, and trading had to be continued for a certain time in order to discharge the contracts that he had entered into; a trustee was appointed in that case and a committee of inspection, the committee being people who had an intimate knowledge of the linen trade.

7628. That being the general view of the Irish procedure, pointing out its differences between that and the English procedure, I should like to ask you with reference to the specific question raised in our terms of reference, firstly, as regards punishment of bankrupts, would you tell us briefly what things are offences, and what is the procedure for prosecuting them ?—The offences are laid down in the Debtors Act of 1872, and, as far as I can gather, the offences are precisely similar to the offences in the English Acts: concealing property, or doing away with property within three months of the bankruptcy, etc. They are all set out in Sections 11 to 19 and 22 of the Irish Act. The Irish Act is based almost word for word on the English Act.

7629. I think as regards defaulting debtors who have to be arrested, you have corresponding provisions ?—Yes, we have corresponding provisions with regard to that except that there is no provision in the Irish Act providing for arrest if the debtor without good cause fails to attend an examination ordered by the court; but I suppose the general power of committal that is in every court would cover that.

7630. You have an express power to commit a bankrupt who refuses to answer, and thus does not disclose his property ?—That is a very useful power in a great many cases—the power to commit for unsatisfactory answering.

7631. Is it much used ?—Very frequently. It depends largely on the judge who uses the power.

7632. Has the local Bankruptcy Judge power to commit for contempt ?—Yes, he has.

7633. On a point that is not mentioned in your memorandum, with reference to those offences, who is the prosecuting authority ? Have you anybody that corresponds to our Director of Public Prosecutions ?—No in the case of a prosecution the procedure is that the solicitor makes an application to the court for liberty to prosecute; then he goes down to the police court of course the initial proceedings take place before the police court magistrate. He prosecutes at the police court; and if the man is returned for trial the matter passes into the hands of the Crown Solicitor.

7634. That is after he is committed for trial ?—Yes, not before.

7635. What bears the expense of the prosecution before the magistrate ?—The estate bears the expense of the prosecution before the magistrate.

7636. But if there is no estate ?—Then I expect the petitioning creditor would have to bear it. His is a broad back very often that has to bear a good many expenses.

7637. As regards an uncertified bankrupt who trades whilst he is uncertified, does the official assignee get whatever property comes to him, or is he entitled to keep it ? I see you say there does not seem to be anything to prevent a bankrupt from continuing to trade except the danger of the official assignee taking possession of his assets. The after-acquired assets do pass to the official assignee ?—Yes; if he claims them: but as a rule when the bankruptcy is wound up the official assignee does not trouble about any further assets unless the bankrupt comes into a legacy, or something of that sort. If he continues to trade it is rarely that the official assignee interferes.

7638. Do you often have such a thing happening as a transaction in real estate by an uncertificated bankrupt becoming upset by the official assignee claiming the property as against a mortgagee, for instance ?—There have been cases of that kind. Of course, that would only apply to a property that vests in the official assignee. Property as a rule does not vest in Ireland in the official assignee until he elects to take it.

7639. Do you think that that works well, that putting the official assignee to elect whether he will take or not ?—No; there is a very strong feeling with regard to the two methods that exist in Ireland; the double method of election to take and disclaimer causes a great deal of confusion; and there is a good deal of indefiniteness about the law on the subject.

7640. You would prefer the simplicity of the English system ?—Yes; every lawyer that has any dealings with it would certainly do that. We do not know where we are with regard to these election sections at all.

7641. Passing on to the question of the certificate of conformity I see you have a provision somewhat corresponding to that which prevails in England, that a dividend of 10s. in the £ must have been paid ?—Yes; that is essential, at least. The bankrupt is entitled to his certificate if the estate has paid 10s. in the £.

7642. Even although he has failed to keep proper books, and done that sort of thing ?—The Court, of course, has power to suspend the certificate, or refuse it altogether if the man has committed any offence, but I do not know any instance myself in which the failure to keep books has been considered sufficient ground for refusing the certificate.

7643. Or even for suspending it ?—The method of suspending certificates is not often followed in our Court.

7644. They are either refused or granted ?—Yes.

7646. Is that often done ?—That is more often done than a certificate applied for. It is an easier way for the bankrupt to get out of his difficulties. If he pays 1s. in the £ and gets his creditors to accept that, and they are very often glad to take what they can get, that frees him of all his responsibility.

7647. I see you say that sometimes the 10s. clause acts rather unjustly on creditors ?—I think so. I may mention one case where a man was a pensioner and there was an order made that he should pay a certain instalment out of his pension (this was with the consent of the authorities) and he paid for a certain time until his creditors had received 10s. in the £, and then he came in and got his certificate as a matter of course. There was nothing to hinder the creditors being paid in full in that case.

7648. The third paragraph of our Terms of Reference is, as regards the law of England, rendered almost unnecessary for us to deal with, because of the Act recently passed enabling the certificate of a solicitor who is a bankrupt to be refused. That I understand, does not apply in Ireland ?—That does not apply in Ireland.

7649. Do you think it ought to ?—Yes, I think so There is a bankrupt solicitor in the Belfast Court at present, who is carrying on his business and has filed a petition of arrangement to get rid of his subsequent debts; he does not evidently mean to pay anybody and it is not desirable that a person of that kind should be allowed to practise.

7650. Do you find that the provisions which exist in Ireland as regards the realisation of property are adequate for the purpose ? I might point out that exactly what we have to report upon, with regard to that, is whether any speedy method of realising such a thing as a business could be recommended ?—The only thing that I could mention with regard to that is, that in the case of small businesses, principally where the stocks are more or less of a perishable nature, the official assignee usually comes into the court and gets authority immediately after adjudication to realise those stocks; for instance in the case of live stock or businesses dealing with goods of a perishable nature, such as a grocer's business or a butcher's business or anything of that kind, he can get power from the court to realise the stock at once. Ordinarily the realisation is not supposed to begin until the creditors' assignee has been appointed. That is done at the first meeting, and that means about a fortnight or three weeks' delay.

7651. In the meantime, who has charge of the property and the business ?—The official assignee puts a man in possession.

7652. Is there any machinery for working it or keeping a going business going ?—He can get power to do that.

7653. From the court ?—Yes. Of course in the case I mention of a composition after bankruptcy, the bankrupt can come in and get liberty to trade and carry on his trade himself, pending making this offer of composition.

7654. I have already incidentally asked you with regard to an uncertificated bankrupt carrying on business; if he does so with the knowledge of the assignee are the subsequent creditors protected, the persons who give him credit ?—Yes, I believe that is the law.

7655. It is similar to the law in England with regard to that ?—Yes. He need not even show that the official assignee had knowledge of his carrying on trade, the mere fact of his carrying on trade in the neighbourhood would bind the official assignee with knowledge. There is one thing you have skipped, and that is with regard to the realisation of property by mortgagees. I suppose the procedure is the same in England as in Ireland, but a mortgagee has not to come into the court at all, he can realise his security outside the court. It would be a great advantage, I think, to make the mortgagee come into court to realise his security, because if he does not wish to realise his security it delays the realisation of the estate very largely. Of course you can sell the equity of redemption of a property, but that is not always a disposable asset.

7656. In regard to the bankruptcy of married women, do the provisions of our Married Women's Property Act apply in Ireland, or is there a corresponding Act ?—It is the same Act; the Act of 1882 applies to Ireland.

7657. What is the provision of the Bankruptcy Law as regards a married woman who carries on business ?—A married woman who carries on trade, separate from her husband, can be adjudicated bankrupt.

7660. We have had a good deal of evidence here, one way and the other, as to whether it would be desirable to make married women, who carry on business, generally subject to the Bankruptcy Law, just as if they were men or single women. Would you advocate that alteration of the law ?—Women who carry on business separate from their husbands ?

7661. No, women who carry on business at all, that there should be no difference ?—I think so certainly. I do not see why there should be any distinction.

Mr. Thomas C. Houston.

26 June 1907.

7662. I do not know if you are familiar with the English Act, but are your provisions as to voluntary settlements pretty much the same as they are in England ?—I think so. The Act of 1872 decides that voluntary settlements of property made within two years of bankruptcy, or within ten years unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was at the time able to pay his debts as they became due, are void as against the assignee; except that in Ireland the application is only to traders.

7663. It does not apply to the non-trader ?—No, it does not apply generally.

7664. I think that there is a power in the Irish Act to enable the court to sell property which has been transferred by the bankrupt when he was in insolvent circumstances ?—Yes, that is the same power that exists in England.

7665. I see you mention a matter which has been before us a great deal, and that is claims by the wife of a bankrupt to household furniture and other effects which ostensibly are in the possession of the bankrupt. Do you find that frequent ?—Very frequent. I say here, I think I am very well within the mark, that in five cases out of ten the wife claims the furniture in the case of small traders, and the difficulty is that the creditors have given credit, in the case of small traders (grocers and people of that kind), on the strength of a house that is well furnished perhaps, and when the man fails it is very hard on them that the whole of the furniture is taken over by the wife, claimed by the wife, and the official assignee does not get any part at all. I do not see how it can be avoided. I was wondering whether there was any way of registration as to claims to the furniture. Very often the woman makes a statutory declaration, and has that in the house, so as to avoid seizure of the furniture, to avoid the messenger of the court taking possession; and if that principle could be extended, that she was bound in the case of a small trader, where she claimed the furniture, to make such a declaration, and have it registered in some way, I think perhaps that might answer.

7667. Have you many private voluntary deeds of arrangement ?—A great many private deeds of arrangement. There is a very strong feeling amongst people I have come in contact with, (solicitors, merchants, and that kind), that there should be some regulation to avoid those to a certain extent. In the case of a respectable accountant, a man of good standing, there is no difficulty; but a host of small accountants, and people of that kind, get hold of a man who is in insolvent circumstances, and they get him to execute a trust deed to them; sometimes they call a meeting of creditors, sometimes they do not, and under the trust deed the whole of the estate passes into the hands of the trustee and he realises, but he is under no control whatever. When I say no control whatever, the general body of creditors might have some control over him, but that is an awkward body to control him. It is very hard to bring them together, and it is hard to make them interested in the matter. Perhaps their debts are not very large, and they have given them up as bad debts long before. Sometimes the trustee becomes insolvent himself, and apparently it is not a criminal offence in that case for him to have got the assets into his hands and convert them to his own use.

7668. Would you mind telling me if a trust deed, for the benefit of creditors, is made like that to a trustee ? Would it be the Chancery Division of the High Court that could enforce the trust, or could the local Bankruptcy Court do so ?—The local Bankruptcy Court would have no power whatever; the only court that could enforce it would be the Chancery Court. The execution of such a trust deed is of course an act of bankruptcy, and if the creditors wish they can have the debtor adjudicated upon the execution of such a deed.

7669. Would you be in favour of there being some official control of these private arrangements ?—Yes, I think it would be very desirable. In the case of the voluntary liquidation of a public company, the trustee or any creditor can go into the Chancery Court, and have any matter that arises in the course of the winding up decided there, and any irregularity by the trustee would be subject to the control of the Chancery Court, and I think a similar provision should be made with regard to these trust deeds, that a creditor could come in and bring any difficulty that arose in the matter, or any misconduct of the trustee, before the Bankruptcy Court. Then I think that the trustee should furnish an account, which would be audited by the Bankruptcy Court, and his remuneration should be fixed, because the question of remuneration is a very serious one. Sometimes these trustees, when they have a small estate, and the realisation lasts over a good length of time, simply take the whole of the estate themselves, and do not distribute it at all.

Mr. Thomas C. Houston.

20 June 1907.

7670. Would you think it right to provide that the moneys should all be paid to a separate account ?—I think that would be a very good idea. That would prevent a trustee who became insolvent himself having this money along with his own estate.

7671. Would you give power to the creditors or trustee to bring matters, in a matter arising in the administration of the trust, before the court ?—Yes.

7672. That would be before the Bankruptcy Court ?—Yes, the Bankruptcy Court would be the natural court to control anything of that kind. That would be especially the case in local courts. In Dublin they have a Chancery Court, as well as a Bankruptcy Court, and that is more easy of access there; but in the local jurisdiction there is no such thing as any Chancery jurisdiction, or there is a very small Chancery jurisdiction; there the Bankruptcy Court would be the only court to control such things.

7673. You would be rather in favour of the court fixing the remuneration, as well as having some official control over the trustee's account ?—Yes, I would.

7675. Do you have many assignments of book debts come before you ?—There are a good many assignments of book debts.

7676. Do you think it would be a good thing to have those registered ?—There are also hiring agreements. That is another form of security.

7677. I was going to ask you about that. As to book debts, do you think it would be a wise thing ?—Anything that would give more publicity to these arrangements, and would enable the creditors to see the true position of affairs. At the present time, the collection of book debts might have been assigned, and the creditors might rely on those being in existence, and when they came in bankruptcy to realise them, they would have been transferred and they would know nothing about them at all.

7678. Are you troubled with hire-purchase agreements much ?—It is practically the same in Ireland as in England. Pianos and bicycles, and such things as are sold to small people, who cannot afford to pay for them altogether, are taken by them on the hire-purchase system.

7679. Do you think those agreements ought to be made the subject of registration ?—Yes, on the same principle as the assignment of debts.

7681. (Mr. Chamberlin.) I suppose you appreciate that in registering an assignment of book debts it might act injuriously to the business in some large businesses ?—I suppose it might in large businesses.

7682. It is rather a matter which has two sides to it In Belfast you have very large concerns which will sometimes want temporary advances, and security is given upon work which is in progress. Would you say that in such a case as that registration should take place ?—As you say, there are two sides to the question. I was thinking more of the class of cases that come within the jurisdiction of the Belfast court, which are more of a small character.

7683. I do not want to press the point very much. I have no doubt you have considered that there are cases where it might be a hardship ?—Certainly, in the case of a large business, I daresay it might be a disadvantage to the merchant that such a thing should be. But there is the same drawback about bills of sale.

7684. I take it from what you said that in your view voluntary private deeds of arrangement are not advantageous ?—I would not go so far as that: I think in a great many cases they are advantageous; the only thing is I think they should be put under some control. At the present time with us they are practically under no control.

7685. In a private deed of arrangement with creditors, is there not generally a committee of inspection ?—Not necessarily.

7686. Is it not often so ?—In large estates it is usually so, but in the case of small estates the trustee acts alone, and sometimes even the creditors are not invited to say anything about it at all; they are never called together.

7687. What are your views upon the matter of the majority binding the minority in the case of private arrangements ?—The rule as regards arrangements under the control of the court is that three-fifths in number and value of the creditors with debts to the extent of £10 should approve. That majority binds the rest. I think it is three-fourths in England.

7688. A creditor for £50, or a syndicate of creditors for £50, could upset a deed of arrangement in Ireland and throw it into bankruptcy ?—Yes, a creditor for £40 could throw it into bankruptcy certainly. The execution of the deed is an act of bankruptcy, and the creditors could come in and have the debtor adjudicated upon that.

7689. In your experience is the non-keeping of accounts very prevalent ?—In the case of small traders it is: shop-keepers and people of that kind very frequently keep no accounts at all, or else a very rough system.

7690. Is it your view that it should be made a penal offence ?—I do not know: it would be hard in some cases to make it an offence, because it would stop a great deal of small trading altogether. Women, for instance, that carry on a small business; those people could not keep much of a system of accounts. I think it would be hard on them if it was made a criminal offence not to keep accounts.

7691. Do I take it from you that discharges, or certificates I think you call them, are not much sought after by bankrupts ?—I would hardly go so far as that, but in the majority of cases they are not sought for. It is very hard to put a percentage, but I should say perhaps 15 per cent. to 20 per cent. of the bankrupts either apply for their certificate or pay a composition and get the bankruptcy annulled.

7692. Is not being able to get a discharge regarded by bankrupts as a punishment ?—Not so much of a punishment in Ireland as in England, because there is no criminal offence with regard to obtaining credit in Ireland.

7693. (Mr. Richardson.) I do not quite understand what you mean by the fourth act, when you say in England there is no limitation to traders, in case of departing from a dwelling house, or otherwise absenting themselves from keeping house. I do not quite understand what that means ?—The departing from a dwelling house, or otherwise absenting himself from keeping house, is an act of bankruptcy in both countries. In Ireland there is a limitation that it is only in the case of a trader that that is an act of bankruptcy.

7694. After a debtor has obtained a certificate of conformity, I suppose he is clear of the bankruptcy proceedings, and after-acquired property he has cannot be touched ?—He is discharged from all debts by the certificate of conformity, except Crown debts, and debts that have been incurred by fraud.

7695. With regard to arrangements with creditors, I suppose after the second meeting, the deed operates at once ?—Yes.

7696. It has not to wait three months like it does here; here a trustee has to wait three months before he can realise ?—Of course there is no realisation, as a rule, in the case of these private arrangements at all.

7697. The trading goes on ?—Yes, the debtor never ceases his business. That is the advantage of these proceedings I think. He offers a composition of so much in the £, and that is payable after the confirmation, at least within a month of confirmation of the offer.

7698. (Chairman.) There would not be a three months or six months limit there ?

7699. (Mr. Richardson.) This refers to the private arrangement outside the court ?—Under the control of the court.

7700. (Chairman.) It is like the old petition for liquidation under the Act of 1869.

7701. (Mr. Richardson.) Does this three-fifths in number and value give rise to any fraud or malpractices at all, do you know ?—I do not think so. In some cases, of course, the three-fifths majority is made up of friends, whose debts are rather questionable. In that case there is an investigation to see who is entitled to vote. If there is anything uncertain about their debts they are not allowed to vote; that keeps the thing pretty right. The court has power in any case, if the proposal is not a reasonable one, to order that it should be turned into bankruptcy.

7702. Do you think it is advisable that trustees should be guaranteed ?—Yes, I should say that would be desirable, or what I suggest is that they should lodge the money to a separate account.

7703. Do you not think it would be better that they should be guaranteed ?—I suppose that would be safer.

7704. (Mr. Peat.) There are two classes of private arrangements referred to, one appears to be under the direction of the court, and the other voluntary. With regard to the one under the direction of the court, is it necessary for the debtor to come forward with a proposition to compound his debts ?—Yes.

7705. Or is it sufficient if he comes forward with an offer to assign his estate for the benefit of his creditors ?—He can do either. In the majority of cases, he comes forward with an offer of composition, agreeing to pay so much in the £. He usually pays it. He can either pay it in cash, or pay it by bills.

7707. Is there any inquiry by the court as regards his conduct before the court sanctions such an arrangement ?—Certainly. The court has to satisfy itself that the offer is a reasonable one to be executed under its control, and the debtor is in nearly every case examined, if any creditor opposes, and his whole conduct is examined into, and he must make and file a complete statement of his affairs the same as in bankruptcy, and he is examined on the facts that are mentioned in that statement, 7708. Assuming he has committed any offence, such, for instance, as not keeping books, and such, for instance, as gambling or any offence of that character, would the court for that reason, on account of his misconduct, refuse to assent to an arrangement of this character ?—No, unless you could make that fact a ground for showing that the proposal was not reasonable to be executed under the control of the court.

7709. It is not misconduct which would affect the decision of the court ?—No. Of course it might be an element in considering whether the proposal was a reasonable one.

Mr. Thomas C. Houston.

7710. Permit me to ask you this again. If he had failed to keep accounts, if he had gambled, if he had given payment to creditors knowing himself to be insolvent, if he had traded after knowing himself to be insolvent, would these matters taken alone be sufficient in the case of your court for the refusal of the assent of the court to a private arrangement of this character ?—Of course the creditors vote on this arrangement; and if the majority support it, and if the majority of the creditors are trade creditors, it has a very important weight with the court. But at the same time the court takes all these matters you mention into consideration, and all these matters are proved in evidence in the court; and if these facts together show that the proposal is not a reasonable one the court would refuse it.

7711. I would rather wish to ask if there is anything in your Bankruptcy Act which requires the court to refuse its assent in the circumstances I have mentioned ?—No, nothing of that kind; only in so far as bearing on the fact of the proposal being reasonable and proper.

7712. Let me assume this: that the man's estate shows 5s. in the £, he comes forward to the court, and supplements his estate with sufficient guarantees to pay 7s. 6d.; would the commission of any of those offences that I have mentioned be sufficient for the court to say, "We shall not sanction this arrangement" ?—I do not think so in one of these private arrangements.

7713. That is to say, the sufficiency of the man's offer is the thing which dominates the court in deciding ?—He must file a statement of his affairs; and as the fact of his not keeping books would show that that statement of affairs was not to be relied upon, and that there is a further estate which if proper books had been kept would be disclosed, the failure to keep books might be a reason for refusing sanction.

7714. That is because his offer was not sufficient ?—Yes.

7715. But his conduct does not enter into the matter ?—Not so much.

7716. If the court sanctions an arrangement of this kind the man avoids the consequences of bankruptcy ?—Yes, he can carry on trade.

7717. He avoids all the disabilities of bankruptcy ?—He does not get credit so easily.

7718. He is not advertised as bankrupt ?—No.

7719. There is no receiving order made against him ?—No.

7720. He does not lose his voting powers ?—No.

7721. There is no disability ?—No disability in that case at all.

7722. Is this sort of relief from debts very much taken advantage of ?—I believe that in the courts of Ireland, both in local courts and in the High Court in Dublin, there are roughly about an equal number of cases of bankruptcy and arrangement.

7723. It occurs to me that the second arrangement is what you have described, and what I should describe as a private arrangement ?—Yes.

7724. Where there is no application to the court at all, and where all the creditors have to agree to its being effected ?—It is necessary for all the creditors to agree.

7725. Otherwise it leaves them with a remedy ?—Yes; they can come into bankruptcy.

7726. What are the objects which a debtor wishes to obtain by going for a private arrangement as distinguished from the arrangement in the court to which I have referred and to which you refer ?—The case of the private arrangement where there is an assignment of the debtor's goods does not come into court at all; the debtor, perhaps, finds himself in such a state that he does not want to carry on business, and he simply hands the whole matter over to a trustee so as to get rid of all liability in that way.

7727. (Chairman.) And he does not get examined ?—No, he is not examined, except at the meeting of creditors.

7728. (Mr. Peat.) He does not, in the other case, get examined because his conduct does not affect it. Am I right in assuming that it is absolutely the worst cases in your country which go under the private arrangement as distinguished from the private arrangement in court?—No, I do not know that it is the worst cases. Take, for instance, one class of case that always has to be done that way, that is the case where husband and wife carry on trading together.

7729. That I understand?—Then very often in the case of a large merchant the creditors meet together and come to some arrangement to take an assignment of his business and take over his assets, and really that case would be the best kind of case, that is, if the creditors are favourable.

7730. No doubt it is the best arrangement. I wish to put one question upon that subject which arises from an answer which you gave to Mr. Chamberlin. Mr. Chamberlin asked you if, under a private arrangement as distinguished from an application to the court in connection with a private arrangement, in your opinion the majority should bind the minority?—Subject, I suppose, to the same regulations that exist in regard to arrangements that are under the control of the court. A mere majority would not be satisfactory, but I think that three-fifths or three-fourths, as in England, would be a fair proportion. The difficulty in regard to these majorities very often is the class of debts that are claimed. When a man comes into court and wants to make an arrangement, or when he comes to make an arrangement outside the court, he gets some of his friends to make claims, and these claims of relatives are very unsatisfactory sometimes; for instance, the wife can come forward and say she had lent him a large sum of money, and this money is due by the debtor to her, and it is unreasonable that she should vote on an equality with the other creditors, and the same thing with regard to sons and other members of the family, or friends outside. Cash creditors are always an unsatisfactory class of creditors, when it comes to voting, as compared with trade creditors.

7731. Does your opinion go in this direction: that where there are claims by members of the family, the wife, sons, or near relations of that character, they are not taken into account where the private arrangement is under the court?—They are taken into account.

7732. That is to say that the claim is considered good although it may be from a friend?—Yes, certainly.

7733. But it is examined to see whether it is good or bad?—Yes.

7734. In the private arrangement I understand you to say that the same opportunity of examining is not forthcoming? That is a private arrangement outside the court?—There is not the same opportunity. A debt of that kind is in a better position with regard to an arrangement than with regard to a bankruptcy, because the rule with regard to a bankruptcy is that the debt of a wife for money lent to a husband for the purpose of carrying on his trade is postponed to the other creditors

7735. So it is in a private arrangement?—In a private arrangement the wife votes on an equality with the other debts if her claim is good.

7736. An arrangement in the court?—Yes.

7737. The wife votes?—Yes, on an equality with the other creditors.

7738. Although her claim may be postponed as a matter of dividend?—The bankruptcy rule does not apply.

7739. To a private arrangement in court?—She is entitled to her dividend with the other creditors. If the matter is turned into bankruptcy of course her demand would be postponed till the other creditors receive their amounts in full.

7740. I rather follow your answer to be that with regard to private arrangements where you have an honest trustee, a reputable man as trustee, the liquidation of the estate is on the whole satisfactory?—Yes; of course if you have a respectable solvent man that has a reputation to keep up, he would not do anything that he cannot stand by.

7741. Has it ever occurred to you that the court in your country, or the Board of Trade here, might license, if you like to use that term, certain people to become trustees and that a person who is not so licensed shall not be a trustee?—I suppose they might.

7742. You have never thought of that?—No.

7743. By that means you would escape the riff-raff who go about seeking whom they may devour?—That is true, but do you not think it better on the whole to have the actions of the trustees controlled in some way by a court?

7744. You are asking me a question now: my answer to that would be that the creditors themselves are the people who must be judge of that. If the creditors want a private arrangement we should endeavour to let them have it in the safest possible manner?—Of course if the creditors want that they usually have a committee of inspection.

7745. You think it would be wise in every case of a deed of arrangement to have a committee of inspection?—Yes, either that or to have it under the control of the court.

7746. That is to say you should have an audit by a committee of inspection or an audit by the court; is that your view?—Yes.

7747. Just a word or so upon the bankruptcy matter. I understand you say under the Act of 1872 a new method has been introduced into Ireland where the creditor's assignee takes the chief control or the entire control of the administration of the estate?—A trustee appointed by the creditors.

7748. That has only been applied in two cases as far as you know?—As far as I know there have only been two cases of that kind.

7749. May I ask you if you think the reason that that has only been taken advantage of in two cases is because as a rule the cases are too small to require the assistance of the creditor's assignee?—As a matter of fact both cases were large estates, so I think it would point to that fact that you mention.

7750. For instance, take your own court, are your cases large?—No, they are mostly small traders.

7751. And the official assignee's business is a question of merely going in and selling for as much as he can get, and getting clear as soon as he can?—Yes, shopkeepers' stock.

7752. It does not require management?—It does not require much management, but of course there have been as large cases administered by the court as the cases where a trustee was appointed.

7753. (Mr. Smith.) Can you tell me if there are any statistics published showing the proportion of bankruptcies as bankruptcies to the number of deeds of arrangement?—Those statistics are published in Thoms' Directory every year. That is a directory for Ireland.

7754. The proportions are ascertainable there?—Yes.

7755. Do they give any statistics of the costs of winding up the different classes of estate as the English reports do?—There are statistics of the costs of the bankruptcies which have been taxed.

7756. But not the arrangements?—No.

7757. Do you know if there are any general complaints as to the working of the Bankruptcy Act in Ireland?—I have mentioned in my memorandum two matters as to which there is very general complaint; those would apply perhaps more to the local courts than to the Dublin Court. The first is with regard to the winding-up of companies. In England I believe the Bankruptcy Court has jurisdiction in the case of the winding-up of limited companies. In Ireland these limited companies are wound up in the Chancery Division, and the Chancery Division is considerably slower than the Bankruptcy Court. The other matter is with regard to deceaseds' estates. When a man's estate is insolvent after his death the creditors are bound to go into the Chancery Court and have the estate administered there; it would be a great advantage if the same rule applied in Ireland as applies in England, that in a case of that kind the Bankruptcy Court should have jurisdiction over that estate.

7758. Apart from these two questions, do you know of any general complaint? I thought you indicated there was some complaint as to the present method of carrying out deeds of arrangement, that further control was wanted?—That is with regard to private arrangements.

7759. When you say further control, you are not speaking of those which are dealt with by the Court?—No, I think they work very satisfactorily.

7760. What is the general character of the examination of a bankrupt in Ireland; does it deal with the conduct of the bankrupt in the same way as the English Act does?—Certainly.

7761. Who are the parties examining?—The solicitor for the assignee.

7762. For the official assignee:?—Yes. The official assignee is not usually a solicitor or a legal man himself, and his solicitor conducts the examination.

7763. Does he elicit the cause of the bankruptcy and go into the history of the bankrupt?—He does; he takes the statement of affairs that has been filed by the bankrupt as the basis of his examination, and he examines him on the different matters mentioned there. If there is anything like irregularity in his conduct, such as not keeping books, or gambling transactions, or anything of that kind, he examines him with regard to that, too.

7764. I suppose these arrangements are carried out or entered into at a meeting of the creditors. Are the arrangements under the control of the court?—There are three meetings of creditors altogether; there is what is called a preliminary meeting of creditors after the petition is filed.

7765. Is that held in court?—No, that is usually held in the solicitor's or accountant's office, and then there are two meetings before the court at which the voting takes place. The preliminary meeting is for the purpose of formulating the offer.

7766. If there is any question arises as to the voting I suppose the court decides it?—Yes, the Court of course decides that.

7767. If a fictitious claim were presented and the creditors objected to it?—There is usually a reference with regard to that.

7768. Who presides at this meeting, is it the registrar?—In the local courts, and I think the same thing applies to the Dublin Court, the registrar has largely co-ordinate powers with the Judge. In a great many cases in a matter of that kind he has equal powers with the Judge if the Judge is not there.

7769. Would you be in favour of auditing the trustee's accounts and arrangements by the Court?—That is in the outside arrangements?

7770. No, I am speaking entirely now of arrangements under the Bankruptcy Act?—In arrangements under the Bankruptcy Act the accounts are audited by the Court.

7771. They are taxed at present?—Yes, they are taxed by the court, and the remuneration of the official assignee fixed, and there is no difficulty. It is usually a payment by way of composition.

7772. You spoke of the effect of the Act of 1872 leading to the appointment of trustees other than the official assignee. At what meeting is he appointed?—That is in a bankruptcy matter?

7773. Yes?—There is an application made to the Judge at any time on notice; notice is given to the different creditors and then the application is made before the court, and the court considers whether a trustee should be appointed or not. The decision rests with the court as to whether a trustee should be appointed or not.

7774. What is the practical difference between a voluntary arrangement (not a composition) under the court and bankruptcy proceedings?—The practical difference is that the debtor is under no disability; he can carry on his business as usual, his credit is probably limited, but there is nothing to prevent him carrying on his business, whereas in the case of a bankruptcy his assets are taken possession of and vested in the official assignee, and he loses control.

26 June 1907.

7775. Do you think it would be desirable to restrict these deeds of arrangement to cases where a business was to be carried on? Do you think it is desirable to set up a competing system?—It has worked in Ireland very well, not only in the case of traders, but of people who become insolvent from other causes.

7776. The objection in Ireland is to the voluntary deed outside the court?—Yes.

7777. (Chairman.) Would you mind telling me who audits the accounts in bankruptcy or arrangements under the Court? Is there a court accountant?—Of course the official assignee is an accountant, and he presents the account. It is vouched before the Registrar and is audited by the court itself.

7778. (Mr. Peat.) Is the official assignee an accountant as a rule?—Yes. The regulation with regard to the matter is that the official assignee should be an accountant or a person with a competent knowledge of accounts.

7779. (Chairman.) The only official assignee I ever acted for was Mr. MacConkey. Was he an accountant?—I believe he was. There are two in Dublin, Mr. MacEntire was an accountant.

7780. Do you, as Registrar, decide questions of proof at the public sittings and preside over the examination of the debtor?—If the Judge is not there.

7781. When the debtor makes his offer at the first preliminary meeting is it circulated amongst the creditors, or is it taken that they ought to know of it?—In the case of an arrangement?

7782. Yes?—They must get notice of it.

7783. Who sends the notice?—The notice is sent out by the debtor himself, through his solicitor. There are very exact regulations with regard to notice, and any one who has not received notice before the meetings would be thrown back on his original rights; he would be able to claim his debt in full.

7784. Is the approval of an arrangement by the court ever refused on the ground that the offer is too small?—Yes, very frequently. If it is shown that the estate is larger than the offer that is made, even though the creditors vote for it, it has been frequently refused.

7785. When creditors claim to attend a meeting, have they, as they have in England, each one to prove his debt and have it admitted before he is entitled to take part in the meeting?—There is a definite proceeding with regard to that; in Ireland a creditor can come in and can hand in his proof of debt, and can vote on his debt being admitted. The meetings at which the voting takes place are meetings for the purpose of proving debts too. But if he does not come in himself, he must fill up a proxy in favour of somebody, and the proxy is usually filled up in favour of a solicitor. I think that procedure puts a creditor rather at a disadvantage, because he has probably to pay a solicitor for acting for him, and with a creditor across here in England it is not fair that he should have to pay a solicitor merely to vote. I think there should be some regulation that proofs that are sent in to some of the officials of the court could be used.

Mr STEPHEN NELSON BRAITHWAITE, called; and Examined.

3 July, 1907.

7786. (Chairman.) You, I believe, are a solicitor?—Yes, I am a member of the firm of Travers-Smith, Braithwaite & Co., of Throgmorton Avenue, solicitors to the Stock Exchange.

7787. Of course you have had a very large experience in all Stock Exchange matters?—I have been connected with my late partner for upwards of thirty years, and since his death in 1897 I have myself been solicitor to the Stock Exchange, having succeeded him. During all that period I have had constant information with regard to Stock Exchange dealings.

7788. Without going into too much detail I think the rule of the Stock Exchange by which every member is bound is that when a man is declared a defaulter his assets vest in the official assignee?—That is so. That has been held in the case of Richardson v. Stormont, Todd & Co., in which it was held that the official assignee was entitled to sue for the recovery of assets due to the defaulter.

7789. I think it concerns all his assets, and not merely Stock Exchange assets?—All his assets.

7790. Is there not also what one may call an artificial fund which is created by the closing of accounts?—There is an artificial fund which results from what are known as the hammer prices, bargains being closed at the hammer on the day of the default which would be other than the prices at which the bargains were made.

7791. I think it has been held that that fund vests in the official assignee for distribution amongst Stock Exchange creditors, and the general creditors do not share in it?—That is so. That is decided by Plumbly's case.

7792. I think that the case that occurred lately, Ponsford Baker & Co. v. The Union of London & Smith's Bank, was a case in which the official assignee desired to redeem a security which had been pledged with a bank by the defaulting member?—That is so.

7793. And the ultimate decision of the Court of Appeal was that the bank could not safely hand over the security to the official assignee although they desired to pay?—Neither to the official assignee nor to the defaulter, nor to them both acting together.

7794. That was an application, I think, of rather an old rule of law, that you cannot pay to either the debtor or a person claiming under the debtor if you have notice of an act of bankruptcy?—That is so.

7796. Have you any instances in which the operation of the rule has worked hardly and to the disadvantage of Stock Exchange creditors and other creditors besides Ponsford Baker & Co.'s case?—I would rather those particular instances should be given to you afterwards by Mr. Smith, the Deputy-Chairman. There is one case that is mentioned in the statement that has been handed in to you, that in a very recent case a firm of brokers had received £6,500 from clients with which to pay for securities which those brokers had purchased. That £6,500 was paid by the brokers into their own bank in the ordinary course of business, and they gave their cheque in payment for the securities bought, but later in the same day, that is in the Account Day, they found that certain of their other clients, nothing to do with this particular investment at all, could not meet their engagements to the extent of some £8,600. In consequence of that, the brokers had to declare themselves unable to meet their engagements, and as a result of this their bankers naturally refused to honor the cheque for that £6,500 which they had drawn and handed away for these stocks and shares. The result of this was that, although the bank was otherwise fully secured (the bank having in the meantime taken that balance to account of a running loan), the client's money remained in the bankers' hands for the three months. The client was prevented from receiving his stocks and shares which he had bought and paid for, or from having his money returned. Of course, that might place him in a very difficult position and might even result in his bankruptcy.

7797. I see you also notice the position of a person who may be desirous of paying a debt but cannot pay it to a trustee under a deed of assignment safely?—Yes, the effect of that decision also is that nobody who owes a debt to a person who has committed an act of bankruptcy can pay that money to the debtor or to anyone claiming right through the debtor; and in that way, debtors to the person who has committed an act of bankruptcy I was going to say are relieved from paying their debt for three months; but that is not quite so, because the Court of Appeal in Ponsford Baker & Company endeavoured to meet this case by saying that the court would under certain circumstances make such orders as might be necessary to enable money to be received but kept in suspense till the expiration of the three months; but I might say on that, that we consulted Mr. Rufus Isaacs, and he thought, with deference to the court, that this was a new proposition for which there was prevously no authority whatever.

7798. And, further, it is under the present rules of court almost impracticable ?—Almost impracticable. I do not quite see how the thing is to work out in practice. There are cases when, as everybody knows who is connected with legal proceedings, even with the greatest effort, it is simply impossible to get an order through in time to really save the position. We also instance a case which was also suggested by Mr. Rufus Isaacs, such a case as the merchant dealing in soft goods, such as fresh fruit; if those goods were delivered to a person who had committed an act of bankruptcy, or were consigned to a person who had committed an act of bankruptcy, the carriers could not deliver them to that person having notice of the act of bankruptcy; meanwhile, the fruit would all rot; before you could do anything, the whole subject-matter would be worthless.

7799. Do you not think it would be a very strong thing for this Committee to recommend that the assignment of everything to the official assignee should not be a cessio bonorum, or an act of bankruptcy, after the decision of the House of Lords to that effect, if the point that you desire to obtain could be obtained otherwise ?—If the point could be obtained otherwise, I think it would not be desirable that there should be any such special amendment, because after all, the effect of the rules of the Stock Exchange as they stand is practically the same as a deed of assignment by a debtor to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors. I do not quite see how you could make a distinction and say that that kind of assignment was to be different in its effect from an ordinary assignment by deed; but I should like to suggest this, if you would allow me, that an exception might possibly be made in favour of assignments for the benefit of creditors, and that a discharge given by an assignee for the benefit of creditors should discharge the person paying. There are considerations which I think are of some weight in that connection, for this reason, that such an assignment in its nature is intended to be for the protection of creditors, and it seems a little inconsistent that an assignment, which is made in these cases for the purpose of preserving the assets for the benefit of creditors should not be allowed to have operation for three months, during which period of three months possibly the assets would be dissipated, or would not be forthcoming at the end of the three months, if there was nobody there to take charge of them.

7801. That would obviate the hardship in Davies v. Petrie ?—In Davies v. Petrie, unfortunately, the assignee did not properly account for the fund which he had received; but I do not know why there should be a distinction, why there should be any greater protection against the acts of a trustee after the three months, than during the three months. If it is admitted that the receipt of the assignee after the expiration of the three months is a valid discharge, although he runs away with the money, I do not see logically why his receipts during the three months should not be equally a discharge.

7802. Do you think that such a protection in favour of the assignee for the benefit of the creditors would sufficiently meet the point that the Stock Exchange desire to have attended to ?—It would meet one point, it would meet the point of collection; it would not meet, for the moment taking it simply and leaving it there, the point of distribution during the three months, As you will readily recognise, especially in the case of financial dealings, as on the Stock Exchange, it is of the first importance that money should be promptly available, becauses cases of failure so largely affect the persons who have dealt with the debtor, and it is of the first importance that the moneys which are distributable should be promptly distributed. If they are not promptly distributed it may have the effect of bringing about, in a case of serious fall in prices and so on, a panic, a disaster which might be avoided if you could only distribute promptly. I suggest, therefore, that it should be carried one step further. Not only should an assignee for the benefit of creditors be in a position to give a legal discharge for those assets, but should also be allowed to make distribution rateably amongst the creditors, possibly, if it were thought desirable, limited to a distribution in the same way as would have been made by a trustee in bankruptcy.

7803. That would of necessity have to apply to deeds of assignment as well ?—I put it in that form if I may, because I recognise the difficulty of exceptional legislation in favour of any particular class or classes of the community.

7804. You do not think on general grounds that it would be unsafe to permit a trustee under a deed of assignment to distribute at once, subject, of course, to hereafter having to account to the estate if there were a bankruptcy, the creditors giving credit for what they have received ?—No. The suggestion is as I have stated it.

7805. And if that were enacted, that would cover the whole ground ?—That I think would cover the whole ground, the whole ground as far as we are concerned. It does not cover the ground of an act of bankruptcy, which is not a deed of assignment.

7806. No, I know that ?—But we are not particularly at the present moment concerned with other than deeds of assignment, or something in the nature of deeds of assignment.

7807. Could you tell me, allied to that, what is the practice of the Stock Exchange with regard to outside creditors ? Is notice given to them to come in ?—Notice is not actually given to them, but if they put in claims they are admitted to rank, not on the Plumbly differences, but on the ordinary assets.

7808. Are the Plumbly v. Grant differences distributed separately ?—Yes.

7809. In Ponsford Baker's case, was it mainly out of that fund that the Stock Exchange creditors got paid ?—I cannot answer that question. Dr. Richardson, the question was: In Ponsford Baker & Co.'s case was the fund in the bank the principal asset out of which the creditors were paid, or was it only a comparatively small portion ? (Dr. H. L. S. Richardson.) I should think it was about 50 per cent. As a matter of fact, practically the whole of that money arose from securities which Ponsford Baker & Co had paid for, and had deposited with their bank.

7811. What was the actual dividend paid to creditors in Ponsford Baker's case ? According to a report in The Times of his bankruptcy it was said to have been 13s. in the £. Is that right ?—(Dr. Richardson.) That is to creditors other than what I call stock creditors; those creditors who had delivered stock, and not been paid for it, received 20s. in the £, less a small amount for legal expenses.

7812. Did you distribute the rest amongst all the creditors ?—(Dr. Richardson.) Yes. I have not got the figures here, but from memory I should think 13s. is just about correct.

7813. (Mr. Richardson.) It seems to me that sometimes if the stocks were not realised immediately, they would appreciate in value ?—(Mr. Braithwaite.) In some cases they would appreciate.

7814. If you make a rule rigid that they should be immediately realised, probably in course of time you would come and say it is a mistake to have made them immediately realisable, because if you give the trustee or the assignee the opportunity of holding them, they may appreciate in value ?—I quite agree, if I may say so, but I suggest that the assignee, whoever he is, ought to be in a position to exercise a reasonable discretion as to whether they should be sold or should be held, but now he cannot. He has no discretion; they must be held for three months.

7815. You want to have discretion ?—I do not want a statutory power that the assignee must sell them immediately they come into his hands, but I suggest he should have the power if he considers it judicious to do so. I would like to mention one other point, and that is that as regards any act of bankruptcy, we made in our Memorandum a suggestion to you, apart from this question of the act of bankruptcy resulting merely from an assignment that payments made in the ordinary course of business, bona fide made in the ordinary course of business, should be protected although the parties making the payment or delivering goods or stock, or whatever it may be, had notice of the act of bankruptcy. That suggested remedy would meet the case of the soft fruit which I mentioned.

7816. (Chairman.) That would, in short, be to put the case that was reversed by Ponsford Baker & Co. v. The Union of London & Smith's Bank (Lawford v. Lawrence) on its legs rather ?—That would be so.

Mr. Edmund Arthur Smith, called; and Examined.

Mr. Edmund A. Smith

3 July, 1907.

7817. (Chairman.) You are Deputy Chairman of the Stock Exchange ?—Yes, I have been so for fifteen years.

7818. You have heard the statements that Mr. Braithwaite has made ?—Yes.

7819. I believe you can assist us by telling us some concrete instances, and about the concrete working of the rule which you are bringing to our attention ?—I only had an intention of asking your permission to direct attention to two points in our memorandum which are generally stated, and to place before your Committee some particular facts bearing on those two statements which I think you might be glad to hear, because the statements necessarily, from the nature of the memorandum, are rather vague.

7821. Certainly ?—I find that during five and a half years (I do not think it is necessary to go into the number of firms, although I could give you that) 132 individual members, either trading on their own account or in partnership, were declared defaulters, and of those 132, fifteen only became bankrupt eventually, and (I want to lay great stress on this point) the bankruptcies of only five out of the fifteen arose from their Stock Exchange engagements. In the other ten cases the bankruptcy in many instances took place a considerable time afterwards, and had really nothing whatever to do with their failure to meet their engagements on the Stock Exchange. That, I think, has some value as bearing on the statement generally: "perfectly solvent as apart from his Stock Exchange engagements and that his Stock Exchange creditors have no desire to make him a bankrupt" and indeed as a rule they have not. You, Sir, in one of your remarks asked whether in the case of a defaulter on the Stock Exchange all the assets of the defaulter were collected and formed part of the estate, and I should like to say in that respect that the Stock Exchange creditors are very lenient in that way, and that if a member's career has been an honourable one that they very rarely touch his furniture, or anything of that kind, and in most cases make him a grant to relieve his immediate necessities. The other point is this: "Hitherto when a member has been declared a defaulter the official assignee has immediately collected all the available assets and distributed them as soon as possible, usually paying a dividend within a few days," and that is the case. That is, I may say, invariably the case. I have two startling instances here which I should like to put before you of quick distribution. One was seventeen years ago. I have taken the two strongest instances I could find of quick distribution, which under the somewhat tedious provisions of our present bankruptcy laws, and in view of this recent judgment, would now be quite impossible. A default was declared on the June 29th with liabilities amounting to £44,900 odd, say £45,000. A first dividend on his estate of 5s. in the £, was paid to his creditors on the afternoon of the same day, and within the following fortnight a further dividend of 6s. was paid, his realised assets roughly making 11s. in the £; his assets altogether realising, apparently, some £25,000 odd. In the other case a defaulter was declared with total liabilities of £10,800 odd. He was declared on March 12th (this was in the year 1890), he was possessed of considerable liquid assets arising in this way, he had money to receive in differences and he also had (this has a bearing upon the case of Ponsford Baker) loans, and the loans were immediately paid off, and the margin securities realised, and immediately realised, and it was known at the time that though his engagements were not very enormous, that is to say the number of his creditors was not very large, still it was known that to many of them the amounts they had to receive were so large that it was likely to more than cripple them, to cause their failure also, and, therefore, the quickest possible distribution was made. His total liabilities were £10,800; he was declared on March 12th, and the next day, March 13th, a dividend was paid to his creditors of 15s. in the £, and another small dividend of 1s. was paid in the following fortnight. I have made bold to give these instances as showing how severely we should suffer, as an institution of course only, from this decision. When Mr. Braithwaite was in this chair you asked him if he could give any instances of particular hardship to us other than that of the Ponsford Baker case, and Mr. Braithwaite thought that I could do it. I do not know that I can, because I would submit that we really have not had time yet, the Ponsford Baker decision is so recent that there have not been any particular cases, except this, that at the present time the official assignee has in his hands £35,000. which is really the property of Stock Exchange creditors, which he is quite unable to deal with, so that there is a floating body of creditors in the House who are entitled to a share in the £35,000 which they will not be able to get until, in each individual case of a failure, the three months have expired.

7822. (Mr. Evans.) The two instances of disributions you have given are about the same date exactly are they not ?—No, there was an interval of nine or ten years between them.

7823. You gave one as seventeen years ago and the other as 1890 ?—One was in 1890 and the other in 1882.

7824. The first you gave was seventeen years ago ?—Then I have looked at the wrong figures.

7825. Was that the 1882 one ?—The heavy liabilities, the £45,000, were in 1882.

7826. That is twenty-five years ago ?—And the other with the similar liability, but the more dangerous failure, was in 1890.

7827. The first was twenty-five years ago, and the second seventeen years ago ?—Yes. I have given you those two as specially crystalised cases, but I do maintain that in all cases of default the distribution of assets has been as speedy as possible on the part of the official assignee, and that is the essence of his duty; if he did not act up to that very severe complaints would be sure to be made of his laxity. His one object is to distribute all assets as soon as is possible, with the least possible delay.

7828. (Mr. Addison.) I have listened with great interest to what you have said, but I want you to make one thing quite clear to me. These distributions, I suppose, were amongst Stock Exchange creditors only ?—No.

7829. These speedy distributions ?—No, in many cases. I think in these two particular instances that both men were dealers, but for a more precise answer to your question I would ask you to ask Dr. Richardson, the official assignee.

7830. Is there any machinery by which you can inquire into outside claims ?—As to their validity ?

7831. Yes, not members of the Stock Exchange ?—Whether their claim is a just one as against the estate ?

7832. Yes ?—The responsibility for what would rest with the committee of creditors and their officer for the time being, the official assignee.

7833. In cases where members of the Stock Exchange have been serious defaulters with regard to trust accounts, and so on, what machinery have you for inquiring into the claims of different clients or trustees ?—We have no particular machinery except the general body of intelligence on the committee of creditors, who would be keen to examine into them.

7834. I happen to have one instance in my own office now where it will take weeks to unravel the transactions between the defaulter and the estate, which has probably suffered a loss by him of £50,000. You could not speedily distribute that with any fairness to that estate ?—No.

7835. Then in such cases have you got the available machinery for inquiries and distribution where they are so complicated ?—I take it in such a case as you have mentioned that the difficulty would be solved by actual bankruptcy immediately taking place. Then, of course, we should not object at all. We have no power to object, and we do not desire to. We should accept that. Our complaint is the doubtful three months, in most of our cases it is more than a doubtful three months, it is not doubtful at all, no bankruptcy follows at all. In such a case as yours would be, you would at once take proceedings, of course.

Mr. Edmund A. Smith.

3 July, 1907.

7836. You make a different distribution to what the law would make. You settle your Stock Exchange transactions among Stock Exchange members only, giving them the benefit of that ?—Yes, but an outside creditor for differences would, so far as a certain body of assets, (not ear-marked as assets created by hammer prices), share exactly with the other creditors.

7837. But not in the hammer prices ?—No, because with that he would have nothing to do.

7838. And in the case to which Mr. Braithwaite alluded, a particular fund was handed over to a particular creditor. I dare say he was most justly and rightly entitled, but that is hardly what th law would have done ?—No, but are you arguing that the creditor was not entitled to it ?

7839. The ordinary body of creditors, I think, had he been bankrupt, would have shared in that ?—Yes, possibly.

Dr. Harry Leo Sidney Richardson, called; and Examined.

7840. (Chairman.) You have been for a good many years official assignee of the Stock Exchange ?—More than nine years.

7841. I want to ask you if you could inform the Committee as to what the procedure is for realisation and distribution in Stock Exchange defaults: and personally I should like very much to know how the interests of outside creditors are protected ?—I only have to protect creditors, non-members, as to transactions arising out of Stock Exchange transactions. All claims arising from Stock Exchange transactions are treated on an equal basis with members of the Stock Exchange, except as to the artificial fund which Mr. Braithwaite spoke to and also the surety money. I do not know if the members of the Committee know that when a man becomes a member of the Stock Exchange he has to have sureties,, which sureties are called upon to pay to me certain sums in the event of his becoming a defaulter within four years. Those sums are only paid to me for distribution amongst the Stock Exchange creditors, and under no circumstances could they ever be recoverable by the trustee in bankruptcy, because they are not, and never have been, part of the defaulter's estate. Neither have the differences that Mr. Braithwaite spoke of as being distributable amongst members of the Stock Exchange ever formed part of the defaulter's estate: and it is for that very reason, not being recoverable by the defaulter, that they are held to belong to me for distribution and not to go to the trustee in bankruptcy.

7842. You are only asignee for the benefit of creditors on the Stock Exchange transactions ?—Our rules only apply to Stock Exchange transactions.

7843. But you collect all the assets, do you not, if you can get them ?—I only know of assets on Stock Exchange transactions as a rule.

7844. You do not interfere with other outside assets ?—As a rule I am not aware of them.

7845. So that, practically, you distribute what comes to you out of Stock Exchange transactions, and if there is no bankruptcy, well and good; and if there is a bankruptcy, the bankrupt's trustee gets the other assets ?—Certainly.

7846. The Richardson v. Stormont case held that you were entitled to all the assets ?—I agree.

7847. But you do not, as a matter of fact ?—That was a Stock Exchange asset: it was shares in that particular case, and it showed in the defaulter's books: that is the particular point.

7848. But they actually decided that you were entitled to everything ?—The court decided that the assets meant the whole assets. May I put it to you in this way ? It has been raised to me. If a defaulter sells his house, is he in a position to give a title ? I have never yet been asked to concur in giving a title.

7849. As a matter of fact, as far as you are concerned, that decision has not operated so as to cast upon you the duties of a general trustee under a deed of assignment ?—It has never been taken so.

7850. Then, supposing a defaulter becomes bankrupt, do you hand over the balance of his assets in your hands, after you have distributed, to the trustees in bankruptcy if he asks for it ?—If the bankruptcy occurs within three months of the default on the Stock Exchange.

7851. And if it does not occur within three months, you distribute according to the rules ?—My title is good.

7852. Do you agree, because I know you have had large experience in all sorts of litigation, with Mr. Braithwaite's view as to the alteration in the law that would be desirable and practicable ?—I am afraid it is the only thing that we can possibly ask for. I think if we could ask that a declaration on the Stock Exchange be not an act of bankruptcy, it would be very much better for us: but I am afraid that as simply one small, or perhaps I might say fairly large, body in the City of London, we cannot ask for special legislation.

7853. You think that what Mr. Braithwaite has recommended would operate very largely to mitigate the evil ?—It would help.

7854. Speaking for myself now, I should desire, assuming the Committee hold the same views as in this Memorandum, to recommend as little legislation as will do ?—Quite so.

7855. (Mr. Evans.) How is the amount of the bond of the sureties fixed ?—May I put it very shortly; In certain cases, a man requires three sureties in £500 apiece; in certain other cases, two sureties of £300 apiece: those sureties are in existence for four years.

7856. What is it that regulates the amount for which you ask ?—The length of time that the man has been admitted to the Stock Exchange. If he has been a clerk in the Stock Exchange for four years, he only requires two sureties in £300; if he has not been, he requires three sureties in £500.

7857. What do you mean exactly by Stock Exchange securities ? You mean only stocks or shares which he may have as a broker or member of the Stock Exchange ?—Did I use the words "Stock Exchange securities" ?

7858. Assets, perhaps ?—The majority of the man's assets are differences which are to be paid to him by members of the Stock Exchange or by his clients.

3 July, 1907.

7859. (Mr. Peat.) If you find in the defaulter's books a record, say, of an investment in some shares or stocks, do you claim that ?—Do you mean that he is the owner of certain shares ?

7860. Yes ?—Yes, I should claim that, not as against the trustee in bankruptcy ; if bankruptcy ensued, I should have to refund that to the trustee in bankruptcy. That was the very case of this Ponsford Baker.

7861. Would you realise that asset and divide it amongst the Stock Exchange creditors ?—Amongst creditors on Stock Exchange transactions : not amongst the Stock Exchange creditors only.

7862. Amongst creditors on Stock Exchange transactions, you would so divide it ?—Yes.

7863. Then, assume the man had house property appearing on his books ?—I have never come across such a case—appearing on his books.

7864. Am I right in assuming that only the assets which you find in the defaulter's book are the assets with which you deal ?—No, I do not think that is quite so : he may have house property which he voluntarily disposes of and hands the proceeds to me. I know a case of a man in which he disposed of property to the value of something like £100,000.

7865. Supposing he does not disclose it to you ?—I do not know how I could find it out.

7866. Supposing you know of it and he does not voluntarily sell it and hand you the proceeds, but you know that it exists ?—I have never made any attempt to attach it.

7867. You have never made any attempt to attach it ?—No.

7868. The answer therefore is that only the assets which appear in the defaulter's book are the assets which you look after ?—Practically.

7869. (Chairman.) I suppose you attach his bank balance ?—I did : I cannot now for three months. May I add something to what I have said ? It occurs to me that my answer to Mr. Peat's question ought to have been : Had I known that the man possessed the land in question, assets outside, our remedy would be bankruptcy.

7870. (Mr. Evans.) You do not expect him to become a defaulter if he has outside property ?—That is not so : he may not be able to pay cash, but he may be able to realise his property and pay in a few days or months, but he has to pay spot cash—two days is all he is allowed.

Mr. Frederick Parker Rhodes, called; and Examined.

Mr. Frederick P. Rhodes.

3 July, 1907.

7871. (Chairman.) I think your private address is Finningley Park, near Bawtry ?—Yes.

7872. I think you are good enough to attend here at the request of several very important Associations ?—Yes, it is in consequence of the action taken by those bodies that I ventured to communicate with your Secretary : it was not of my own volition.

7873. I think these bodies are so important, that we should get them on our notes. The first is the Mining Association of Great Britain ?—Yes : I attend here at the request of that association, which represents the whole of the mining industry of the United Kingdom.

7874. Is it an association of mine-owners ?—Mine-owners, lessors, and lessees.

7875. (Mr. Evans.) Employers, that is what it comes to ?—More than employers ; lessors of mines as well as lessees.

7876. (Chairman.) Then the Private Waggon Owners' Association, what is that ?—That is an association which exists for the purpose of protecting the trade interests of owners and users of private railway wagons throughout the United Kingdom. There is another association with a somewhat similar name, which attends more particularly to matters of legislation affecting the trade. Our business is to watch the actual trade concerns of the members.

7877. I think you also attend on behalf of the City of London Coal Merchants ?—I do.

7878. Could you just describe to us what they are ?—The London Coal Merchants' Society is an association which was formed to protect the trade interests of merchants and dealers in coal in and around the City of London.

7879. Is it a large body ?—A very large body : it represents practically the coal trade of the Metropolis.

7880. Then, I think you also attend on behalf of the South Yorkshire Coal-Owners' Association ?—I do. The South Yorkshire Coal-Owners' Association is one which comprises practically the whole of the collieries in the large and important South Yorkshire coalfield.

7881. Personally I see you are Chairman of the Private Waggon Owners' Association and a member of the Executive and Parliamentary Committees of the Mining Association of Great Britain ?—I am.

7882. And you are also chairman of a large railway waggon-building company, and chairman of one of the largest South Yorkshire collieries, a director of and interested in others, Secretary of the South Yorkshire Coal-Owners' Association, and Registrar of the Rotherham County Court ?—I am. You will forgive my naming those things : it is merely to indicate the ability I may have to pretend to some knowledge of the subject I am talking about.

7883. So I may take it that your experience is exceedingly large in all departments of mining and manufacturing and transport ?—It is. I am by profession a solicitor, but my life has been mainly spent, particularly of late years, in mining and manufacturing matters, and I have really had very little time for any law for a long time past.

7884. I think you are thoroughly acquainted with the conditions under which our coal trade is carried on and the extent to which the system of hire-purchasing railway waggons is used ?—I am thoroughly acquainted with them.

7887. (Chairman.) Could you tell us what is the sort of business reason why this form of obtaining and ultimately purchasing waggons is adopted in lieu of the people borrowing the money and buying them out and out ?—You see it is bad business really to lock up unnecessary capital in a trading concern like a colliery. If you create it in the shape of shares, it is there for ever, and you cannot get rid of it ; if you create it in the shape of debentures, you have to give definite security for it, and you have to go through other formalities which are not desirable if you can avoid them ; but if you provide your waggons on the hire-purchase arrangement the waggons themselves over a period of seven or ten years will practically provide the money for their redemption, and it comes to a very large sum indeed in the case of a large pit. If you take our own concern, when we reach our full number of waggons, we shall be running 4,000 waggons. 4,000 waggons would mean at lower prices than rule to-day £250,000 locked up in that particular asset. It is very undesirable to have to provide that as a portion of your actual capital. It is very much better to provide it on the hire-purchase system and pay it off gradually over the seven or ten years. It also has this great advantage, that by this means you not only avoid overburdening yourself with capital in the first instance, but you create a most valuable reserve without feeling it, which can be drawn upon and converted into cash at any moment if you want it and which continually is so converted.

7888. Is the practice of obtaining waggons on hire-purchase agreements well known among the class of people who deal with colliery companies, and so forth ?—Universally known. To such an extent is it known, that no one would assume for one moment that a waggon with the name of the colliery on it belonged to the colliery without making inquiry.

7889. Do the waggons ever have on them the name of the company or person to whom they do belong, the owner ?—Always, and in a conspicuous position.

7890. Always ?—Where a waggon financing company is the true owner of the waggon and has let it out on purchase lease to the colliery company, the owner plate of the waggon financing company is fixed in a conspicuous position on the waggon where anybody can see it. They see in big letters the name of the Main Coal Company, or whatlower it is, on the side of the waggon and down below on the ever part of the waggon they see an iron plate indicating who the true owner of the waggon is.

7891. One of the matters that has been referred to us for consideration is whether hire-purchase agreements ought to be put upon the footing of bills of sale and made void or voidable if they are not registered. Could you tell us what is the view of the important bodies whom you represent upon that question ?—The bodies that I represent view any such proposal with the greatest possible alarm, and would be bound to resist it by every means in their power. They think that it would inflict most serious injury on their trade without any compensating advantage in return. If you take the case of the Waggon Company of which I am chairman, we are building waggons to the amount of about £200,000 per annum. Nearly the whole of those are dealt with on the hire-purchase system, but I am quite certain that if it was necessary to register those hire-purchase agreements as bills of sale the greater part of the traders who come to us and buy those wagons in that way would never do it. It may be a serious blow to a man's credit if he has to publish to the world that he is engaged in a transaction of that kind. It is not as if he was obtaining credit from the outside world on the strength of a position which he held out to be his when in truth it is not: he gives notice to the outside world that it is not.

7892. I think you have already told us in fact that the waggons pay for themselves as it were and become a reserve of capital. Do you find that there is any hardship upon creditors, supposing that a company that has got a large number of waggons in its use becomes insolvent? Do the creditors who have obtained judgments, or creditors in bankruptcy, suffer any hardship by reason of the waggons turning out to be on the hire purchase system, and being removed by the true owners ?—No, I have never come across any such case. Everybody really finds the state of things that they expect. There will in all probability be some waggons which have run out and become the property of the company, and there will be others under hire purchase.

7894. A considerable amount of evidence that has been addressed to us in support of the view that some class at any rate of hire purchase agreements should be registered, has been on behalf of what I may call without disrespect, county court creditors, who complain that when the high bailiff is sent to levy execution everything is swept away by the owners ?—My answer at once is, I speak only of my own district as I see it around me, that no prudent man would ever dream of giving credit to a working man on the strength of his household furniture without first making inquiry. These agreements are so on the increase that there is no doubt about it that the great majority of young people that get married do not provide an atom of furniture out of their own savings or anything, they get it all on the hire purchase system, and start housekeeping at once. As a rule a good deal of it tumbles in pieces before the end of the hire purchase agreement.

7895. Are they overcharged much ?—I think they are. I do not say they are overcharged in proportion to the risk, but there is no doubt about it that they are heavily over charged as compared with the true value of the articles that they get.

7896. I do not know if it is asking you too much, having regard to the combined experience that you have, but do you think there are any classes of hire purchase agreements that might usefully be made subject to registration. I am excluding those for the moment as to which you have principally come to tell us ?—I think myself that the advantage that may be gained by any registration of some of those agreements is much more than counterbalanced by the inconvenience that would arise with regard to others. I do not see myself how you are going to draw the line. You would find that the line of demarcation in the end was insufficient.

7897. (Mr. Evans.) In how long does a waggon pay for itself usually ?—In ordinary times it ought to clear itself out in from seven to ten years, and does, but if the railway companies go on as they are at present, I do not know how long it will take. They cannot deal with the stuff, and there are some of our waggons taking a month to do a journey they ought to do in three days.

7898. It depends on the work they ought to do ?—Yes, an ordinary waggon running in an ordinary manner, say a waggon working between the Midlands and London, ought to clear itself in seven or ten years, according to the trade.

7899. Then the waggon at the end of that time becomes the property of the company ?—Yes.

7900. There is nothing to distinguish to the outside creditor, unless he examines carefully the small ownership plate, the waggons which have become the property of the trading company, and those that are still subject to the hire purchase agreement ?—That is so, but he knows that the custom is so universal that if the waggons for one moment entered into the calculation that he was making as to his risk, he would make inquiries. As a matter of fact if it ever comes down to a calculation of whether the waggons were the colliery company's or not, I should say they were very unsafe people to deal with, and if it came to that point I would make the inquiry.

7901. Is it fair to ask you—if you do not care to answer you need not—what are the comparative prices of a waggon sold out and out to a trading company, and a waggon let out under a hire purchase agreement in seven years ?—Exactly the same, they are convertible terms. If a man comes to me and askes the price of a waggon, it is perfectly immaterial; he will sometimes ask, "How much will you build for ?" and he will sometimes put it the other way, "How much a year will it be ?" And each figure is worked out at once into a similar result in either direction.

7902. You deal chiefly with coal companies ?—Yes.

7903. Ordinarily speaking, your waggons in the ordinary course are waggons costing about £60 ?—I was giving the price not of to-day, or of the lowest time, I was giving a price that might be taken as an average price. The price of an ordinary coal waggon to-day would be £70, or a little over.

7904. Supposing it is £60, which is the average you have given, if a colliery company wanted to buy that waggon out and out, they would have to give £60 for it ?—Yes.

Mr. Frederick P. Rhodes.

3 July, 1907.

7905. They would not give any more for it if they hired it?—Not a bit. What they would do if they hired would be to pay exactly the same sum, £60, over the period, plus the interest which is calculated over the term.

7906. What the waggon company, or the company supplying the waggon, therefore gets is the interest upon the amount?—It gets its principal back again plus the interest.

7907. At what rate is the interest?—About 5½ per cent. at the present time. You must expect to pay rather more than the ordinary rate of interest because you are paying off the principal as well as paying the interest.

7908. What is the difficulty, if it be the fact, as no doubt it is, because you say so, that most people dealing with a trading company, a coal company in the case you have mentioned, assume that their waggons are on the hire system, in the way of registering? The registration would indicate to a creditor, for instance, what proportion of waggons would belong absolutely out and out to the trading company, and what would be subject to the hire purchase agreement?—The registration really would not convey to the creditor the information which he wants, and which he can only get by inquiring; but it would do this: It would advertise to the whole world that my company was giving a bill of sale; in other words, that I am raising money.

7909. What is the difference, if the world assumes already that that is the fact?—There is a very wide difference, I think, between people assuming that your waggons are not your own, and people knowing after you have had your waggons six or seven years if you want to raise money that you are raising £60,000 or £70,000 upon them, I should then immediately have to go and register that as a bill of sale. That would be fatal. I should do anything rather than that. At the present moment I have in my possession an asset which at any moment I can turn into cash; it is as liquid as Consols. If I wanted £50,000 on that kind of security, I could get it within a week.

7910. Would it be to the disadvantage of the colliery owners you represent, the lessors and the lessees, or to the disadvantage only of the companies trading in waggons, manufacturing waggons and hiring them out?—Both. It would be a very great disadvantage to the trade carried on by those who build the waggons, because at the present moment I can afford to take the lowest possible price for a waggon, because I never make a bad debt; I have no fear about it. You come to me for 100 waggons. I need make no inquiries as to status or ability to pay, or anything else. All I say is: "Who are you going to finance them with?" The North Central Company. Very well, I build them, and the North Central Company pay for them. I get the cash at once, and they are handed over to the customer.

7911. Going to the other region of the same subject, you must not assume that I am arguing one way or the other, I am only wanting to get information from you?—I am anxious to give you any information.

7912. Apparently your opinion is that it is a disadvantage to the community as a whole that young people should be able to hire all their furniture without practically anything to start life upon?—Yes; I think upon moral grounds it would be very much better if they had to bite the bridle to start with and save some money to buy furniture.

7913. Supposing it were possible to differentiate between the two classes of case you put, in your opinion would it be desirable to call for the registration of the ordinary hire purchase agreements of furniture?—It would not deal with my objection to the system at all, because your ordinary miner or ironworker would not care at all about registering his bill of sale; it would not affect his credit or his wife's. In those cases the real credit is given on the wage, and on the ability to enforce payment of the debt by judgment summons; but that is another difficulty.

7914. Do you think there ought to be compulsory registration in those cases or not?—No; I do not think it would confer any great advantage on the community one way or the other. It would assist, to some extent, those who have to realise assets whenever they have to be realised, but with that exception I do not think it would do any good one way or the other.

7915. In your experience, in your position as Registrar, do you find, if you have any knowledge of it at all, that in the case of hiring agreements the people who let out the furniture seize it before the end in most cases?—No; where I find cause of complaint with those agreements more, as a Registrar, is as to the loose way in which they are prepared, that they are not sufficiently precise and clear to protect, not the person who lets the goods, but the person who hires them; and in the class that I am speaking of, that is the person, I think, that wants protecting more than anyone else.

7916. In the result, do you find that the people who are the owners of the goods, hiring them out to others, seize the goods before the end so as to sweep the household of the worker of the goods before he has the chance of paying for them?—No, I cannot say that I have found many instances of that.

7917. Do they very often sue in the county court in such cases?—Yes, I have had a number of cases where actions have been brought for the amount due on them. As a matter of fact, having regard to the class of goods that they sell, when they have once really got a fairly substantial payment made on account, the last thing they want is to have the goods back again.

7918. That is what I was really driving at in the first place. Therefore the labourer has to pay a very large percentage more than he would have to pay cash if he had the cash?—Yes.

7919. In the next place, he is probably sued in the county court for the instalments after certain payments have been made, the result of which is (which I think ought to have been attended to long ago) that the poor man has to pay 30s. in the pound instead of 20s.?—The only thing is, when he comes before me he does not pay his instalments so fast as he would if he had been let alone. Whether other people do the same I do not know.

7920. With regard to the costs in the county court: hearing fee 2s. in the £, and 1s. in the £ when they come there and admit; what do you say?—Broadly I admit they pay an excessive price in the first place; and if proceedings supervene, then, of course, that excessive price is added to much further.

7921. They pay more than double, do they not?—I do not think you are putting it much too high.

7922. It is quite incidental here, but I have a very strong view that the fees in the county court ought to be reduced where the court is used as a debt-collecting court; many of the people have to pay certainly 28s. or 30s. for a sovereign?—I am not disposed to disagree.

7923. (Mr. Richardson.) Can you tell me how long the hire purchase system has been in vogue as regards railway waggons? When was it established?—It has been in vogue practically during nearly the whole of my active life.

7924. Not during the whole of it, you have experience before that time?—As far back as I can remember being intimately connected with the coal trade, it has been existing. It has been going on certainly over thirty years.

7925. I know myself it has been going on over that time; but so far as I myself remember it came largely into existence about thirty-five years ago?—Yes; but if you remember, there were one or two cases really which decided questions in connection with it; upon that it grew up.

7926. (Chairman.) Crawcour's case?—Yes.

7927. (Mr. Richardson.) And there was one at Lincoln. I should think it started about thirty years ago?—Yes.

7928. Can you also tell me what colliery owners did before, how they got their waggons before? Do you say there were never any trading waggons before that time?—The trade was very small then compared to what it is now.

7929. Do you think so?—Yes.

7930. It was considerable over thirty years ago, or fifty years ago, if it was half what it is to-day?—At that time it was not half. I can remember in South Yorkshire when the great bulk of the coal from Barnsley used to get away by canal, and when the steam coal of to-day, which is the most valuable article we have to sell, was often an absolute drug, and left in the pit.

7931. Forty years ago there was plenty of freight. Who provided the waggons in those days, the colliery ?—I could not tell you. I suppose they would do the best they could; but I am quite sure that acting on sound business principles, they would not provide their own money for it if they could help it.

7932. You do not know whether the colliery owners provided their own waggons, or whether the railway companies provided them for them ?—No, I do not. It was before my time; and I do not like to talk unless I know; I should be guessing.

7933. (Mr. Evans.) The original intention was, I believe, that everybody should be the owners of their own waggons. That was the policy of the Act ?—Yes; all the old Acts were on that basis. You were going to run your own waggons and take your own engines and run along.

7934. (Mr. Addison.) I only want to make this clear. Registration would, from your point of view, be misleading, because the colliery owner might have paid nearly the whole of the price of the waggon ?—Yes.

7935. You were speaking with regard to workmen that credit would not be given in view of the furniture in his house. In your district would that apply to small shopkeepers or lodging-house-keepers, if there are any ?—That is the class I am talking about more particularly. I do not think the small shop-keeper really gives credit on the strength of a man's furniture at all, he gives it more on the strength of his wages.

7936. I mean, supposing a small-shop keeper had furniture in his house, or a lodging-house-keeper had furniture in his lodging-house, or we will say a clerk, do you know whether in your district credit is given to the small trader or the lodging-house-keeper on the strength of that ?—I think in those cases it might be.

7937. (Sir Edward Fithian.) I think that one of the strong reasons that you urge in favour of the non-registering of these hiring agreements with regard to railway waggons is the fact that the owner's plate appears on every waggon ?—Yes.

7938. Do you know of any other kind of article in trade upon which similar notices appear indicating ownership ?—No, at the moment I do not.

7939. Then the case of railway waggons is quite different to any other hiring agreement case ?—To that extent, yes. There are one or two other things, locomotives.

7940. (Mr. Richardson.) And threshing machines ?—Yes, now you remind me there are those.

7941. (Chairman.) And gas engines ?—Yes.

7942. (Sir Edward Fithian.) Apart from those two or three classes that are now referred to, there is nothing to indicate with regard to a hire-purchase agreement who the owner of the goods really is ?—You mean the ordinary case of hire-purchase agreements of furniture, or anything of that kind ?

7943. Yes ?—That is so.

7944. Do you not think that is a matter of some difficulty to a trader who is asked to give credit to a man who has entered into one of these agreements; has he not a right to some information as to the status of the person asking for credit ?—My answer would be, if I were trading with a person under those conditions, I should ask. If his furniture was with me an essential element in the credit I was giving, I should ask.

7945. You would ask the person concerned ?—Yes.

7946. You think that could be done in trade ?—Yes, I do.

7947. The experience of traders, I think, is rather the reverse of that, and they want registration in order to get that information ?—The class of trader which you are speaking of, is, I presume, the same that Mr. Addison referred to.

7948. I mean the large trades as well ?—I would not say that in the larger trades. In the larger trades I do not think the ownership of that would enter into it at all. I should want to be very much more satisfied I was not going to make a bad debt in the larger trade.

Mr. Frederick P. Rhodes.

7949. We have had considerable evidence from chambers of commerce and trade protection societies strongly urging this as a necessary protection for their interests ?—I think, as far as they are concerned it would be a convenience, no doubt; but dealing with general trade, I think its importance is very much exaggerated. Take the case, for instance, of a man who comes and asks me to sell him 20,000 tons of coal over the next six months. I shall not conclude that sale and give him that credit on any relation to the fact of whether his furniture is his, or not; I shall want to be very much more certain that he is in a position to pay than any inquiry of that kind would find out before I give him credit. In other words, I should want to find out if he was a man of good repute and credit before I gave him that credit.

7950. Are you not aware that in Yorkshire there are factories where almost the whole of the looms are hired ?—I have no knowledge of the textile trade.

7951. May I suggest to you that there are such factories ?—Certainly.

7952. Then I ask, is not a person who is being asked to give credit to the occupier of that factory, entitled to have some information as to the status of the person who is in occupation, as to whether, for instance, he is the owner of these looms or not ?—I think the usual inquiries would usually elicit it.

7953. How is he to get to know ?—I should ask.

7954. To get that information is the very object of registration ?—Registration, of course, makes patent to the whole world what the state of things is. Of course, it may be an advantage or not, I cannot say. That is a matter for you gentlemen here who know much more about it than I do; but my point was that you cannot lay down a general rule which applies to the whole of a question of this kind without running the risk of greater disadvantages in one direction than you gain advantages in the other.

7955. Those are precisely the arguments that were used against the registration of bills of sale ?—Possibly.

7956. And the registration of deeds of arrangement, and Parliament in its wisdom has decided otherwise ?—I think that ordinary bills of sale and deeds of arrangements stand on a very different footing to the agreements which I have been talking about.

7957. (Chairman.) May I ask you one question quite apart from that. Perhaps you will tell me if you would rather not deal with it. Have you many administration orders in your County Court ?—Yes.

7958. Do you find on the whole the system works well ?—I find the system as a whole does work well, if it is watched and properly carried out, but my view is, and it is a very strong one, that the man who earns his living by the work of his hands, should not be in a worse position as a bankrupt than the man who earns his living by his brains or by his trade, and I say that the order that is made should be commensurate to the man's means, and that it should not be taken as assumed that the object of an administration order under the court, is to make him pay 20s. in the £ when he ought not to do it. What we do is this: I enquire into those cases when they come in order to save the time of the court afterwards. I have a good general knowledge of the wages that are earned in the district, and a man comes and wants leave to file an administration order and stay proceedings to enable him to do it. I say, "What are your wages." If he says he is getting 30s. a week, "how many children have you ? Are any of them working ? What is the amount of the debts ?" Then if I think he can pay 10s. in the £ by 6s. a month, or whatever it may be, he goes in and makes his application on that footing and the Judge deals with it, but I do not think that administration orders were ever intended, and I do not think they ought to be used, to compel a man in that state to keep that millstone round his neck and try to pay 20s. in the £ when he cannot do it. I say no one ought to have given him credit so that he has contracted debts which he was not in a position to pay—or more often his wife contracts them for him.

Mr. Frederick P. Rhodes.
3 July, 1907.

7959. (Mr. Evans.) In the majority of cases under administration orders in your district is the full amount payable? Is the only relief the debtor gets the spreading over for a certain time of the instalments?—No, the debtor does not pay 20s. in the £ unless his position and earnings are such that he ought to be able to pay it, and still leave enough for himself and his family to live upon.

7960. It is the fact, is it not, that it very seldom happens that less than 10s. in the £ is ordered to be paid by these instalments?—We have had orders for less than that amount.

7961. Are they exceptional or not?—Exceptional.

7962. Cases of illness probably?—Yes. When a man cannot pay, I would not grant an administration order. Of course, the circumstances vary in the different districts. In our district 30s. is no more for a man than £1 is in Worcestershire, or Gloucester, or any agricultural county. It will not go any further. The first thing a man has to do is to keep his wife, children, and family. If he has not got the means of doing that, and a surplus left over to pay an administration order, I say there ought not to be an administration order made.

7963. Do you find in many cases they are able to borrow the £10 necessary to become bankrupt so as to wipe off every debt at once?—It is the very rarest possible thing for that to occur.

7964. It is very common in South Wales?—What more often occurs in cases of difficulty is this, the man in the end if he is desperate takes the bull by the horns, lets an execution come in, then his furniture goes and he goes into lodgings and tells his creditors they can do as they like. If he does not do that, and he goes by the name of John Smith, he becomes John Brown and goes into another district and gets into another colliery.

7965. (Chairman.) Do you think the Treasury fees as to priority are a great disadvantage?—I am afraid I may be called to account with regard to that, but generally I agree very much with what fell from Mr. Evans. I think that the fees in the county court generally do press unduly hard on the suitors in it. Whether you are to take that into account and reduce the fees to a point where the courts cease to support themselves, and where Parliament has to find the money for them, I do not know; but there is no doubt about it that on the small sums of money they do tell hardly at present.

7966. (Mr. Evans.) I am merely speaking of it where it is a sort of debt collecting process only?—There is no use shutting ones eyes to it, it is as a huge debt collecting machine that the county courts exist at present.

FORTY-FOURTH DAY.

PRESENT:

MONTAGUE MUIR MACKENZIE Esq., (Chairman.)

JOSEPH ADDISON, Esq.
JOHN BARKER, Esq., M.P.
Sir EDWARD W. FITHIAN.
W. B. PEAT, Esq.
JOHN SMITH, Esq., C.B.

WALTER T. KAYE, Esq., (Secretary).

Mr. ATHELSTAN RENDALL, M.P., called; and Examined.

Mr. Athelstan Rendall, M.P.
17 July, 1907.

7967. (Chairman.) I think you live at the Knoll, Yeovil and you are Member of Parliament for the Thornbury Division of Gloucestershire?—Yes.

7968. I think you have had very considerable experience as a solicitor in Somersetshire and adjoining counties?—Yes.

7969. You are familiar consequently with county court procedure both in bankruptcy, and in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction?—Yes.

7970. The subject upon which we wish to trouble you is that of Administration Orders under Section 122 of the Bankruptcy Act?—May I before answering that question say that my experience is derived in rather an unusual manner, from being solicitor to five trading societies who number some 900 members. Therefore I have obtained more than the average amount of experience in regard to this particular matter.

7972. I suppose one may state the business effect of an Administration Order as being a sort of compulsory composition regulated and conducted by the court?—Yes.

7973. That the debtor is ordered to pay so much out of his wages; that is received by the county court, which first pays the Treasury fees, and then pays the rest of the dividends to the creditors?—Yes.

7974. That is about the fair effect of it, is it not?—Yes.

7975. I should very much like to have your general opinion as to whether you think the system is a good one?—It certainly is, subject to certain alterations of the law which are necessary, in my opinion.

7976. Would you kindly state what alterations you would recommend as the result of your experience?—First of all, though it is hardly germane, I would suggest that the amendment of Lord Ashbourne's County Court Bill, which provides for two practising solicitors being added to the Rule Committee of County Court Judges, is absolutely necessary before we shall be able to get our profession adequately represented. At present that Rule Committee consists of five County Court Judges only.

7977. I believe that steps have been taken to add another solicitor to the Rule Committee of the Judges which ultimately approves those rules?—I am not quite clear as to what the facts are, but I am under the impression that at present five County Court Judges make the rules which govern the county courts.

7978. And then they are approved by the Rule Committee of the Supreme Court?—I think so.

7979. (Mr. Addison.) That is so.

7980. (Witness.) The rule is that they are to be approved by the Lord Chancellor, I think.

7981. (Mr. Addison.) They were brought before the Rule Committee when I was present.

7983. (Chairman.) Then that would be that the Judge should make the order upon the hearing of the creditors' opposition if necessary?—Yes. Of course he now does that. He now makes an order after hearing the creditors, but as things are now, since the alteration of the rule in 1902, it is not worth while for any of the creditors to attend the Court, or, at least, it is hardly worth while. The outside that a creditor may do is to get the order per month slightly increased; but I have found in my own practice that you cannot get creditors to go miles to local county courts. Before going to the county court perhaps they will spend much time in making inquiries about the debtor's means, his wife's income, his children's income, and also the debtor's habits, as to whether he is thrifty, or drunken and so forth; the creditors will not take all that trouble if when they get to the Court practically their evidence is not of much result in the decision which the Judge makes. In my experience they practically abandon it. I find, if my assistant solicitors ask creditors to come to the county courts for that purpose, the answer is that it is not worth while, and the result is that they will not come. That is the first suggestion I make; that the old power should be restored to creditors which I do not think worked harshly in the long run. It very occasionally did, but, with a good Judge and with power to the judge to adjourn the hearing so as to enable the debtor to call further evidence, I do not think it ought to be at all harsh. Then the third suggestion I make is that an alteration of the law as laid down in this case last year of Pearson v. Wilcock is most necessary.

7984. The effect of that case is that subsequent creditors have to come in under an administration order of which they know nothing, is it not?—Yes; and further, are deferred as to payment entirely until all the old creditors have been paid in full under the order. In time past it has been the usual rule, if you want to sue a debtor and you suspect there is an administration order, for you to see if your creditor is included in the list. If he is not included you always sued without the smallest fear as to what the result would be. You would get judgment and an order of so much per month acording to the debtor's means But since this case has been decided there is really no reason for suing a debtor at all if there is an administration order against him.

7985. It is simply money thrown away?—Yes

7987. Just as they would be if it had been a composition under the Bankruptcy Act?—Exactly. Mr. Athelstan Rendall, M.P. 17 July, 1907

7988. What was the next point upon which you wished to give evidence?—I would suggest that the order made by the County Court Judge should automatically cease to exist if the debtor falls into arrear, with his instalments for a certain time; and I would suggest three months in arrear. Further, I would suggest that it should cease to exist upon proof that the debtor has contracted a fresh debt of over £1 without giving notice to his creditors that he had an administration order, in order to bring the law somewhat into line with the Bankruptcy Law, such as you are aware imposes a penalty of imprisonment if the ordinary bankrupt gets credit for over £20 without giving notice to his proposed creditors I am not sure that there should not be some criminal penalties attaching to the administration order man more or less on the scale of those which are attached to the bankrupt who obtains credit for a sum over £20. At present, it is the custom in all county courts, so far as my experience goes, for the county court clerk to be made the collector; he has the carriage of the order, and it is his duty, therefore, when he finds debtors in arrear, to issue judgment summonses in order to have the debtor brought before the Judge. Although in one sense the county court clerk is specially well fitted for that work, yet, of course, as he gets a commission for his work, he is somewhat interested in advising debtors to apply for administration orders. Therefore, some creditors may think that the debtor has a permanently paid friend in every Court, who, as far as the commission is worth having, (and I suppose over a large number of cases at 5 per cent., which I believe is the actual commission, it is worth having) is more inclined to be in favour of an application than perhaps he would be if it meant only a little more trouble and no return. Then there is this point; debtors often make these applications for administration orders, and will submit to terms in the order which it is perfectly obvious to the solicitor conducting the case against them, and to others in the Court and ought to be to the Judge, that he cannot hope to comply with. He may have 15s. a week, and he may make an offer of 15s. in the £ at the rate of 10s. a month. Very likely he has to make that large offer per month or in the £ in order that the whole sum shall be paid within six years, and, if he does not make a very considerable offer, the Judge will have to say: "The offer which you make will not enable you to pay the money in six years, and I am precluded by law from making the Order." That being so, the debtor increases the offer, and the order is made; but the debtor at the time he increases his offer knows that he will not be able to comply with it; and what he does is: he relies upon the fact that later on he will be in arrear, that the county court clerk who has the conduct of the matter will probably issue a judgment summons, that he will then come before the county court, he will prove lack of means, and the original order will be reduced, or will be made more in consonance with his means. Very likely, as soon as the order is altered, it will be tantamount to the six years, which he ought by law to pay in, becoming twelve or eighteen years; and of course in that time the creditors lose entire interest in the matter, and the order is made valueless to everybody except the debtor. There is another point which is not quite clear in my mind. I do not know whether the Committee have looked into the matter at all. The point is as to whether if a man gets an administration, his debts being £49, and afterwards other debts make the sum total scheduled against him over £50, that, ipso facto, makes the administration order bad. So far as I can make out that is not the effect; and, if that is not the effect, you have a further and a very great encouragement given by the law to the debtor. If he increases his debts another £100 in the next six months, of course the order may be rescinded; but, if it is not rescinded, the whole £100 goes on to the original administration order; and he is safe for that new £100 of debt if he pays 2s. or 3s. in the £ at the rate of 5s. a month, if those were the terms of the original order.

7989. There are two matters upon these orders which are not embraced in the memorandum which you were good enough to send to me, and upon which I should like to know your opinion. Do you think that, with these amendments which you have suggested, it would be just to raise the limit to £100? One or two learned County Court Judges have said before this Committee that they would; while some have said that they would not. I think the Committee would value your opinion upon that question?—I am perfectly certain all traders would very much dislike the smallest increase in the amount. I said just now that I had no objection to administration orders if these alterations were made; but I think it would be much better if a smaller bankruptcy fee could be charged and they could be cleared of the whole thing.

7990. That was exactly the next thing I was going to ask you. In relation to administration orders, do you think the system by which the first payments go in discharge of the Treasury fees is one which ought to be continued, or, ought the Treasury fees to come pari passu with the creditors?—Having regard to the enormous amount of fees which the Treasury gets out of the county courts every year, I think the Treasury can probably better afford to come second in regard to county court fees than anyone else. The fees, I think, amount to over 25 per cent. of the amount recovered.

7991. And are paid first?—I was talking at the moment of the county court fees generally.

7992. Then I gather from what you have just said that you would be in favour of reducing the bankruptcy initial fee in small cases?—Yes, I think there ought to be a scale in regard to that. One is often in great difficulties in finding £10 in regard to a fairly honest debtor who may owe £60 or £70 and not be able to pay it through some misfortune; and he has no remedy if he cannot find the £10. I think he is in an extremely poor position as compared with a man who owes £45, or rather who may be dishonest enough to say he owes only £45.

7993. (Mr. Smith.) Have you any idea of what you would suggest as a reduced bankruptcy fee or reduced scale, or how you would regulate the scale?—I think it ought to be an ad valorem fee; that seems to me to be reasonable.

7994. But the bankruptcy fee at present is charged at the commencement of the business and before it is known what the assets or liabilities will be?—That is true; but I think that should be dealt with in this way: a man on filing his petition ought to make some declaration as to what his total indebtedness is.

7995. That would apply to debtors' petitions, but not to creditors' petitions, which are the great majority of cases?—In regard to a creditor's petition, I do not think when a creditor files a petition he minds the cost so much.

7996. Would you have a smaller initial fee fixed, and a percentage charged afterwards?—I think that would be much more satisfactory than the present system, undoubtedly.

7998. The fee of £5 does tend to put a limit on debtors who have no assets?—Yes; on, I should say, a very small percentage. The only difficulty I see which you are raising is in regard to a creditor's petition, but in regard to that I would have a stated fee for a creditor's petition in addition to any ad valorem scale which the creditor could bring himself under by making himself a statement that he believed the debtor's debts were under a certain sum.

7999. Do you see any objection to continuing the present fee and giving a rebate afterwards out of the assets if there are assets?—Yes, because it is the initial fee which is the difficulty and I do not believe it is a safeguard to trade. I think the kind of case you mention is very rare.

8000. But you see there is a difficulty in dealing with the matter?—Yes, but I do not think it is at all insurmountable.

8001. I should be very glad if I saw my way to a practical scale?—First of all make an ad valorem scale in regard to all petitions, and make it payable on the statement which is affirmed or declared by the debtor. On a creditor filing a petition let him make a statement as to what he believes the debtor's means to be.

8002. That he could not do?—He might or might not, but in that case I think the alternative would be that he would have to pay a stated fee—10 guineas if you like—or any fee; when the creditors are filing a petition they are not frightened by the cost, as a rule.

8003. Your suggestion comes to this, that in the case of a debtor's petition the fee should be reduced?—Yes.

8004. You said, I think, that you proposed an administration order should be set aside if a new debt was created, or that there should be a power to set it aside?—Yes. At present the law is that it may be set aside if he incurs a debt of over £2.

8005. Do you propose to reduce that limit?—Not necessarily.

8006. What is your suggestion?—If he incurred a debt of over £2 my suggestion is that, upon proof being afforded in the county court where the order is made, the order should automatically cease and be dead. It should be done on, I think, an application by the creditor, or by any creditor with, of course, notice to the debtor.

8007. I suppose that suggestion is based upon the assumption that the debtor who is under an administration order shall not be allowed to trade on credit?—Exactly.

8008. Practically it comes to that?—Yes. At present there is no penalty meted out to a debtor who makes new debts. I think if there were it would make him much more careful.

8009. Of course you qualify that by saying that a debt over £2 must be incurred without giving notice of his position?—I am not altogether sure that that qualification is the right one. Bankruptcy is different; that clears a man more or less, but an administration order does not clear him, but leaves him with very considerable liability.

8010. I want to bring it out clearly. Was your suggestion that the order shall cease or that it leaves power to the Court to set aside the order?—I do not think I should leave power to the Court to do it. It should automatically cease.

8011. Upon proof?—Yes, upon proof that he had obtained £2 fresh credit.

8012. Some formal step would have to be taken to set it aside?—I think it should be done in order; otherwise it would not be fair to the debtor.

8013. You propose to restore the rule by which a majority in number and value could oppose the making of the administration order?—Yes.

8014. Do you not think in many cases that would work injuriously. Is it not stated in your memorandum that the number of cases of creditors opposing greatly increases under that rule?—I think that was so, but I think it was on good ground. The opposition as a rule was based not upon a desire entirely to prevent the order being made but upon the desire to make the order made a fair and reasonable one.

8015. You think orders as at present made are not quite so satisfactory as they ought to be?—I do not think they are at all satisfactory.

8016. Are they made for too small sums?—Much too small sums. The judge is in a very difficult position. With the best intentions he, of course, sees a debtor for the first time in his life. You have ten or twelve creditors who have been calling in their village round, or town round, for five or seven years, and who have known this debtor thoroughly and know all his circumstances; what money he has had left him, and what life insurance companies he has insured in.

8017. And a very nominal order is very often made?—Yes.

8018. Would you not reserve some power to the court to overrule the action of a money-lending creditor, say, who wanted his pound of flesh unreasonably?—Personally, I have found this new rule work very adversely to traders.

8019. You cannot suggest anything better than a return to the old rule?—I would not mind throwing on creditors the necessity of getting three-fourths in number and value instead of a majority of number and value. If one refuses that proposal it seems one can only do it on the ground that the ordinary trader is not an honest and reasonable man.

8020. Would it not be simpler to leave it to the discretion of the court, and to rather indicate the grounds upon which that discretion is to be exercised ?—That involves, of course, knowing what the grounds would be before one gives an assent to that.

8021. I cannot see how you are going to prevent the harsh and unconscionable creditor from exercising his right tyranically, if you repeal the rule ?—The judge addresses the creditors at present, and advises them they ought to accept this, that, or the other. In the old days before the rule was altered he rarely made a suggestion which was not fallen in with.

8022. You have made a reference to the county court clerks on the subject of commission. Do you know if the commission is paid at present to the registrar, or any county court clerk or officials ?—As a matter of fact, my experience lies in country districts, and the judges before whom I practice give the conduct to the county court clerk by name.

8023. How is he paid ? He is paid by commission upon the amount he recovers. I cannot swear to the fact, but I have had conversations with the county court clerks, and I have no doubt that is so.

8024. (Mr. Peat.) The matter was stated by a previous witness.

8025. (Chairman.) Yes.

8026. (Mr. Smith.) It is under the control of the county court judge ?—Yes. In the old days he named any creditor whom one liked to suggest as the person to have the conduct of the Order in their district. Later on it was found to be better to have the county court clerk as he issued the necessary judgment summonses, and so on.

8027. Do you think it advisable that a county court clerk should have a personal interest in the amount recovered ?—It helps to get the money recovered, but I do not like him being interested in advising the debtor when he comes into the county court office that he had better make an application for an administration order. That is the position at present.

Mr. Athelstan Rendall, M.P.
17 July, 1907.

8028. But he is in that position, is he not ?—He should not be interested in giving advice. The county court official ought to be entirely unprejudiced.

8029. If he gets 5 per cent. upon the amount collected he would have a personal interest, would he not ?—Yes, that is why I object to it.

8030. How do you propose to alter that arrangement ?—I think he mus do the work for nothing as part of the registrar's duty. I think the registrar ought to have the conduct and ought to do the work, and not be paid extra for it.

8032. On every plaint he gets so much, I think. Do you think that works satisfactorily ?—County courts exist mainly, of course, to issue summonses ; but when it comes to a rather delicate question as between creditors and debtors it seems to me the county court ought not to have an interest in advising creditors to do something which is against the interest of the debtor, or vice versa. That is really what I want to arrive at.

8033. Have you any idea what proportion of the receipts under these Orders goes into the pockets of the creditors and what proportion goes in expenses ?—The expenses are regulated by table. I do not think they are very heavy.

8034. You do not know of any complaints in regard to the question of expenditure ?—No.

Mr. William S. Hayes, called, and Examined

8035. (Chairman.) I think you are the President of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland ?—I am.

8036. And you have been a solicitor of the Supreme Court of Judicature, Ireland, since 1884 ?—Yes.

8037. And you are a member of the firm of Hayes & Sons, solicitors, Dublin ?—Yes.

8038. I think you have had, besides your other experience, experience of the Irish bankruptcy practice ?—I have.

8039. I believe we may take it that the views which you can express to us here are those of the council of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland ?—Yes.

8040. As you are aware, no doubt, this committee as at present constituted is engaged in inquiring into complaints and defects in the administration of bankruptcy law in England, but we are very anxious, as we have had evidence as to bankruptcy laws in other countries, to obtain information as to the administration of the courts in Ireland with a view of seeing whether they differ and in what respects their administration is more successful or less successful than ours. Would you mind telling us first of all what the courts which have bankruptcy jurisdiction in Ireland are which correspond to our High Court and County Court ?—There are two courts. There is one court sitting in Dublin which is a part of the High Court of Justice. It is what I may call the Bankruptcy Court, and it is styled the Court of Bankruptcy. It is presided over by a High Court Judge who attends not exclusively to the business, but who is also engaged in other work in the Common Law Division. He attends twice a week in the Bankruptcy Court in Dublin during the sittings, and practically during the vacations also for the administration of bankruptcy law in Dublin. In 1888 there were local courts established in Belfast and in Cork. They are presided over by the recorders of Belfast and Cork. These courts have co-ordinate jurisdiction with the High Court, or with the Court of Bankruptcy in Dublin in the cases allotted to them, but, of course, they can only deal with cases arising out of the counties over which the recorders have control.

8041. Are those counties the county of Cork and the county in which Belfast is situated ?—No. With regard to Cork there is only the county of Cork, but in Belfast there are, I think, the counties of Antrim, Down and Armagh.

Mr. William S. Hayes.
17 July, 1907.

8042. Except those local jurisdictions of Irish bankruptcy, wherever the debtor is situate he has to come into Dublin ?—Yes. If he wishes to come into the Dublin Court, although he may be within the jurisdiction of the local court, he can still come within the Dublin Court or a creditor may proceed against him in Dublin. It is optional.

8043. I think the main Irish Bankruptcy Act is the Act of 1857 ?—Yes, the Act of 1857 as amended by the Act of 1872.

8044. I mean subject to certain small incidents, such as the one which you have mentioned, and such as the Acts which are common to England and Ireland, like the Preferential Payments Act and the Deeds of Arrangement Act, the two main Acts are the Acts of 1857 and 1872 ?—Yes. Then there is, of course, the Debtors Act of 1872 also.

8045. That rather resembles the English Debtors Act, does it not ?—Yes.

8046. Can proceedings be transferred from a local Court of Bankruptcy and vice versa ?—Yes.

8047. Is that a proceeding that frequently happens ?—No ; generally, in whichever court the proceedings are commenced they continue. It is very seldom there is any application brought to transfer from one to the other.

8048. Could you tell us what are the proceedings by which the debtors can effect arrangements with their creditors without the estate going into bankruptcy ?—Yes, there are three modes. The first one is a private arrangement outside the court altogether, not subject to any control of the court. The second and most frequently resorted to is a private arrangement under the control of the court. The third one is an assignment in trust to a trustee to realise for the benefit of creditors.

17 July, 1907.

8049. And bankruptcy itself ?—Of course, a debtor may apply to have himself adjudicated bankrupt, but bankruptcies are more frequent at the suit of a creditor.

8050. Dealing with the first one, private arrangement outside the court, that, I suppose, is not a matter regulated by statute at all ?—No, that is simply a matter of contract between the debtor and his creditors.

8051. What is the usual procedure ?—The procedure is to circularise all the creditors to attend a meeting at the office of the solicitor, or of the accountant, who has prepared a statement of affairs. The debtor attends this meeting, and he is subject to examination by any of the creditors who wish to ask him questions. His books are also open to inspection, and usually a very searching inquiry takes place, because the meeting is presided over by a creditor, and not by any official, and there is no restriction as to whether a creditor is represented by a solicitor or not. In some cases he is represented by a solicitor, and in other cases not; so that they have every opportunity of inquiring into the state of affairs. Then a resolution is proposed, the solicitor for the debtor usually throwing out his suggestion as to what the debtor is prepared to offer. That is discussed, and in some cases a resolution is passed. If a resolution is passed in favour of the debtor's proposition, a circular is sent out to the creditors who have not attended with a form of consent, and, if you can get a unanimous consent, you can embody that in the form of a deed. The form of consent usually authorises the debtor's solicitor to sign the deed, and then the solicitor or accountant sends out cash, if it is a cash dividend, or bills, if it is a dividend payable by bills. But this form of arrangement is entirely a matter of contract.

8052. Is that kind of arrangement common in trade and commercial circles ?—I cannot say it is very common where there are a large number of creditors, because you can easily understand it is almost impossible to get the unanimous consent of creditors where there are a large number. Someone would hold out in the hope, possibly, of being paid off rather than allow an arrangement to fall through.

8053. And he might present a petition in bankruptcy, if he was not dealt with ?—Yes, he could present a petition. I am not speaking of an assignment in trust for the benefit of creditors which would be an act of bankruptcy. The calling of this meeting in Ireland, and getting consent and executing a deed, would not be an act of bankruptcy. because the debtor would not assign his property. Take the most ordinary case: a debtor's offer, say, would be to pay 7s. 6d. in the £ by three instalments payable over three, six, and nine months, the last probably secured not only by his own bill, but by the bill of some friend. In that case there would be no assignment of his property to secure that bill at all. It would be simply a contract between the debtor and his creditors, and really by the creditors also amongst themselves that they would be satisfied with 7s. 6d. in the £ payable in that way, and there would be no assignment of property, and therefore it would not be an act of bankruptcy.

8054. (Mr. Smith.) Your observations at present are confined to that alone ?—Yes.

8055. (Chairman.) Now you mentioned as the second class arrangements which are under the control of the court ?—Yes. These are by far the most frequent, because when a debtor obtains protection from the court, any execution creditor cannot enforce his writ of execution through the sheriff or by any other means. All other proceedings are stayed until the creditors have an opportunity of going into the state of his affairs. Shall I explain the procedure ?

8056. Yes, please, because that is new to us ?—An affidavit has to be sworn by the debtor setting out all his assets and where they are, the total amount of all his debts, and particulars as to the causes of his failure; in fact, such information as will enable the Judge to decide whether he is really entitled to the protection of the Court. He then signs a formal petition which is filed, and then that brings the matter within the jurisdiction of the court. The judge then, or, in the case of his absence or in the event of urgency, one of the registrars or chief clerk (I will designate them all as registrars, whatever be their official position), grants protection, and notice is then served on any creditors who may have taken proceedings by action at law. This order then has the effect of stopping these proceedings. The next step is, within two days, to file in the bills of sale office an affidavit which is largely a repetition of the statements in the affidavit on which protection is granted, but in addition to that it has to schedule the creditors, giving their names and addresses. A statement of affairs is then prepared by an accountant, or by a solicitor, in a very small case, setting out all the assets and liabilities. Then a preliminary meeting, of which four days' notice has to be given to every creditor, is held at the solicitor's office, very much like the meeting I referred to in the event of private arrangements outside. This meeting I look upon as a most important matter, because there again, if the case is one in which there is a suggestion of fraud, or any irregularity, the parties can be all represented by their solicitors, or they can attend themselves. The chair is taken usually by the largest creditor, unless by chance, such creditor be a family creditor, in which case he would not be selected. The creditors present select the chairman. The statement of affairs is discussed item by item, and the debtor is questioned as to any items in the statement which require explanation. This preliminary meeting has to be held under rules of court; it is obligatory. At the meeting it is usual, but not necessary, to indicate what the debtor's offer will be, and it is discussed and often increased at the suggestion of creditors present, who intimate, if modified, it would be agreeable to them. Very often, also, family creditors will, at this meeting, be induced to withdraw their claims altogether, or, if not to withdraw them, to postpone their claims as against trade creditors. In other cases where a debtor has wealthy relatives they often come to the assistance of the debtor, and agree to supplement the offer. I have frequently had cases of that kind. Take, for instance, a stockbroker failing, whose assets might have been reduced to a very small sum. In that class of case, relatives very often come to assist with sums. The reason I take a broker is because probably he is likely to have from his standing some wealthy relatives who will be anxious to assist. But in ordinary trade cases it is not at all unusual for family debts to be postponed in order to better secure payment of dividend to the trade creditors. The next step is to send out notice of the sitting which will be held before the court, and in this notice the offer, of course, which is to be submitted must be set out in detail. The creditors get ten days' notice of this sitting, and they then can either attend at the sitting before the judge themselves, or they can employ solicitors. As a rule the creditors ascertain amongst themselves who is opposing, and the proofs are sent to one solicitor representing the opposing creditors, at the sitting before the Court. In order to carry the debtor's proposal or scheme, it is necessary that three-fifths in number and value should vote in favour of it, but it does not at all follow, that, even if the debtor has the three-fifths, the judge will pass the offer. I have frequently known cases in which the judge has absolutely declined to pass the offer on the ground that it is unreasonable, or one that should not be carried out under the jurisdiction of the court. One could recite many instances. Take the case of a trader getting goods and then selling them out of the ordinary course, or where there have been preferential payments made, and the matter should be inquired into in bankruptcy; the judge will not stand in the way of opposing creditors even though they be in the minority. It is open at the first sitting to the debtor to modify his proposal to meet the wishes of opposing creditors, and it is not at all an uncommon practice; frequently something is pointed out, and the judge will throw out an expression that in his opinion the demand is not unreasonable, and the debtor falls in with the suggestion and the proposal is amended. Then a second sitting has also to be held at which the resolution passed at the first sitting has to be confirmed, with a majority also of three-fifths in number and value, very much like the procedure under the Companies Act, with the exception that you require the three-fifths at the second sitting instead of a bare majority

8057. Then what happens after the second sitting ?—After the second sitting, assuming the proposal has been carried, then the official assignee practically takes charge of the remainder of the arrangement. A list of creditors is prepared by him, and if the composition offered by the arranging debtor be a cash one he has to lodge the cash with the official assignee who distributes it among the creditors. If, on the other hand, the proposal be one whereby there will be bills partly secured or otherwise, he distributes the Bills, and that practically terminates the matter.

8058. After the confirmation of the resolution is the debtor free from debt; has he what is equivalent to a discharge?—He is free from his debts. The minority are bound by the Order of the court founded upon the votes of a majority of three-fifths in number and value. Later on, if any question arises as to whether he has carried out his arrangement, he applies for his certificate, and he has to vouch the payment of the cash composition if it be a cash one, or of the bills as the case may be, and then he gets his certificate certifying that the proposal or scheme has been complied with. If he leaves any creditor out of the list of debts, such creditor is not bound. In an action brought by a creditor against a debtor who has carried one of these arrangements, it is necessary to plead that he has given the notices required by the Act.

8059. Is there any machinery for rescinding the resolutions and turning the case into bankruptcy, supposing that the arrangement has not been properly carried out or improperly obtained?—There would be if you showed it was by fraud or concealment.

8060. But if the arrangement is to give bills, and the bills are not met, does that remit the creditors to their original rights?—It remits the creditors to their original rights. They can either take proceedings at law, or they can petition in bankruptcy. I should mention also that if during the course of the arrangement the judge is not satisfied with the reasonableness of the proposal, he has power, on the application of a creditor but without any further petition, simply to turn the case into bankruptcy, and on that very day the official assignee goes into possession, or the Judge can dismiss the petition for arrangement which is an act of bankruptcy.

8061. Does this procedure work well?—I think it works admirably. There are a number of cases dealt with in that way. The free discussion in the first instance at the preliminary meeting is a very important item. Then also if you get three-fifths in number and value of creditors to approve a scheme it is very likely to be a proper one, and certainly the minority are protected by the discretion which the Judge has of refusing to sanction a proposal if he considers it is not one which should be carried out under the control of the Court.

8062. Do the particular incidents of bankruptcy law which augment an estate, such as setting aside a fraudulent preference, or gathering in property which is in the reputed ownership of the bankrupt, or setting aside voluntary settlements, apply to these arrangements?—No. These are all private arrangements where you take the assets as you find them. Of course, one of the great advantages is that a debtor can very often pay a much larger dividend than he could possibly pay in bankruptcy, because his friends, more or less, flock round him, and the family withdraw proofs with the object of allowing him to pay a larger dividend, where they would not assist him once he goes into bankruptcy. His name is not published in the papers, nor are the proceedings, and the proceedings are all private. Of course the order confirming the arrangement has to be registered in the Bills of Sale Office.

8063. Are they usually copied into the trade papers?—Yes.

8064. I see you have been kind enough to give us statistics. Will you explain them?—In 1904 there were 130 petitions for arrangements in Dublin and 186 in 1905. In 1904, there were thirty-seven in Belfast and forty-three in 1905. In Cork, in 1904, there were seventeen, and fourteen in 1905. The next figures I give indicate cases where offers were made which were not satisfactory, and therefore went into bankruptcy. In 1904, there were twenty-one of such cases out of 130 in Dublin and in 1905 there were thirty out of 186. The figures in Belfast are four in 1904 and seven in 1905. In Cork seven in 1904 and four in 1905.

8066. What is the usual procedure in those cases?—Usually it is adopted where there is one large creditor who wishes to take the administration of affairs into his own hands. Take, for instance, the case of a large wholesale draper who may have given pretty large credit far beyond any other creditor. He finds a debtor is unable to meet his payments and he sends down some firm of accountants to look into affairs and, finding they must be wound up and wishing to keep control himself, insists upon a trust deed being executed. This method is not frequently adopted by debtors voluntarily because it is an act of bankruptcy, and also there is no way of being assured that all the creditors will join and sign the deed. Any creditor whose debt is £40 and upwards can apply to have the debtor adjudicated on the ground of it being an act of bankruptcy. It meets a particular class of case where the creditors wish to wind up without any control and to realise an estate rapidly where there are no intricacies.

8067. Are these trust deeds common?—I think they are more common in Belfast than in any other part of the country. They are also resorted to in Dublin, but not in a number of cases. There is generally some very good reason for adopting them.

8068. Here the laws of the two countries resemble each other. Do you consider it would be desirable to leave them as they are?—I think that you require some method whereby creditors wishing to keep matters entirely in their own hands and under their own control should be enabled to do so quite apart from officialism of any kind, because there may be cases in which there can be a very rapid realisation and distribution under the control of the creditors.

8069. Lastly comes bankruptcy pure and simple. As I understand there are in Ireland two official assignees of the Court of Bankruptcy?—Yes. Mr. MacConkey and Mr. McEntire.

8070. They are officials in Dublin?—Yes.

8071. Now the initiation of a bankruptcy is, as in England, by petition, is it not?—Yes, by petition. Any creditor whose debt amounts to £40 and upwards can adjudicate on proof of an act of bankruptcy and a debt of £40 and upwards.

8072. It is not limited to traders?—There are some acts of bankruptcy which apply alone to traders.

8073. But any person, if he commits an act of bankruptcy, can be adjudicated?—Yes.

8074. After the adjudication is made does the estate become assigned to one of the official assignees?—It becomes ipso facto vested in the two official assignees with the exception of leaseholds which he has to elect whether he will take or not. Otherwise all the assets become vested in the two official assignees until the creditors' assignee is appointed. On the day of the adjudication the official assignee sends one of the messengers of the court down and he goes into possession and takes complete control of the estate.

8075. Then there are public sittings appointed, are there not?—Two public sittings are appointed, at the first of which the creditors' assignee is chosen by the creditors on the votes of the creditors, but subject to the approval of the Judge that he is a fit and proper person and has no conflicting interest. On his appointment, the estate then vests in him together with the two official assignees. The creditors' assignee is consulted on all matters in regard to the acceptance of tenders, and generally on any important matter arising out of the administration of the estate; but the two official assignees are the persons actively engaged in the realisation of the estates.

8077. But the official assignees have the whole carriage of the proceedings, as I understand?—They have the whole carriage of the proceedings under the direction of the Court. If there is any matter as to which they require direction, it comes before the Judge, who makes an order, such as an order for sale, or the acceptance of a tender, or to disclaim onerous contracts and matters of that kind.

8078. What is the second public sitting for ?—That is supposed to be the final examination of the bankrupt. I say "supposed" because it is very seldom that he is in a position to pass his final examination, which is invariably postponed until his estate has been realised fully; it is generally adjourned sine die.

8079. What kind of examination is there of the debtor, as regards his conduct or anything like that ?—In important cases, or rather, where there are matters which require investigation, he is examined very closely indeed, usually by either solicitor or counsel. In more important cases still, other witnesses who are likely to give evidence on any matter, supposing there has been fraud or preferential payments, are called; persons who had received payment would be examined; if there is a removal of goods the persons who had assisted in the removal of the goods or are supposed to have any of the bankrupt's property are examined. In other cases where the creditors' assignee or the official assignees do not know of any irregularity, there is no examination at all; the bankrupt attends the court, but he is not examined at all.

8080. Then are proofs of debt and so forth made before the officials of the Court ?—Yes, before one of the registrars or the chief clerk; proofs have to be filed in any case where there is any doubt. Where the ordinary account with detailed items is sent in, a proof may not be required; but a list is compiled partly from the Statement of Affairs by the bankrupt, and partly from the proofs sent in.

8081. During the bankruptcy can the bankrupt bring forward a proposal for an arrangement or a composition, and so get his bankruptcy annulled ?—Yes, it is open to a debtor to take out a composition meeting before the Judge, and then he can offer some scheme or proposal just the same as if it were a private arrangement such as I have explained before. Then a similar majority of creditors is required; and it is also open to the Judge to take exception at the instance of a minority of the creditors; even where the creditors almost to a man wish the composition to go through, it is open to the Judge, if even only one creditor opposes and shows good cause, not to sanction the proposal. At the same time the vote of the creditors naturally has great weight with the Judge in the matter.

8082. You have been good enough to give us a list of the offences which are punishable in bankruptcy; I have been through them so as not to occupy you too long. So far as I can make out, they are very much the same as they are under the Bankruptcy Acts and Debtors Acts in England ?—I think they are much the same; they are under the Debtors (Ireland) Act, 1872.

8083. Now I want to ask you about a matter which has been very much before this Committee: where it appears that the debtor has not kept any proper books of account, is there anything which makes that punishable in any way in Ireland ?—There is no way in which it can be made punishable; except that in a case where the Judge comes to the conclusion that the bankrupt was competent to keep books, and that the nature of his business was such that he ought to keep books, the Judge could refuse to grant a certificate. Take the case I have alluded to before of a stock-broker; that is a case where it would be absolutely impossible to carry on the business without books. Or, take a trader carrying on a commercial business in a large way. But there is a large number of cases in Ireland in which the bankrupt would not be fitted at all to keep books; and it would certainly be very harsh if that were made a criminal offence.

8084. You think that the society which you represent would not view favourably an alteration of the law to that effect ?—I do not think they would; it would be almost unworkable. Take some of the traders in the country, such as a potato merchant who knows how to buy and sell potatoes, but who would never know how to keep books unless in a most elementary way. Then there is the difficulty of discriminating in cases where a man can keep books or cannot. The withholding of a certificate is to a certain degree a punishment, although it is not a criminal offence.

8085. Are speculation, gambling, and trading with knowledge of insolvency on the same footing ?—They are on the same footing; they are elements with regard to the refusal of a certificate.

8086. Is prosecution for an offence, such as those you have tabulated, instituted by order of the Judge, as it is here ?—Yes, usually it is instituted by order of the Judge.

8087. Whose duty is it to carry it out ?—The official assignee prosecutes.

8088. Does the Crown solicitor act ?—The Crown solicitor will take up any proper case; but the initial steps are in the Bankruptcy Court, where an offence is ascertained.

8089. Do you think that any of these offences might with advantage be made punishable summarily before a magistrate, without going before a jury ?—I think it would be very hard to discriminate between the offences.

8090. For the purpose of getting a certificate of discharge, does the debtor apply for it, if he wishes it ?—Yes, he applies if he wishes to obtain a certificate; it is on his application that it is either granted or refused; the matter is not gone into unless he applies.

8091. Then, as to the conditions on which a certificate is granted or refused, what have you to tell us ?—That is regulated by Section 56 of the Act of 1872, which provides that a certificate shall not be granted unless it is proved in bankruptcy that a dividend of not less than 10s. in the £ has been paid out of the bankrupt's property, or that the failure to pay 10s. in the £ has arisen out of circumstances for which he cannot be justly held responsible. Then, the Court may suspend or withhold the granting of a certificate if a prosecution has been commenced, or if in the Court's opinion full disclosure has not been made, or if he has made default.

8093. Does he make any report to the Court, or does he simply bring the facts viva voce before the Court ?—There is a report. When the debtor serves notice of his application, the official assignee makes up a report for the Court setting out any matter of importance which has arisen in the realisation of the estate, or any irregularities which occur to him.

8094. Then, I understand, such matters as not keeping books or trading with knowledge of insolvency would be taken into account ?—Yes they are all elements to be taken into account.

8095. Then, I see, the effect of a certificate as regards certain excepted debts is very much the same as in England; and we need not trouble you on that. Lastly, as to the status of an uncertified bankrupt and after-acquired property, is the state of the law such that, unless the bankrupt gets a certificate, all after-acquired property vests in the official assignee ?—Yes; that is by Section 267 of the Act of 1857; all his property and effects, present and future, wherever the same are, vest in the official assignee.

8096. Is there any provision protecting persons who deal with an uncertificated bankrupt ?—None, except the ordinary methods adopted by commercial men of inquiry through trade agencies.

8097. I mean, the law does not protect them ?—No.

8098. Does after-acquired real estate vest in the assignee? —Yes, of an uncertificated bankrupt; that is by the next section, Section 268 of the same Act.

8099. Are you at all troubled in Ireland with the undischarged bankrupt ?—Very little indeed; I do not think it is similar to England at all. It is very seldom that a man can get credit simply by changing his trade name, or doing something of that kind.

8100. Or trading in the name of his wife ?—We have very little of it indeed.

8101. The last matter I want to trouble you with is this: Can a married woman be made bankrupt ?—Yes; the law is the same as in England; it is the same Act; she can be made bankrupt if trading separately from her husband. But the cases where she is trading with her husband in Ir and are so few, that they are not worth considering; it is only when she is trading separately.

8102. (Mr. Barker.) In Ireland are bankrupts very keen in getting their certificates?—No, they are not. Take a case where a man has failed from unforeseen misfortune and wishes to trade again, he will apply; but in the great number of cases a man is so much down the hill when he becomes bankrupt that he has no chance of trading again, and he does not come before the Court again.

8103. He does not trouble about a certificate very much?—No; and the creditors do not trouble, of course, because the expense comes out of their assets.

8104. You were speaking of the fact of a merchant selling potatoes. Would he have a banking account in the ordinary way?—He might. In fact, anyone who is carrying on business can afford a banking account in Ireland. There is no charge for keeping a banking account.

8105. You speak of a man in quite a small way of business?—Not a very small way.

8106. We will take a grocer for instance?—A grocer would be almost certain to have a banking account.

8107. And I suppose a draper would?—Almost certain.

8108. But a potato man would not?—He would if he were in a large enough way of business.

8109. I am speaking of quite a small man. You think the larger businesses ought to have a proper set of books I suppose?—Of course, personally, I think anyone in trade ought to have.

8110. Where does the hardship come in with regard to a man keeping books and knowing exactly his position before all the world?—The great difficulty in Ireland I fear would be that a larger number of the smaller class of traders could not do it.

8111. Small village shopkeepers, I suppose you mean?—Yes, that would comprise a large number of traders in Ireland.

8112. You think it would be very hard on them to keep books?—I think it would. The principal book they keep is this. They jot down particulars of goods sold so that they know from whom to collect the debts.

8113. And that you think is necessary?—I do.

8114. With regard to the goods coming in, you do not think it is necessary to keep any account of goods bought; it is only for goods sold?—I do not think 50 per cent. of them keep any account of goods coming in—only the invoices.

8115. Do you find the three-fifths majority works very well?—Admirably. I do not know of any hardship to creditors or debtors where that applies.

8116. (Mr. Peat.) Do you think it would be more difficult for a small trader to keep an account of his purchases than to keep an account of his sales?—Probably it would not be more difficult. The reason he keeps the other accounts, of course, is that he cannot remember what he has sold unless he jots it down. It is a mere jotting down, and they do not keep ledger accounts in many cases.

8117. But is it not necessary for him to remember to whom he owes money as well as by whom money is owing to him?—In theory certainly, but in practice I do not think you could educate a large number of village shopkeepers to keep a set of books.

8118. I do not suggest a set of books. Let me put it as an account of receipts and payments first of all: an account of purchases and an account of sales?—I do not believe you would get 50 per cent. to balance an ordinary cash account of receipts and payments. I am taking, of course, the small towns as well as the large. If you take Dublin, Belfast, Cork or Limerick, in towns like these, certainly all the principal shopkeepers not only could do it, but in a great many cases do keep a cash book. But a very large number look upon their bank book as their cash book. They take money from the till when it is required. If a traveller comes along, and they have the money, they will pay either by cheque or out of the till.

8119. I think you misunderstand me. If a man has sufficient education to keep an account of what is owing to him, has he not also sufficient education to keep an account of what is owing by him? I am not putting the question to you from the point of view of saying an illiterate man must keep books, but from the point of view of saying here is a literate man who can, but does not, keep books. Should he not be required to keep them? I do not mean what you call a set of books, but an elementary statement of an account of his receipts and payments—of what is owing to him, and what is owing by him?—Yes, I follow precisely what you mean. There should be no reason why he ought not to be able to jot down goods coming in and the price of them, just the same as goods going out.

17 July, 1907.

8120. That is the whole story, I think?—There is no reason why, if he has sufficient intelligence to do one, he should not be able to do the other.

8121. Probably you would think it desirable that he should do so?—I think if he has the ability to he certainly ought to.

8122. Now, dealing with the arrangements under the control of the Court, you mentioned that in some cases the Court does not favour such proposals. By that I conclude you mean proposals for the assignment of the estate, apart from composition?—Quite so. Supposing a debtor is going out of trade altogether, and does not intend to open in business again, he wants to have his estate realised without the publicity of bankruptcy. He can bring in his proposal to vest all his assets with any exceptions such as furniture if he wishes and indicates them in the proposal. He can vest his estate in the Official Assignees for realisation and distribution amongst his creditors. That is in effect a bankruptcy without publicity and the Judge on the opposition of a minority certainly will not sanction such a proposal.

8123. The Court would not sanction it on the opposition of a minority apart from any other consideration?—The minority would have to show some reasonable ground.

8124. May I say that such a reasonable ground would include the insufficiency of a proposition; that is to say, that the man was excluding his furniture when he ought not to exclude it?—That certainly would be an element too. He would give way in that case. He would only get a small proportion of his furniture, but if there were irregular payments such as preferences or anything to be inquired into, or the case which you have cited yourself of a man who ought to have kept books and has not, there will be inquiries made as to what has become of his assets. That would be an element.

8125. Then I can conclude the assignment and vesting of an estate in a trustee, if carried by a sufficient majority, would be upset only if there were such irregularities as you have mentioned?—That is so.

8126. I observed you mentioned a majority of three-fifths at the first sitting before the Court. What is your proxy system at such a meeting?—When sending out the notice of the meeting at which the proposal will be submitted for the consideration of the court, at the same time proofs of debt are usually enclosed, and at the foot of the proof of debt is a proxy authorising the solicitor for the debtor to vote in favour of the offer. If a creditor wishes to oppose, he strikes out the name of the solicitor for the debtor, and he sends his proof of debt and proxy, either to a body of opposing creditors, or to his own solicitor to go and vote, but it is not absolutely necessary to send out the proofs. The practice has cropped up in the hope that, if you are acting for the debtor, you will get a number of them back. If a proof of debt has not been sent out with a proxy at the foot, the creditor fills up the ordinary form of debt, swearing so much is due to him and he signs the proxy for his own solicitor or some other creditor to vote for him.

8127. Is the proxy in favour of a particular class of procedure, or is it a general proxy?—It is an open proxy to vote at any meeting or adjournment.

8128. To vote at any meeting or adjournment for any purpose whatever?—Yes.

8129. Now assume a case under this particular branch of your law comes forward, and a composition is offered of, as I think you instanced, 7s. 6d.?—Yes.

8130. Assume 7s. 6d. and that that is suffi ient. It is an offer of the value of the assets or perhaps more than the assets, but the debtor has not kept proper books, or he has given fraudulent preferences by which I mean not exactly the word fraud, but a preference unjustifiable which may be fraudulent or not and which is an illegal matter, or that he has been speculating ; are those grounds in themselves sufficient to upset this arrangement ?—The instances which you have mentioned would be all elements to be taken into consideration by the judge. If the minority bring it before the judge, and he thinks these are matters which should be looked into, he has full power not to sanction the proposal.

17 July, 1907.

8131. He is not compelled to refuse his sanction in such cases ?—No, he has a wide discretion. I think the words are : "Not fit and proper to be carried out."

8132. He has a wide discretion, but no compulsion ?—That is so.

8133. (Mr. Addison.) The two processes, one the arrangement outside the court and one the arrangement under the Court are practically compositions are they not ?—They are.

8134. Have you any scheme by which without an assignment there is any supervision over the debtor's estate in the meantime until those compositions are paid, or is he left in control ?—He is left in control unless it is part of the resolution that some step is to be taken in the event of his breaking down in paying the composition. In some cases then it gives the assignee power to go into possession.

8135. But the schemes are composition schemes ?—Yes, pure and simple.

8136. They are not what we know in England as supervision, winding up his estate under a committee ?—No, there is no supervision. He trades throughout unrestricted.

8137. With regard to a trust deed of assignment outside the court, that I see is an act of bankruptcy for six months ?—Yes.

8138. Does not that entail a good deal of difficulty in getting in debts and realising assets. The trustee cannot make a title for six months ?—He cannot very well distribute the estate.

8139. He cannot make a title ?—No, he cannot, because there is an act of bankruptcy.

8140. Is the trust deed a proceeding very rarely resorted to ?—It is principally resorted to when there is one large creditor wishing to keep control absolutely in his own hands, but it is not adopted to anything like the same extent as the private arrangement system.

8141. In practice do you find the six months act of bankruptcy works much trouble ?—If there is going to be adjudication on the act of bankruptcy, it generally takes place within the first fortnight, and a hostile creditor having an act of bankruptcy, adjudicates. I have seldom known of an adjudication after four or five months, but, as you point out, the estate is tied up for six months.

8142. That six months with advantage might be shortened to two months, might it not ?—Yes.

8143. There is one point on which your practice differs from ours and I am desirous to know about it ; that is that proof of debt by affidavit is not always required. You said it was so in simple cases such as goods sold or simple accounts ?—Yes ; if the assignee, on comparing it with the bankrupt's books, found it corresponded he would not put the creditor to the expense of making a proof of debt.

8144. Could a man vote for the creditors' assignee without proving the debt by affidavit ?—He could not. To give a proxy it is absolutely essential that there must be a proof of debt by affidavit, sworn before a Justice of the Peace or a Commissioner.

8145. But subject to that, which protects the meeting, as it were, in the sense that it secures creditors of a certain status, creditors may be admitted in bankruptcy where the debts are simple without putting them to the trouble of proof ?—In bankruptcy, a creditor need only file a proof of debt when required by the official assignee or officer of the Court.

8146. (Mr. Smith.) Are you generally familiar with the procedure in the English bankruptcy system ?—No, I am not. I cannot contrast the two ; I always employ an English solicitor, if necessary.

8147. I want to ask you a question upon the three classes of administration. First of all, with regard to the trust deed, it is under the control of the Court. I understand you may have two classes of private arrangements ; either a composition or an assignment for the benefit of the creditors ?—Under the control of the Court ?

8148. No, I am speaking now outside the control of the Court ?—Yes.

8149. You may have either ?—Yes.

8150. In both cases I suppose the creditors require to be unanimous. They would not bind a non-assenting creditor ?—No, they would not.

8151. Do you find any inconvenience resulting from that system. Is there any general complaint with regard to the action of the outside minorities ?—No, I do not think there is any very general complaint because the arrangement under the control of the court is always adopted where there is likely to be any dissent.

8152. Of course both these classes of arrangement are subject to the Deeds of Arrangement Act, as in England ?—Yes and must be registered.

8153. And they are not very common. Have you any idea of the proportion they bear ?—They are not very common. The other class of arrangement is more frequently resorted to.

8154. But compositions without being under the control of the Court are, I suppose, comparatively numerous ?—No, they are not, because, wherever unanimity is required, they are not very common. They really only apply to a class of case where there are few creditors or where there are a few very large creditors and some small creditors and the large ones consent to the small ones being paid.

8155. It is only a small proportion of the insolvencies in Ireland which go under that procedure ?—Yes, it is.

8156. With regard to those under the control of the court I understand there that a certain majority can bind the general body of creditors if approved by the Court ?—Yes, three-fifths.

8157. And there is ample material for investigating the debtor's affairs ?—Ample, because he must attend three meetings. He attends in the solicitor's office, or accountant's office, in the first instance, where there is a very informal and very searching enquiry about any matter.

8158. Would the creditor have the right to look into his books and make enquiry in that manner ?—Yes ; they are put on the table and he has his own accountant or solicitor there. It is at that meeting the real work is done and material obtained to bring before the court afterwards in opposition to the offer.

8159. No arrangement can be carried through either for the appointment of a trustee, or the appointment of an assignee, without such an investigation ?—No ; that meeting is first of all held by all the creditors, and then, afterwards, at the first sitting before the Court, the debtor must attend and has to undergo a searching examination in regard to any points arising.

8160. In your printed memorandum you say, I think, in reference to these matters, that you understood that there was no similar procedure in England ?—I do not think there is any similar procedure in Engand.

8161. You were not aware that under the Bankruptcy Law the creditors and the debtor can enter into any arrangement, either for a composition, or a winding up of the estate, without bankruptcy ?—I do not know anything about the details of the English Bankruptcy Laws.

8162. But, if that is so, and the creditors are allowed at the first meeting to enter into an arrangement, subject to the approval of the court, without an order of adjudication, would not that be the same thing as the Irish law ?—I think not at all, because, after all, as I understand the matter, that presupposes a bankruptcy or some kind of receiving order.

8163. No, a receiving order ?—In our case there is no Receiving Order ; there is no one interfering.

8164. That is a point of difference ?—He trades just the same as if nothing had happened before. He does not lose all his credit with those with whom he is dealing, and in that way friends will come to his assistance far oftener.

8165. But still a petition must have been presented in court ?—A petition is presented, but it is only a formal matter.

8166. Is it advertised ?—No.

8167. It is kept private ?—Yes. Even in the daily law lists it is put: "In the matter of a petition for arrangement," and then follows the name of the solicitor and not the debtor.

8168. Is it not advertised in the Gazette ?—No.

8169. So that it does not come to the knowledge of the public ?—It does not come to the knowledge of the public, but, at the same time, through the trade journals, it comes to the knowledge of those who read the trade journals if they are looking after their business.

8170. There are means of obtaining information, and certain publications take it out and publish it for the use of the trade ?—Yes, there are means for the purposes of the trade to find out through the ordinary channels, or by searching in the courts. At the same time a man's private friends may know nothing about the details, except that there is an arrangement.

8171. There is another difference, of course, in that the English law requires a public examination of the debtor in all cases before this arrangement is carried out ?—At the first sitting he is bound to attend.

8172. Is that a private examination ?—Yes, a private examination in which his evidence can be taken down in shorthand and filed.

8174. Then with regard to bankruptcy procedure, there is no uniform system, I understand, for public examination of the debtor. Is that so ?—There is always a public sitting. There are two public sittings, but it does not follow that the bankrupt will be asked any questions at them. If there is nothing to inquire into he is not asked any question.

8175. Who determines whether there shall be investigation or not ?—The official assignee almost invariably. Then, of course, if a creditor, or the creditor's assignee, knows of any thing requiring inquiry, he writes to the official assignee.

8176. So that if the official assignee and creditors are satisfied of all the facts already, that would not be brought out in open court ?—No. In 50 per cent. of cases the bankrupts never go into the box.

8177. I understood you to express the opinion that the law worked very satisfactorily. Is that the general opinion of the commercial community throughout Ireland, including Belfast, which is a large separate community ?—I have not heard of any complaints amongst my own clients. In Belfast they very often vest the estate in trustees as well.

8178. The only other question I should like to ask you is a very wide one. Do you think there is much commercial fraud in Ireland ?—I do not know whether it is invidious to contrast it with elsewhere, but that is the only way to answer it. I think as compared with other places there is very little.

BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENT COMMITTEE.

QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COMMITTEE FOR CONSIDERATION AND REPORT, WITH REPLIES THERETO OF THE CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.

1. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the Courts having Bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor, and the imposition on him of punishment or disabilities, should be amended or provision be made that the conduct of such a debtor should in every case be brought before the Court for consideration, whether he applies for a discharge in his bankruptcy or not.

BARNSLEY.—It is evident from statistics that a very large proportion of adjudicated bankrupts never apply for their discharge at all, and probably never intend to do so. These men wander about the country to the danger of traders, and form the material, for the most part, which subsequently causes traders the trouble in the case of after-acquired property mentioned in Question 5. It is evident that this is a very real danger from the following facts :—Since 1887 there have been 4,398 bankruptcies annually, but on an average only 681 discharged, so in that period alone, some 63,000 debtors have either not applied for their discharge or, applying, have been refused.

Mr. Gibson, the Official Receiver of Manchester and Salford, suggests a periodical examination of every case, making it compulsory for the debtor to apply for his discharge. It has been suggested that once a year is a good period, and where a debtor will not apply, the permanent officials should ensure, in the interests of the community, that the debtor is made "legally incapable of acquiring property and giving a title thereto."

(See also answer to Question No. 2, post, page 356).

BIRMINGHAM.—Having regard to the very large number of undischarged bankrupts in the country, it should be compulsory for every bankrupt to notify his present address and occupation to the County Court at the conclusion of every period of six months from his adjudication as a bankrupt, and to apply for his discharge within a period of two years of the bankruptcy; and where merely technical offences have been committed, to do away with suspension of discharge and make a monetary penalty to the extent of so much in the £, by way of judgment, such penalty to be payable by instalments to be fixed by the Court.

BLACKBURN.—We do not agree with the suggestion of the Birmingham Chamber, which, in effect, would cause undischarged bankrupts for a period to have to report themselves every six months almost like prisoners on ticket of leave.

BRISTOL.—See observations on page 374 relating to "Bankrupt's discharge."

BRADFORD.—See answer to Question No. 2 (post).

BRIGHOUSE.—That the Courts should in all cases have greater power of inflicting punishment or disabilities at their discretion, if not satisfied with a debtor's conduct within a reasonable period both before and after his insolvency, etc.

CLECKHEATON.—We are of opinion that the law should be amended ; that the conduct of every bankrupt (but not that of other insolvent debtors) should be brought before the Court for consideration, whether he applies for his discharge or not.

COVENTRY.—The chamber is of opinion that every bankrupt (as distinguished from a debtor under a voluntary arrangement or composition) should be brought before the Court, whether he applies for his discharge or not, and that the Official Receiver should (as soon as possible after the public examination and while the facts are fresh in his mind) make a report upon the bankrupt's conduct generally, and especially as to whether he has kept proper books of account (that is, such books as may be necessary in his particular business to a clear understanding of his operations), and as to whether he has carried on his business fairly, and without negligence, recklessness or fraud.

CROYDON.—In the opinion of this chamber no amendment is necessary.

DERBY.—The question of discharge should a form necessary part of all bankruptcy proceedings, and as so small a proportion of the persons adjudicated bankrupt ever make an application for discharge, the Official Receiver should be required, within a limited period of the public examination, to bring before the Court a report of the debtor's conduct relative to his affairs, that the Court may either grant his discharge or impose such penalties as may be deemed expedient.

HALIFAX.—The Chamber is of opinion that every bankrupt (as distinguished from a debtor under a voluntary arrangement or a composition) should be brought before the Court, whether he applies for his discharge or not ; and that the Official Receiver should (as soon as possible after the public examination, and while the facts are fresh in his mind) make a report upon the bankrupt's conduct generally, and especially as to whether he has kept proper books of account (that is such books as may be necessary in his particular business to a clear understanding of his operations) and as to whether he has carried on his business fairly, and without negligence, recklessness, or fraud.

HULL.—The council are of opinion that the statement of his affairs and the conduct of the debtor should be reviewed by the Court whether he applies for his discharge or not, and this should be done before the Trustee receives his discharge from the Board of Trade.

LEEDS.—No answer.

LIVERPOOL.—The committee consider that the defect at present in the public examination is that the Official Receiver is not required to report immediately as to his opinion of the manner in which the bankrupt has passed through his public examination, and the fact of the examination being declared "closed" is of little practical advantage to anyone (save that until it is closed the bankrupt cannot apply for his discharge). The report of the Official Receiver on the public examination and the conduct of the bankrupt is not brought forward until the stage of application for discharge is reached, and it may not be brought forward at all if the bankrupt does not apply for discharge.

The Official Receiver's observations are issued before the public examination takes place, and unless creditors attend the public examination (which as a rule they do not) they have no idea of how the bankrupt has passed through the ordeal. It is admitted that if the Official Receiver does not feel satisfied with the public examination he may oppose (or the creditors may oppose) the closing, or apply to have the public examination adjourned sine die. The Court seems to be averse to keeping a public examination open indefinitely except for very good reasons ; therefore most examinations are closed. Creditors have a vague idea in such cases that all has been found in order, and when they hear the Official Receiver's report on an application for discharge they are, if present in the Court, for the first time informed of an unsatisfactory public examination. The powers of investigation by Official Receiver or Trustee are ample, and they both have power to apply to the Court for direction and orders.

Some members of the committee consider that in all cases where a bankrupt has committed any misdemeanour under the Bankruptcy Acts or Part 2 of the Debtors Act, 1869, the Court should have power to deal with the offence and commit the offender to prison on the evidence before it, thus doing away with the necessity for an expensive prosecution under the Debtors Act or other Acts.

LONDON.—Provision should be made for rendering it obligatory on every bankrupt to apply for his discharge as soon as his public examination is concluded. This amendment could be easily effected by requiring the Court when ordering the close of an examination, to fix, by the same order, a date upon which the bankrupt shall apply for his discharge. The conduct of the bankrupt shall be reported upon to the Court by the Official Receiver and also by the Trustee, the latter to report more especially upon the conduct of the bankrupt during the course of the bankruptcy proceedings and immediately prior to receiving order. In cases where the public examination is adjourned sine die owing to the failure of the bankrupt to attend for examination or otherwise, it should be the duty of the Official Receiver and the Trustee at the expiration of six months from the date of the adjudication to draw up the prescribed reports on all matters which have come to their knowledge by an examination of the bankrupt's books and papers, or otherwise touching the conduct and affairs of the bankrupt in the same manner as if the bankrupt had applied for his discharge, and they were required to make the statutory reports upon such application. These reports would be submitted to the Court and then filed to remain on record. Where the Court is not in a position to fix a day for the discharge owing to the non-attendance of the bankrupt for examination, or any other reason, provision should be made for the Official Receiver applying at the expiration of six months from the adjudication for the appointment of a day for the purpose, at which the Reports of the Official Receiver and Trustee shall be read to the Court. If such reports indicate a prima facie case of fraud, the Court should direct a prosecution of the bankrupt and issue the necessary warrant for his arrest or extradition as a matter of course. It should also be obligatory upon the Official Receiver to report to the Board of Trade any offences committed by the bankrupt which, by the Debtors' Act or the Bankruptcy Acts, are made punishable by imprisonment, and thereupon the Board of Trade should institute criminal proceedings against the bankrupt, if they are of opinion there is a reasonable probability of a conviction. In all cases where the bankrupt absconds, the Official Receiver should apply for a warrant of arrest directly the petition is filed without waiting for an adjudication or the appointment of a Trustee.

LUTON—The defects of the present Act in the opinion of this chamber are as follows :—

A bankrupt, after the conclusion of his public examination, may make application for his discharge, and this is set down for hearing. The Official Receiver then files a report on the application, and on this report the Judge deals with the matter. When no application for discharge is made no report is presented to the Court with reference to the debtor's conduct.

In the 22nd Annual Report of the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy it is stated that "there appears to be a slow and steady decline in the desire of bankrupts to obtain their discharge."

The number of adjudications under the Bankruptcy Act has been 89,583, the number of applications for discharge 19,136 only.

This state of things means a continued increase in the number of undischarged bankrupts.

Of this number a considerable proportion do not re-engage in business but take situations. Many, of course, are dead, but the remainder do undoubtedly engage in trade, some in their own names, more frequently in the name of the wife or other relative, and even in the name of employees.

This state of things results in many evils, not the least being the unfortunate position of creditors in a subsequent failure.

That the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, under which it is an offence to obtain credit for more than £20 without disclosing the fact that the debtor is an undischarged bankrupt, do not afford adequate protection is evidenced by the small number of prosecutions. This provision is not sufficiently enforced to render it of any substantial value as an inducement to bankrupts to apply for their discharge.

Under the present Act there does not appear to be sufficient power of discrimination conferred upon the Court in suspending discharges according to the "facts" found in the bankruptcy.

If the assets are not equal to 10s. in the £, subject to the qualifications of the clause, the discharge is suspended for two years; if to this is added failure to keep proper books, continuing to trade with knowledge of insolvency, contracting debts without reasonable or probable expectation of being able to pay them, the experience seems to be that the discharge is suspended for this period only. The fact that a fixed minimum period was provided for by Statute has led to the Judges in most cases regarding this as the full ordinary penalty.

On proof of other facts, or if the case is a bad one, suspension for three or four years takes place, but these are few.

It would appear that under the circumstances if the suspension for the first fact is reasonable the suspension for the others is inadequate.

As to Amendments.

This chamber would suggest the course indicated by the Associated Chambers of Commerce, the resolutions set out in their memorandums being passed on the motion of this chamber as follows :—

> "That it is desirable to supplement the present system of applications for discharge in bankruptcy by providing that the Official Receiver in England and the Accountant in Bankruptcy in Scotland shall within six months, or within such extended time as the Court shall allow after the public examination, present a report as to the debtor's conduct relative to his affairs, and that if after such report it be proved that the debtor has been guilty of misconduct, the Court be empowered to inflict such summary punishment and impose such disabilities as may be deemed expedient."

The proposal therefore is that in every bankruptcy at the expiration of six months, or such extended time from the date of the conclusion of the public examination, the Official Receiver in England or the Accountant in Bankruptcy in Scotland should present a report to the Court on practically the same lines as he now makes where an application for discharge is made, and that upon the filing of the report the matter should be set down by the Registrar of the Court for hearing. Notice of the hearing having been served upon the bankrupt (and it should be compulsory on every undischarged bankrupt to report every change of address to the Official Receiver) the matter comes before the Judge, when all parties can be heard.

The powers of the Judge in Bankruptcy should be extended so that the Court may be able to inflict such punishment and impose such disabilities as may be deemed expedient, having regard to the facts and offences found in the bankruptcy.

MANCHESTER.—The Board wish to draw attention to the large and increasing number of bankrupts who do not apply for their discharge. Many of these undischarged bankrupts contrive to recommence business, and in the opinion of the Board form a serious danger to the trading community. Although it is a misdemeanour for an undischarged bankrupt to obtain credit from any one creditor to the extent of £20 without disclosing his bankruptcy, a prosecution does not afford satisfaction to the creditor. Further, it is useless in most cases for the creditor to institute bankruptcy proceedings, as the assets of the bankrupt would probably be successfully claimed by the trustee in the first bankruptcy. The Board consider further legislation is urgently needed with regard to this matter, and such legislation it appears to the Board may take the direction of compelling a bankrupt to apply for his discharge, and facilitating the application for and the obtaining of a discharge by the honest but unfortunate debtor.

The Board make the following suggestions :—

1. That an undischarged bankrupt should be prohibited from engaging in trade.

2. That the minimum suspension of discharge on the ground that the assets are not equal to 10s. in the £ should be reduced to one year.

3. That the fees on an application for discharge should be abolished.

4. That if a bankrupt does not apply for his discharge within, say, a year of the close of his examination, the Court should itself appoint a day and consider whether the discharge should be granted or no. An alternative procedure would be to provide that if a bankrupt does not apply for his discharge within a limited time, he shall be liable to committal for contempt of Court, and it should be made the duty of the Official Receiver or some other person to apply for such committal.

5. That where a discharge is refused a fresh application be not entertained for a year, except by leave of the Court on special grounds.

PORTSMOUTH.—No answer.

READING.—The present system of a private examination by the Official Receiver followed by a public examination of the bankrupt should be adhered to, but the examination should be made more searching and stringent, and the debtor's conduct should also in every case be taken into consideration and reported upon.

SHEFFIELD.—See answer to Question No 2 (post page 358).

SOUTH OF SCOTLAND.—In Scotland, the powers of investigation of the Trustee and creditors into the conduct of a bankrupt are very wide, and it is not thought that they could be very much enlarged. In the case of fraudulent conduct on the part of the bankrupt, the trustee's duty is to report to the Public Prosecutor, who will undertake the criminal prosecution.

It is thought that the French law whereby a trader who continues in business, knowing that he is insolvent, can be criminally prosecuted, should be adopted in this country.

TORQUAY.—In the opinion of this chamber the resolutions of the Executive Council of the Association of Chambers of Commerce embodied in the Memorandum prepared by Sir Edward Fithian for submission to the Board of Trade, would constitute desirable amendments in the law with respect to discharges in bankruptcy.

WAKEFIELD.—The chamber heartily supports the criticisms and suggestions made in the statement prepared by the Secretary of the Association of Chambers of Commerce and forwarded to the Board of Trade.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—Yes.

WORCESTER.—In the opinion of this chamber, the provisions of the present law for investigation of the conduct of a debtor and for the imposition upon him of punishment or disabilities are adequate and satisfactory. All cases of real misconduct can be properly probed and punished, and if there is any default in judicious severity it will be found to arise rather from the administration than the provisions of the law. At the same time your committee remember that the Bankruptcy Laws are primarily framed for the relief rather than the punishment of insolvent traders, and consider that, while a proper scrutiny should be made into the conduct of debtors and penalties be awarded when deserved, yet these laws would fail in their object and lose their utility if either their provisions or administration should become even slightly tinged with vindictiveness.

2. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the discharge of a bankrupt and the conditions on which such a discharge should be granted, refused, or suspended, should be made more stringent, so as more effectually to check improper and reckless trading and the neglect by traders to keep proper books and accounts, or be otherwise altered or modified.

BARNSLEY.—The Associated Chambers have a resolution standing as follows: "That it is desirable to supplement the present system of applications for discharge in bankruptcy, by providing that the Official Receiver in England, and the Accountant in Bankruptcy in Scotland, shall, within six months or within such extended time as the Court shall allow, after the public examination, present a report as to the debtor's conduct relative to his affairs, and if after such report it be proved that the debtor has been guilty of misconduct, the Court be empowered to inflict such summary punishment and impose such disabilities as may be deemed expedient."

Read with the information mentioned in answer to Question 1 (ante page 354), it is questionable whether the discharge clauses are of much benefit to creditors, but it would seem proper to make the clause more stringent in the case of no books, some debtors making a point of having no books and no memory on these occasions. Under French and German Laws, the disposition is to punish a real offence by imprisonment and have done with it rather than inflict a lingering punishment. In France, for instance, losses by gambling either in stocks, goods or otherwise, excessive personal or household expenses, and the omission to keep books, are punishable by imprisonment, and the same is applicable in Germany

BRISTOL.—See observations on page 374, relating to "Bankrupts discharge."

BRADFORD.—In the opinion of the chamber the present method of public examination is inadequate, and does not serve the purpose for which it was originally intended. The committee consider that this is due largely to the fact that in most cases the examination is prematurely closed. They consider that the examination ought to be kept open until the Trustee has an opportunity of making a complete and thorough investigation of the bankrupt's affairs. If the bankrupt felt on his first examination that all the statements he made would be subjected to a searching investigation by the Trustee, and that he might again be placed in the box for the purpose of being cross-examined upon them in the light of that investigation, he would be more likely to make a complete and truthful disclosure.

The chamber beg to refer to the following resolution of the Association of Chambers of Commerce which had their support:—

> "That it is desirable to supplement the present system of application for discharge in bankruptcy by providing that the Official Receiver in England and the Accountant in Bankruptcy in Scotland shall, within six months or within such extended time as the Court shall allow, after the public examination, present a report as to the debtor's conduct relative to his affairs, and that if after such report it be proved that the debtor has been guilty of misconduct, the Court be empowered to inflict such summary punishment and impose such liabilities as may be deemed expedient."

They further suggest that, with a view to rendering the public examination more efficient, the truthfulness or otherwise of the bankrupt's answers on his public examination should be included among the matters to be considered and dealt with by the Court in accordance with the above resolution. They also consider that among the offences which the Court should be allowed to punish under the suggested provisions should be included the neglect of the bankrupt to keep proper books and accounts. The chamber also suggest that, as in some cases the Court might consider the conduct of the bankrupt was such as to make it undesirable to deal with the matter summarily, the alternative should be allowed to the Court of directing a prosecution by the Public Prosecutor. In numerous cases it happens that a bankrupt is allowed to go unpunished because he has denuded himself of all his estate, and there are therefore no funds out of which the cost of application to prosecute and subsequent prosecution may be paid. In the opinion of the chamber, the costs of all applications by the Official Receiver or Trustee in reference to the conduct of bankrupts, and all prosecutions of bankrupts, should from the beginning be paid out of national funds.

BRIGHOUSE.—In all cases where proper books had not been kept, we would advocate permanent suspension of discharge if the estate had not realised 10s. in the £, or till that amount had been paid.

CLECKHEATON.—We are of opinion that the law with reference to this question should be amended; that it should be made a penal offence for a bankrupt (a) to have wilfully neglected to keep proper books of account such as are usually kept in his trade; (b) to fail to give a satisfactory account of loss of any substantial portion of his estate; (c) to commence trading again in the name of his wife or any relative or any other person without first obtaining his discharge.

COVENTRY.—The bankrupt's discharge should depend upon what the court decides his conduct has been. The bankrupt's discharge should be suspended until he has paid 6s. 8d. in the £ if in the opinion of the Court he has been negligent in his trading in the sense of being careless in incurring liabilities.

If he has been reckless in his trading, or has not kept proper books of account such as are reasonable and customary in his business, his discharge should be suspended for a term of not less than five years.

If he has been fraudulent, his discharge should be suspended for ten years, and the Court should report accordingly to the Public Prosecutor in order that he may be prosecuted and punished.

It should be made a penal offence for any bankrupt or insolvent debtor to trade and incur any trading liabilities without having received his discharge, whether he trades by himself, or in partnership, or by a nominee, or by any ascertainable method whatever.

CROYDON.—In the opinion of this chamber no alteration is necessary.

DERBY.—When it is proved that the bankrupt has omitted to keep such books of account as are usual and proper in the business carried on by him and as sufficiently disclose his business transactions and financial position within the three years immediately preceding his bankruptcy the provisions of the laws should be more stringently applied, and no objection would be raised to increasing the powers of the Court in this direction. It is, however, desirable that in practice some distinction should be drawn between persons who discontinue keeping proper accounts and those who through lack of education have never kept proper accounts.

HALIFAX.—The bankrupt's discharge should depend upon what the Court decides his conduct has been.

The bankrupt's discharge should be suspended until he has paid 6s. 8d. in the £ if in the opinion of the Court he has been negligent in his trading in the sense of being careless in incurring liabilities.

If he has been reckless in his trading, or has not kept proper books of account such as are reasonable and customary in his business, his discharge should be suspended for a term of not less than five years.

If he has been fraudulent, his discharge should be suspended for ten years, and the Court should report accordingly to the Public Prosecutor in order that he may be prosecuted and punished.

It should be made a penal offence for any bankrupt or insolvent debtor to trade and incur liabilities without having received his discharge, whether he trades by himself, or in partnership, or by a nominee, or by any ascertainable method whatever.

HULL.—Traders ought in all cases to keep proper books of account, and no discharge should be granted except, and until, such are proved satisfactory to the Court.

LEEDS.—No answer.

LIVERPOOL.—The committee are not in favour of penalising or punishing a man merely because he becomes bankrupt, and the threat of bankruptcy should not be allowed to be abused by creditors for their own purposes. There is no reason why a Debtor should be discouraged, by fear of consequences, from going to the Court, when he knows his position is due to no fault of his own—and a bankrupt sometimes needs protection from vindictive or importunate creditors.

The stigma of bankruptcy is in itself a serious matter without unduly enforcing the penal clauses of the Bankruptcy Acts and the Debtors Act of 1869.

The question of deciding whether a debtor has kept "proper books" and accounts is a difficult one, as the standard of "proper books" may be raised too high. Books and accounts should certainly be kept, but it is thought that a certificate by a professional accountant that the debtor has kept what the accountant considers "proper books and accounts" (in view of the nature of the debtor's business, the importance and magnitude or otherwise of the transactions and the general course and custom of the trade) should have due weight with the Court.

The Committee suggest that it might be desirable to discriminate in every discharge whether the discharge granted is a first class or a second class discharge. The first class discharge should be a certificate that the bankrupt has a perfectly clean record, except for the fact of bankruptcy; the second class discharge (which might at any time on application to the Court be made into a first class on certain compliances by the bankrupt) should cover the cases in which, in the opinion of the Court, the record is not free from doubt or when the bankrupt has not done his utmost to assist the Official Receiver and Trustee.

LONDON.—In addition to the statutory offences of which the Court is at present required to take cognisance on an application for discharge, the following additional "facts" should have effect:—

(a) If the bankrupt, being a trader, has brought about his failure through culpable neglect of his business; through intemperance, gambling or betting; has obtained further credit from any of his creditors, or their forbearance, by false representations as to his financial position or business prospects; or has improperly transferred any of his property to relatives or others in order to defeat executions levied by creditors, or otherwise delay them in the recovery of their just debts.

(b) If the bankrupt has absconded, or failed without due cause to attend the sitting of the Court for public examination.

(c) If the bankrupt has failed to give the Trustee every information and assistance in his power in the realisation of his estate, or has wilfully placed difficulties in the way of such realisation.

(d) If within six months prior to the date of the receiving order the bankrupt has unduly made a payment to any creditor with a view to releasing from liability any person bound with or for him as surety for such payment, or if within the like period he has voluntarily given an undue preference to any creditor.

(e) If with a view to increasing his assets so as to make them equal to 10s. in the £ on his liabilities, the bankrupt has obtained within six months of his bankruptcy goods on credit and has not paid for the same.

(f) If the bankrupt has not accounted for his deficiency to the satisfaction of the Trustee.

With regard to the existing offence of failure to keep proper books of account (in the case of a trader) such offence should be deemed proved if it be shown that the bankrupt has omitted (with intent to conceal the true state of his affairs) to keep either of the following books:—

(a) Cash book, and

(b) Books showing records of purchases and sales, or has omitted at least once in every year to prepare a statement showing his financial position.

Proof of any of the statutory offences, or of any of the proposed additional offences, should involve summary committal by the Court for not less than six months. This punishment should be additional to, or alternative from, the existing punishment of suspension of discharge

Until a bankrupt has obtained his discharge he should be bound to report to the Trustee once at least during every period of six months elapsing after the date of the adjudication giving in such report the following and such other information as may be prescribed, namely:—

(a) His address at the date of the report.

(b) His then occupation and means of livelihood.

(c) His income and earnings, and the number of persons dependent thereon.

(d) A full report of any property acquired or devolving on him since his bankruptcy or the date of the last previous report.

The report should be verified by affidavit in the prescribed form, and the failure to render the same in fourteen days after the expiration of any such period of six months should subject the bankrupt to committal to prison for contempt of Court upon the application of the Trustee.

The fees incidental to the application by a bankrupt for his discharge should be borne by the bankrupt and levied by means of a stamp duty on the order of discharge, the order not to be operative until such duty has been paid. The duty might be graduated from £1 to £5 according to the number of creditors to be notified of the application.

LUTON.—With respect to Question 2 the principal defects of the present Act are that, as previously mentioned, the fact that the assets are less than 10s. in the £ becomes, in practice, the most material one.

The provisions of the Act should be made more stringent.

One of the principal causes of insolvency is bad book-keeping. In other cases bad book-keeping or the absence of books is only a cover for transactions of doubtful validity.

It is the experience of accountants acting as trustees in bankruptcy, and doubtless of Official Receivers, that where necessary to attack transactions such as fraudulent preferences or transfers of property to wives or relatives, the books are nearly always in bad condition or absent altogether to enable the transactions to be covered.

The chamber therefore supported at the Associated Chambers of Commerce, and now cordially supports the resolution of the Association.

> "That Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, should be applied with greater stringency by refusing to grant orders of discharge in cases where debtors owing more than a sum to be afterwards fixed have failed to keep proper books of account."

It is obvious that the question of what are proper books is a question of fact to be determined by the business of the bankrupt. The words of the Act 1883 appear to be sufficient to cover this.

> "Such books of account as are usual and proper in the business carried on by him, and as sufficiently disclose his business transactions and financial position during the three years immediately preceding his bankruptcy."

In the opinion of the chamber, where it is apparent during the proceedings that not keeping reasonable accounts has been the means of covering up doubtful transactions further penalties than refusing discharges should be imposed.

In the opinion of the chamber the following offences should be followed by the imposition of penalties :— (a) Rash and hazardous speculation, particularly outside the scope of the business, and also where the bankrupt has contributed to his bankruptcy by betting or gambling. (b) Fraudulent preference by the bankrupt under such circumstances as to show that there was an attempt on the part of the bankrupt to defraud his creditors.

In this connection it is desirable to clearly distinguish between undue preferences and fraudulent preferences, and it appears to the Chamber that the distinction is one which in practice would present no great difficulties.

It is recognised that there is a natural desire on the part of bankrupts when the crash is approaching to make their friends and relatives right, where they are indebted to them, under circumstances which admit of no doubt that the indebtedness is bona fide. On the other hand, in practice there is frequently a claim on the part of a relative to goods when the person claiming never had a banking account, kept no books, always handed the money to the bankrupt to purchase goods, generally household furniture, and this story is corroborated by the bankrupt.

The story is hard to meet and is frequently successful. If, in addition to the risk of failure, the bankrupt had before him a penalty in the bankruptcy, such claims would be fewer. The penalties contemplated under this head would be :—

(a) Committal to prison for not exceeding 42 days as a debtor.

(b) Suspension of discharge for fixed period with attendant disabilities.

MANCHESTER.—No answer.

PORTSMOUTH.—At a meeting of the council of this chamber held on the 1st June, 1906, a resolution was passed to the effect :—"That the provisions of the laws relating to the discharge of a bankrupt and the conditions on which such a discharge should be granted, refused or suspended, should be made more stringent, so as more effectually to check improper and reckless trading and the neglect by traders to keep proper books and accounts."

This chamber is also of opinion that County Court Judges too often make a general custom of merely suspending the discharge for two years when the facts of the case warrant a more severe order, and the chamber suggest to the Committee that possibly the desired protection can be obtained by striking out Clause 2 of Section 8, sub-Section 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, viz., the words "suspend or discharge for a period of not less than 2 years."

READING.—The law relating to the discharge of bankrupts should be made more stringent, and the provisions of Section 8 of the Act of 1890 providing for suspended and conditional discharges be repealed.

SHEFFIELD.—The chamber think :

(a) That every bankrupt ought to be compelled to apply for his discharge, and he ought to make his application within, say, two years of the date of adjudication. The chamber quite realise that very often a bankrupt cannot afford to apply for discharge and the considerable cost is often the reason why no application is made. Power should, therefore, be given to the Registrar of a County Court having bankruptcy jurisdiction to allow a bankrupt to make an application for discharge at a nominal cost. Let an application be made to the Registrar in the first instance, and if the Registrar considers the case deserving, then a Certificate of the Registrar should entitle the bankrupt to apply for discharge on payment of a fee of a nominal amount.

(b) That an undischarged bankrupt ought to be compelled to file an affidavit every six months with the County Court of the district where he had been residing for the greater part of the preceding six months, and also with the County Court of the district where he was made a bankrupt setting out his name, address and occupation, and a statement of his existing debts and liabilities.

(c) That it should be a criminal offence for an undischarged bankrupt to obtain goods on credit to the value of £10 or more instead of the present limit of £20, and also that any person engaged in a trade, business or profession should be compelled to keep a cash book, and in case of bankruptcy the fact that no such cash book has been kept should be a criminal offence.

(d) The chamber are aware that in some foreign countries, traders have to show their accounts to a public official corresponding to a mayor of an English town, in order that it may be seen they are in proper order, but the council feel that a regulation of this kind would not do in England. The chamber consider that wider discretionary powers ought to be given to the Board of Trade, allowing them to pay for a prosecution of a bankrupt in any case which the Board of Trade thought fit, and that it should be lawful for either the Registrar of the County Court or the Official Receiver of the district to make an application to the Board of Trade for this purpose.

The Sheffield Chamber believe that the reason that so few prosecutions take place for offences in bankruptcy is that it is felt that there would be considerable cost, and that cost would all have to come out of the estate, whereas if the cost could come out of public monies, there would be no such reluctance to take proceedings.

(e) The Sheffield Chamber agree with the following Resolutions which were passed by the Associated Chambers of Commerce :—

(1) "That Section 8 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, should be applied with greater stringency, by refusing to grant orders of discharge in cases where debtors owing more than a sum to be afterwards fixed have failed to keep proper books of account."

(2) "That it is desirable to supplement the present system of applications for discharge in bankruptcy by providing that the Official Receiver in England, and the Accountant in Bankruptcy

in Scotland shall, within six months or within such extended time as the Court shall allow, after the public examination, present a report as to the debtor's conduct relative to his affairs, and that if after such report it be proved that the debtor has been guilty of misconduct, the Court be empowered to inflict such summary punishment and impose such disabilities as may be deemed expedient."

SOUTH OF SCOTLAND.—The policy of the law in Scotland has been to treat the discharge in sequestration as a privilege to the bankrupt rather than a right. The power to determine whether it shall be granted or not rests to a considerable extent with the creditors. A discharge cannot in any case be obtained till after the lapse of two years from the awarding of the sequestration without the consent of a majority of the creditors. With their consent, and subject to certain other conditions, the Court is bound to award it unless cause be shown for its refusal by parties entitled to object. The awarding of discharge is in every case (whether with or without the consent of his creditors) subject to two conditions, viz. :— (1) That the bankrupt has not fraudulently concealed any part of his estate, or wilfully failed to comply with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts ; and (2) that his estate has produced 5s. in the £ of dividend, or that the failure to do so be shewn to be due to circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible. In view of the provision allowing the Court to grant a discharge, notwithstanding the non-payment of a dividend of 5s. in the £, it is thought that the minimum dividend is too low and should be raised to 7s. 6d. at least.

TORQUAY.—No answer.

WAKEFIELD.—Failure to keep certain books of account (at least a cash book) should be punishable, where the liabilities exceed £300, as in the case of offences under the Debtors Act.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—Yes.

WORCESTER.—Cases of insolvency are so often found to have arisen from improper and reckless trading that your committee are of opinion that the conditions on which a discharge may be granted might well be made more stringent in this respect. This appears particularly desirable in cases where the debtor has neglected to keep proper books and accounts ; and though your committee do not go so far as to advocate the establishment of a statutory method of book-keeping (as in France), they yet consider that certain requirements in that direction should be obligatory upon traders, and that neglect of this obligation should upon insolvency be visited with sensible penalties.

3. Whether power should be given to the Law Society to refuse to renew the Certificates of Solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, subject to appeal to the Master of the Rolls.

BARNSLEY.—Solicitors are struck off the rolls for wrong doings, which seems sufficient punishment, and which practically stops their business.

BIRMINGHAM.—It should be made compulsory for the Law Society to refuse to renew the certificates of solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, subject to appeal to the Master of the Rolls.

BLACKBURN.—This matter has already been fully and sufficiently dealt with in the recent Solicitors Act.

BRISTOL.—No answer.

BRADFORD.—The chamber consider that this is a subject that should be dealt with by lawyers themselves through their Law Society.

BRIGHOUSE.—Yes.

CLECKHEATON.—We think that this power should be given in cases where the solicitor has wilfully neglected to keep proper books of account such as are usually kept by solicitors, or where he has failed to give a satisfactory account of loss of any substantial portion of his estate, but that the Law Society's decision should be subject to appeal to the Master of the Rolls.

COVENTRY.—Yes, if the Law Society considers he has been fraudulent, and subject to appeal to the Master of Rolls.

CROYDON.—Yes.

DERBY.—The Law Society should have power to refuse to renew the certificates of solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts.

HALIFAX.—Yes, if the Law Society considers he has been fraudulent, and subject to appeal to the Master of the Rolls.

HULL.—Certainly.

LEEDS.—That to refuse the renewal of certificates of solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts on that ground alone would be to unduly penalise solicitors as compared with members of other professions and trades.

LIVERPOOL.—The committee recommend that this power should be given.

LONDON.—With regard to a bankrupt solicitor the Law Society now have power to refuse to renew the annual practising certificate of such solicitor so long as he remains undischarged, and this we approve.

LUTON.—Power should be given to the Law Society to refuse to renew the certificates of solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, subject to appeal to the Master of the Rolls. It does not, however, appear reasonable that the certificate should be refused except on grounds which would involve a penalty or disability upon an ordinary trader. If the suggestion of the Luton Chamber as to the alteration of the system of discharges is carried into effect, the period during which any man is undischarged, save in cases where the discharge is refused, will be materially shortened.

MANCHESTER.—The board do not feel called upon to make any very urgent representation as to the right of a bankrupt solicitor to renew his practising certificate, or of a bankrupt accountant to re-commence practice. Speaking generally, however, they feel that the governing bodies of these professions should have some authority (perhaps subject to appeal to the Court) in the direction of restricting a bankrupt member of their profession from commencing his profession so long as he remains undischarged.

PORTSMOUTH.—No answer.

READING.—Power should be given to the Law Society to refuse to renew the certificates of solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, subject to appeal to the Master of the Rolls.

SHEFFIELD.—The chamber note with pleasure that the Solicitors' Act, 1906, has just been passed, and that the Law Society have now power to refuse practising certificates to solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, subject to the solicitors being able to appeal to the Master of the Rolls against the Law Society's decision.

SOUTH OF SCOTLAND.—It is thought very undesirable that solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts should be allowed to practise.

TORQUAY.—That owing to a difference of opinion no recommendation be made with respect to No. 3 of the Terms of Reference by the Departmental Committee as to solicitors.

WAKEFIELD.—No answer.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—Yes.

WORCESTER.—Your committee cannot venture t recommend this suggestion. It is understood that th Law Society already wields considerable powers ove solicitors, and it would appear both oppressive to deprive a practitioner of his means of livelihood, and somewhat invidious to legislate against a particular profession in a matter in which all trades and occupations are equally involved.

4. Whether the existing provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the realisation and administration of property should be amended so as to secure a more immediate realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt as soon as possible after a Receiving Order has been made.

BARNSLEY.—There are undoubted advantages in quick realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt, but it by no means follows that it is always expedient. An experienced accountant suggests that if five-sixths of the number and amount of the creditors were sufficient to give sanction to a deed, much time and money would be saved, some persons making it a practice never to assent in order that they may be bought off.

BIRMINGHAM.—No answer.

BLACKBURN.—No answer.

BRISTOL.—No answer.

BRADFORD.—The chamber consider that it is in most cases undesirable to force the hands of a trustee in the realisation of the property, as the tendency would be towards the slaughtering of estates. In all cases the trustee (whether the Official Receiver or any other person) should be required to act in the administration of the estate under the direction of a committee of inspection, and this should be sufficient protection to the creditors against undue prolongation of the winding-up. In order to provide for the few cases in which the winding-up is unduly prolonged, the chamber suggests that individual creditors, representing a fixed proportion of the liabilities, should be allowed to appeal to the Court in which the proceedings are carried on to direct a more speedy winding-up. Such a remedy is likely to be more resorted to by creditors than an application to the Board of Trade. The Court is on the spot, and the Court, or Registrar, or Judge, can be appealed to personally, whereas the Board of Trade can only be approached by correspondence, and cannot be brought into direct touch with the local conditions and circumstances.

BRIGHOUSE.—Yes.

CLECKHEATON.—No answer.

COVENTRY.—The creditors are the best judges both as to time and means to be adopted for realising the bankrupt's estate, and should have full control over a trustee through a committee of inspection. The trustee should, however, have a right of appeal from a decision of the committee of inspection, with which he may disagree, to the general body of creditors, a two-thirds majority of whom should bind him.

CROYDON.—So far as the experience of this chamber is concerned, no unreasonable delay in the realization and administration of the property of the bankrupt takes place under the existing provisions.

DERBY.—When a receiving order has been made, and the creditors are dissatisfied with the manner in which the estate is being realised, the Official Receiver shall, upon request from creditors of one-third in value, call a meeting of the creditors on the subject ; otherwise the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the realization and administration of property should not be amended.

HALIFAX.—The creditors are the best judges both as to time and means to be adopted for realising the bankrupt's estate, and should have full control over the trustee through a committee of inspection. The trustee should, however, have a right of appeal from a decision of the committee of inspection with which he may disagree to the general body of creditors, a two-thirds majority of whom should bind him.

HULL.—It is desirable that the Bankruptcy Acts should enforce the administration and realization of estates as quickly as possible.

LEEDS.—No answer.

LIVERPOOL.—It is thought by some members of the committee that a clause ought to be inserted in the Act or schedule providing that the meeting of creditors be held within say ten days from the date of the receiving order.

The delay that is now complained of does not so frequently occur in bankruptcies as in cases of liquidation under deeds of arrangement. Some effort might be made to expedite these latter proceedings, and it is suggested that in all cases in which the deed of assignment or composition is agreed to by four-fifths in value of the creditors, the trustee should have power to appeal to the Court to confirm the deed. Confirmation by the Court should make the deed binding upon all creditors.

This would lead to more speedy realization of an estate and be a more just arrangement in the interests of the general body of creditors.

Power should be given to the prescribed majority of creditors to bind a minority under proper conditions and limitations.

The time available for a petition after an act of bankruptcy should be reduced from three to two months, in order that creditors might resolve quickly what course they would take. The tendency of recent decisions has caused creditors to be viewed unfavourably, who for their own ends do not reasonably soon decide whether they will acquiesce or allow the estate to proceed to bankruptcy. Foreign and distant creditors should be reasonably protected as to sufficiency of time.

The committee are averse to depriving creditors of the right to say how a debtor's estate shall be administered. The right may in many cases be abused, but the committee are convinced that in the majority of private arrangements the proper course is pursued, and this should not in any way be restricted or hindered.

LONDON.—Official Receivers should not, in any case where the assets are likely to exceed £100, be allowed to realise assets (except those of a perishable nature), nor to close the debtor's business (if any) pending the first meeting of creditors. More loss has occurred through hasty realizations by Official Receivers than by waiting for a few days for the appointment of the creditors' trustee and committee.

There is a strong tendency on the part of a Government Department paid by commission to realise by auction or otherwise prior to the trustee's appointment. The first meeting should, however, be held much more promptly than at present, and should not be delayed by reason of the failure of the debtor to file his statement of affairs within the prescribed time, as the "summary and observations" could very well be issued by the Official Receiver after the meeting but prior to the public examination. Every debtor should be obliged, under a penalty for failing to do so, to lodge with the Official Receiver within two days of the making of the receiving order if on his own petition, or, if on a creditor's petition, then within two days of his receiving notice of the receiving order, a list of his creditors with their addresses, and the amounts (or approximate amounts) of their debts.

The limit of assets in "summary cases" should be reduced to £100, and the majority required in such cases for the appointment of a trustee by the creditors should be the same as in non-summary cases.

Difficulties should not be raised by the Official Receivers to trade creditors appointing their own nominee as special manager or trustee. On this point the following remarks by Lord Justice Vaughan Williams should be remembered :—

> "In all these and many other similar cases the Official Receivers cannot, in the nature of things, perform their duties nearly as well as the commercial liquidator can do."

And again this learned authority expressed himself as follows :—

> "I have thoroughly satisfied myself that there are many cases in which the administrations are of such a character that the Official Receivers, however zealous and able they may be, are not the most proper and fitting persons to act."

LUTON.—Any realisation of property other than that of a perishable nature is very undesirable until after the first meeting.

The creditors are certainly entitled to a voice in the disposition of the assets of a bankrupt, and it is therefore difficult to see how the realisation can be very much expedited.

MANCHESTER.—No answer.

PORTSMOUTH.—No answer.

READING.—The existing provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the realisation and administration of property should be amended so as to secure a more immediate realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt as soon as possible after a receiving order has been made. But that each case should be dealt with on its own merits and the Official Receiver should not act without the approval of the creditors.

SHEFFIELD.—The chamber scarcely think that it is possible to quicken realisation of property in bankruptcy although they think that realisation might be quickened under deeds of assignment which are touched upon later on in this report. One method of realising an estate in bankruptcy would be, if the system which is believed to be in force in France were tried, namely, that bankrupt estates should be offered for sale by auction (with some right for the majority in value of unsecured creditors to fix reserve prices) and then of course the purchase money would be received by some trustee or other person and distributed forthwith amongst the creditors. The Sheffield Chamber know that very often it is impossible for a speedy realisation to take place, and they also doubt very much whether the above method would be satisfactory in this country. A trustee in bankruptcy has to lodge accounts every three months with the Board of Trade so that the Board know how matters are progressing.

SOUTH OF SCOTLAND.—In Scotland, the realisation and administration of the bankrupt's estate rests with the trustee under the supervision of the accountant of Court. In practice, the trustee is found to act fairly expeditiously, and it is not thought that the law requires amendment on this point.

TORQUAY.—It would be desirable to impose a time limit upon trustees in bankruptcy for the realisation and administration of bankrupt estates, with power to the Court to extend such limit in cases where loss to creditors would be incurred of a too hasty realisation.

WAKEFIELD.—This appears to depend more upon the trustee than upon the provisions of the Act, but a procedure for a scheme for composition under the Act should be simplified.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—No answer.

WORCESTER.—It is true that there is sometimes considerable delay in the realisation of bankrupt estates, but as a general rule receivers carry out these often difficult duties with diligence and discretion. Haste in realisation would often cause wholly unnecessary losses to the creditors, just as judgment and caution frequently bring them considerable salvage; and your committee would deprecate any limit to the discretionary powers of receivers, checked as they frequently are by committees of inspection.

5. Whether the law so far as it enables the trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the bankrupt's estate all the bankrupt's after acquired property should be modified in any, and what, way, so as to protect persons who have honestly become creditors of the bankrupt since his bankruptcy or have purchased or taken mortgages or securities over such after acquired property from the bankrupt.

BARNSLEY.—There is undoubtedly a grievance here, but it is inherent in the very system itself, and would seem to be met by the suggestions under No. 1 and No. 2, viz., punishment for absolute wrong-doing and more efficient working of discharges.

If a man were punished, and it is estimated that only about 10 per cent. could really show circumstances over which they had no control, the thing would be done with just like a theft.

BIRMINGHAM.—No answer.

BLACKBURN.—No answer.

BRISTOL.—We prefer the law as at present.

BRADFORD.—The chamber consider that it is undesirable to make any alteration in the law which would encourage or make it easier for the bankrupt to recommence business. They suggest that the difficulty indicated in the question should be dealt with (a) by punishment of any Bankrupt who obtains credit before obtaining his discharge, and (b) by giving increased facilities to traders to ascertain whether a person to whom they propose to give credit is an undischarged bankrupt. There should, in the opinion of the chamber, be a list kept of undischarged bankrupts, a copy of which would be available for inspection in every District Registry of the High Court.

BRIGHOUSE.—We do not think this law should be modified, as if any person gives credit to an undischarged bankrupt he is supposed to have been informed of the fact, and is presumably willing to take the risk. Further, a bankrupt's creditors may have been influenced to do so by the knowledge that a debtor may have had a prospect to some after acquired property by way of bequest or otherwise. If bankrupts fail to advise new creditors they are undischarged bankrupts, then enforce the present law more stringently.

CLECKHEATON.—To a large extent the difficulties mentioned in this question would be obviated by the adoption of above suggestions in answer to Questions Nos. 1 and 2.

COVENTRY.—After acquired property (if the title to it has accrued since the bankruptcy) should be applied first in payment of creditors for value since the bankruptcy, or failing this the law should be amended and the assets distributed rateably among the creditors of both bankruptcies, after deducting from their claims any dividend already received by the creditors in the first bankruptcy.

The difficulty in many cases of ascertaining whether any particular person has been bankrupt renders it desirable to protect all transactions, whether relating to realty or personalty entered into bonâ fide and without notice.

It is strongly recommended, however, that there should be one central office for the United Kingdom for registration of all charges and incumbrances, including bankruptcies, so that a search in that office would be sufficient.

Until his discharge becomes operative every debtor should be bound to make a report as to his position to the Official Receiver at stated periods.

CROYDON.—In the opinion of this chamber no amendment is necessary.

DERBY.—The power of a trustee of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the estate all the bankrupt's after acquired property should be limited to a period of six years from the date of the bankruptcy.

HALIFAX.—After acquired property (if the title to it has accrued since the bankruptcy) should be applied first in payment of creditors for value since the bankruptcy, or failing this the law should be amended, and the assets distributed rateably among the creditors of both bankruptcies, after deducting from their claims any dividend already received by the creditors in the first bankruptcy.

The difficulty in many cases of ascertaining whether any particular person has been bankrupt renders it desirable to protect all transactions whether relating to realty or personalty entered into bonâ fide and without notice.

It is strongly recommended, however, that there should be one central office for the United Kingdom for registration of all charges and incumbrances, including bankruptcies, so that a search in that office would be sufficient.

HULL.—No alteration is required from the present rule, but greater penalties should be placed upon the bankrupt for such infringement.

LEEDS.—No answer.

LIVERPOOL.—The committee recommend a six years' limit to the power of the Trustee from the date of adjudication.

LONDON.—The present law as to after acquired property of an undischarged bankrupt operates most unjustly towards new creditors of the bankrupt. Such new creditors should have the benefit of the new Assets regardless of the old creditors, who should only take the surplus (if any) of the new estate, instead of, as at present, taking the entire assets created by the new creditors, leaving the latter only the surplus (if any).

Provision, or further provision, should also be made for the protection of persons, who, in good faith and without notice of the bankrupt's status, have purchased property from him or lent money to him on the security of his after acquired property.

LUTON.—It is suggested that the adoption of the suggestion in regard to discharges by reducing undischarged bankrupts to a very small number, would limit considerably the application of the law relating to after acquired property.

If any modification is made it would be limited to the protection of innocent persons in respect of property for valuable consideration.

The protection of creditors, in a subsequent failure would appear to be impossible without a time limit and this would render nugatory a refusal to grant an order of discharge. In our opinion the better method to protect creditors would be to cause the publication each year in the London Gazette of the names of all persons who are undischarged bankrupts. This list under the proposed altered conditions would not be of unreasonable length and would practically be notice of a refusal of discharge.

MANCHESTER.—The board consider that this question should be dealt with by legislation and make the following suggestions :—

1. That the doctrine laid down in Cohen v. Mitchell, 25 Q.B.D. 262-267, should be extended so as to cover and protect all dealings and transactions by a bankrupt with any person dealing with him bonâ fide in respect of his after acquired property, whether real or personal, and if for value, whether such person had or had not knowledge of the bankruptcy.

2. That the doctrine of Cohen v. Mitchell as so extended should be made applicable to successive bankruptcies, so that upon a subsequent bankruptcy of an undischarged bankrupt, all property acquired by him after the prior bankruptcy should be available in the first instance for the creditors in the subsequent bankruptcy, so far as such property had not before the subsequent bankruptcy been actually reduced into possession by the trustees in the prior bankruptcy. The doctrine should also be made applicable to a subsequent deed of assignment in the same manner as to a subsequent bankruptcy.

PORTSMOUTH.—No answer.

READING.—That the law so far as it enables the trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the bankrupt's estate all the bankrupt's after acquired property should be modified in some way, so as to protect persons who have honestly become creditors of the bankrupt since his bankruptcy or have purchased or taken mortgages or securities over such after acquired property from the bankrupt.

SHEFFIELD.—It is not advisable to modify the law which enables the Trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt to claim after acquired property, but at the same time far more facilities ought to be provided for ascertaining whether a person is an undischarged bankrupt or not, and records should certainly be kept both at the Court where a man was made bankrupt and also at the County Court of the district where the undischarged bankrupt is residing of the fact that he is an undischarged bankrupt, and all persons ought to be at liberty to inspect a register of undischarged bankrupts at the County Court on payment of a small fee of not exceeding 1s.

SOUTH OF SCOTLAND.—It is thought that a spes successionis (or non-ascertained eventual interest which may never become an actual interest) should nevertheless vest in the Trustee. This is not at present the case, although such an indefinite interest is capable of being turned into money by sale or assignation. Owing to the system of registration in vogue in Scotland of all mortgages over heritable (real) property, it would only be due to the carelessness of the mortgagee in not examining the registers, if he lent money on such property acquired by a bankrupt before his discharge. Moveable or personal property cannot in Scotland be pledged for debt, except by delivery of the property.

TORQUAY.—That a creditor dealing bonâ fide with an undischarged bankrupt without knowledge of his status, should be entitled to the full benefit of any security he may have obtained on after acquired property, and that his claim, whether secured or not, should have priority to that of the trustee in the earlier bankruptcy, provided that such earlier bankruptcy took place not less than five years prior to the second bankruptcy.

WAKEFIELD.—No answer.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—No.

WORCESTER.—In the matter of the claims of the Trustee upon after-acquired property, your Committee consider that the present law does not require amendment. Cases of hardship occasionally arise, but after all a bankruptcy is a matter of record and usually of notoriety, and those who have become creditors or mortgagees of such property should, in the general interest, be considered to have displayed some lâches or negligence in so doing.

6. Whether the provisions of the law by which a married woman can in certain circumstances be made bankrupt should be extended so as to render all, or some, and what, classes of married women who incur debts on their own account (whether trading separately from their husband or not) subject to the Bankruptcy Laws.

BARNSLEY.—Married women trading often means the husband is really trading under her name, and under such circumstances they should be brought under the bankruptcy laws.

BIRMINGHAM.—No answer.

BLACKBURN.—No answer.

BRISTOL.—Yes, we think so.

BRADFORD.—In the opinion of the chamber there is no reason why married women who obtain credit in any form, whether as traders or otherwise, should not be made bankrupt if they do not fulfil their obligations.

BRIGHOUSE.—We should make the Bankruptcy Laws apply all round, whether man or woman, married or single.

CLECKHEATON.—The ordinary provisions of the Bankruptcy Law should apply to married women separated from their husbands, whether trading or not.

COVENTRY.—Yes, in every way the same as for men, and whether trading or not.

CROYDON.—In the opinion of this chamber no amendment is necessary.

DERBY.—Married women should be subject to the Bankruptcy Laws, whether trading separately from their husbands or not.

HALIFAX.—Yes, in every way the same as for men, and whether trading or not.

HULL.—More stringent laws might be made to prevent bankrupts from starting in business under another name, either the wife's or a false name; evading the provisions of the Act by such trading should be made punishable.

LEEDS.—No answer.

LIVERPOOL.—The committee do not make any suggestion with regard to the question raised in this section.

LONDON.—The committee see no reason why women in regard to the Bankruptcy Laws should not be treated in every respect as men are.

LUTON.—The provision of the law by which a married woman can in certain circumstances be made a bankrupt should be extended so as to render all classes of married women who incur debts on their own account subject to the Bankruptcy Laws as males. In this connection it is highly desirable that there should be a registration of firms in order that it may be ascertained before credit is given who is the actual proprietor of the business.

MANCHESTER.—The board are strongly of opinion that the time has not arrived when married women ought, as regards enforcing claims against them, to be placed in all respects on the same footing as unmarried women. Much injustice and fraud is cloaked by the comparative immunity which married women now enjoy from the enforcement of their judgment debts.

For all purposes a judgment should be deemed to be against a married woman personally and not merely against her separate estate, the issue of a bankruptcy notice should be made permissible (over-ruling Scott v. Morley, 20, Q. B.D. 120; Re Lyons (1893, (2), Q. B. 113), even where the judgment is recovered against her in a firm name, and whether she is the sole person carrying on business in such firm name, or is one of a number of partners (over-ruling Re Handford & Company (1898), 2, Q. B. 576).

A married woman debtor ought also to be subject to the provisions of the Debtors Act, Section 5. If the Court had power to act under this section against a married woman it would prevent many married women who are in receipt of good but settled incomes from setting their creditors at defiance.

PORTSMOUTH.—No answer.

READING.—The provisions of the law by which a married woman can in certain circumstances be made bankrupt should be extended so as to render all who incur debts on their own account (whether trading separately from their husbands or not) subject to the Bankruptcy Laws.

SHEFFIELD.—All married women, whether trading or not, should be amenable to the Bankruptcy Laws. The chamber realise only too well how often tradesmen are swindled by a husband and wife acting in concert, and although it is impossible to entirely remedy this evil by legislation, yet no doubt several married women might be deterred from doing certain acts which they would now do light heartedly, if they knew that they could be made bankrupt and their doings made public, not to mention the inconvenience and trouble of having to attend various examinations, &c. They would also have the pleasure of figuring in the Register of Undischarged Bankrupts which has already been mentioned. A single woman can be made bankrupt, and at the present time there seems to be no reason why a married woman should not be in the same position.

SOUTH OF SCOTLAND.—In the following cases in Scotland at common law a married woman may be made bankrupt, viz.:—(1) Where the husband is abroad, and the wife carries on a trade or business by herself. (2) Where the wife is living apart from the husband, having obtained a decree of separation or a protection order under the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861. (3) Where the husband is incapacitated for civil rights, as being an alien enemy, or a convict, or an outlaw. (4) Where a wife obtains credit by having fraudulently held herself out as unmarried, or where the debt incurred has been in rem versum of her. (In these cases she can only be made bankrupt by diligence against her separate estate if she have any.) (5) When a wife has separate estate, she can make it liable for her obligations, and she will in the ordinary case be held at common law to have bound it. There is often some difficulty in fixing liability on a married woman for debts incurred by herself, and some amendment of the law which would make this easier, would be an advantage to traders.

TORQUAY.—A married woman contracting debts in her own name, and not clearly and unmistakably as the agent of her husband, should be subject to the Bankruptcy Laws, and further, that she be made liable to imprisonment under the Debtors Act for disobeying a judgment by the Court directing payment of a debt.

WAKEFIELD.—A married woman should be treated as trading separately unless she should receive substantial help in her business from her husband, and the onus should be on the woman to prove that she was not trading separately.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—It is not considered that this question interests the class of traders represented by the chamber, and no opinion is expressed thereon.

WORCESTER.—Your committee consider that all married women should be subject to the Bankruptcy Laws to the extent of their separate estate, whether trading or not, save in respect of debts incurred by them in acting as their husbands' agents; but they find great difficulty in dealing with the question in the present unsatisfactory state of the law relating to married women, and would prefer to consider this point in connection with a general enquiry into that law.

7. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the avoidance of marriage and other settlements, and covenants and securities made by persons who afterwards become bankrupt, should be extended so as to prevent the trustees and persons claiming under such settlements, covenants, and securities from afterwards competing unfairly with the persons who have become creditors of the bankrupt for valuable consideration in money or money's worth, and to protect bonâ fide purchasers and incumbrancers of property under such disposition as above described.

BARNSLEY.—Amendment is required, but here again follows on the line of complete discharge and rehabiliment of the debtor as legally capable of acquiring property.

BIRMINGHAM.—No answer.

BLACKBURN.—No answer.

BRISTOL.—No answer.

BRADFORD.—The chamber consider that marriage settlements should in case of the bankruptcy of the settler be placed on the same footing as voluntary settlements. It is not right that a trader should be able, while taking on himself the increased expenditure consequent on marriage, to so settle his assets that his creditors cannot resort to them for payment of their debts.

BRIGHOUSE.—No answer.

CLECKHEATON.—No answer.

COVENTRY.—No.

CROYDON.—In the opinion of this chamber no amendment is necessary.

DERBY.—There is no need for an alteration of the provisions of the laws relating to the avoidance of marriage and other settlements and covenants and securities made by persons who afterwards became bankrupt.

HALIFAX.—Yes, excepting ante-nuptial settlement, and trustees of such should not be able to claim in competition with ordinary creditors for value.
All post-nuptial settlements should be registered.

HULL.—The "onus probandi" of solvency at the time of settlement should rest with the debtor ; failure to prove such solvency should invalidate the settlement.

LEEDS.—Whilst not desiring to interfere unduly with marriage and voluntary settlements, or to affect property comprised therein, the right of trustees thereunder to prove in the subsequent bankruptcy of the settlor for monetary claims should be postponed to the claims of creditors for valuable consideration in money or money's worth.

LIVERPOOL.—It is considered that the present law is sufficient to meet the cases referred to in this section.

LONDON.—The committee are of opinion that the provisions of the existing law should be extended in the following particulars :

(a) That all ante-nuptial settlements should be registered.

(b) That all such settlements should be made subject to the debts of the settlor existing at the date of the settlement.

(c) That where under a settlement the settlor has covenanted to pay the trustees a sum of money, or to settle further property at some future time, any claim by the trustees under such covenant should in the event of the settlor's bankruptcy, be postponed till all creditors for value have been paid in full.

(d) That the court should have power to declare void and inoperative any forfeiture of a life interest where proved to be collusive or effected with a view of preventing creditors from obtaining the benefit of such interest, the onus of proving the bonâ fides of the forfeiture resting upon the life tenant.
Cases have occurred in which debtors have deliberately created mortgages or given charges upon life interests, or done other acts operating as forfeitures with the sole object of defeating their creditors, the life tenants being well aware that the trustees, notwithstanding the forfeiture, have still power to apply the income, in their discretion, for the benefit, directly or indirectly, of such life tenants.

LUTON.—The chamber does not desire to make any special representation on this point.

MANCHESTER.—No answer.

PORTSMOUTH.—No answer.

READING.—Generally speaking, the provisions of the laws relating to the avoidance of marriage and other settlements, and covenants and securities made by persons who afterwards become bankrupt, should be extended so as to protect the trustees and persons claiming under such settlements, covenants and securities, from afterwards competing unfairly with the persons who have become creditors of the bankrupt, for valuable consideration in money or money's worth, and to protect bonâ fide purchases and incumbrances of property under such disposition as above described. But much depends upon the meaning of the word "unfairly," and the method of giving effect to this desired reform.

SHEFFIELD.—As regards an avoidance of marriage and other settlements, the chamber feel that it would be practically impossible to alter this branch of the law without causing hardships to a number of innocent persons, because many of these settlements are made bonâ fide and the beneficiaries under such settlements are entitled to just as much consideration as the creditors of the bankrupts who made the settlement.

SOUTH OF SCOTLAND.—Persons giving credit to others, who afterwards become bankrupt, on the faith of their possessing property which turns out afterwards to be secured by marriage settlement or otherwise, are very much to blame themselves, for by examination of the records, they can, in the case of real property, find out what burdens are upon it, and, as formerly stated, no security can in Scotland be given over moveable property, except by delivery.

TORQUAY.—No answer.

WAKEFIELD.—No answer.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—It is considered that such settlements, covenants and securities as are referred to should be subject to registration.

WORCESTER.—Isolated cases of hardship occasionally arise, but these are generally found to have resulted from want of care in inquiry, and it is considered that the law already affords sufficient protection to creditors of the class referred to, and that to extend that protection would be not only to court greater hardships than now occur, but to open a door to fraud.

8. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors should be amended so as to place the debtor and the trustee under any such arrangement or composition, and the terms and conditions of the arrangement or composition, more under control, and provide for official audits of the trustee's accounts, and official control over the assets in his hands.

BARNSLEY.—The present methods of voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors are satisfactory, and it is very questionable whether official control is any further required.

BIRMINGHAM.—No answer, but see general remarks (post, page 371).

BRISTOL.—No answer, but see general remarks (post, page 371).

BRADFORD. — The reason for the existence of voluntary arrangements and compositions is that the creditors (having no cause for serious dissatisfaction with the debtor's conduct) desire to administer the estate without official interference. They secure that the estate shall be administered in accordance with their wishes by appointing a committee of creditors under whose direction the trustee must act. Difficulty only arises when a small minority of creditors refuse to assent to the arrangement and try to obtain a preference. To meet such cases it should be competent to the debtor, with the support of not less than two-thirds in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors, to apply to the Court to sanction the arrangement, the result of such sanction (if granted) being to make the arrangements binding on the minority of creditors. Before giving a decision on such an application the debtor would be required to submit to a private investigation by the Official Receiver, who would report to the Court. If not satisfied (after hearing the Official Receiver and the debtor) with the debtor's conduct or with the fairness of the proposed arrangements, the Court would make a receiving order with the usual consequences. The result would be to discourage preferences, and at the same time to secure that a minority may not be coerced into assent in cases where the debtor's conduct is such as to justify the refusal of assent, or where the proposed arrangement is not a fair or proper one.

BRIGHOUSE.—There is no doubt that the large expenses incurred (in some cases most exorbitant) in the winding up of small estates by the Official Receiver is the cause of the great number of voluntary arrangements. While it is cheaper it is abused by debtors. As to giving more official control in the case of a voluntary arrangement, if that means adding more expense we are opposed to it; what is wanted is the stricter enquiry of a bankruptcy, at the cost of a voluntary winding up. It is evident this could be done, as trustees in a voluntary arrangement do not work for nothing. On the other hand, in a bankruptcy everything seems to be done to add to the expense of realisation, and the last persons considered are the creditors.

CLECKHEATON.—We cannot recommend either an official audit or official control over the assets. We suggest (a) that a trustee should be required to give security to cover the value of the estate likely to come into his hands, the premium being refunded out of the estate on the proper completion of his duties; (b) that a trustee be required to open a separate banking account for every estate of which he is trustee and to pay into that account all moneys coming to his hands; (c) that his accounts should be produced every six months for auditing by the committee of inspection (if any).

COVENTRY.—In order that the Court may have, in case of fraud, ultimate authority over all trustees, and control over the assets in their hands, it is recommended that all voluntary arrangements and compositions should be under the Act, but with express provisions to leave the practical management to the creditors and the trustees, unless the creditors request the Court to take a dilatory, or negligent, or defaulting trustee in hand.

The creditors should have the power to say whether there shall be a composition or arrangement or liquidation without actual bankruptcy, and without public examination.

The Court should, however, have the power, despite the decision of the creditors to the contrary, to order bankruptcy if, on the report of the Official Receiver, there is believed to have been on the part of the debtor fraud, which the creditors are disposed to overlook.

The creditors, in all cases where bankruptcy does not ensue, should have power, by a majority of two-thirds in number, to grant the debtor's discharge.

The creditors, by resolution of a majority in number, should have the right to report the debtor under a voluntary assignment or composition to the Court for negligence in trading, or not keeping proper books of account, recklessness in trading, or fraud, whereupon the debtor should undergo public examination and be liable to the same provisions as in bankruptcy.

Trustees' accounts should be officially audited.

Trustees' and solicitors' bills should be taxed by the Registrar. Trustees should furnish security in all cases.

CROYDON.—In the opinion of this chamber no official audit of the trustee's accounts under private arrangements or official control over the assets in his hands is necessary. An audit by a committee of inspection appointed from amongst the creditors would, in the opinion of this chamber, be less costly, more speedy and equally effective.

DERBY.—In the event of a receiving order being applied for in a case where a certain majority in number and value of the creditors have approved a deed of composition or a deed of assignment to a trustee for the benefit of creditors, the Court should have power to refuse to make a receiving order. Further, that the proper costs of a trustee under a deed (if appointed by the creditors) should, if bankruptcy supervenes, be paid out of the estate, and a reasonable allowance be made to the trustee for his remuneration, and that the trustee under a deed should be eligible for the trusteeship in bankruptcy, and also that a trustee under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors should have the powers conferred on the Official Receiver or a trustee in bankruptcy by Section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 for the discovery of the debtor's estate.

HALIFAX.—In order that the Court may have in case of fraud, ultimate authority over all trustees, and control over the assets in their hands, it is recommended that all voluntary arrangements and compositions should be under the Act, but with express provisions to leave the practical management to the creditors and the trustees, unless the creditors request the Court to take a dilatory or negligent or defaulting trustee in hand.

The creditors should have the power to say whether there shall be a composition, or arrangement, or liquidation, without actual bankruptcy, and without public examination.

The Court should, however, have the power, despite the decision of the creditors to the contrary, to order bankruptcy if, on the report of the Official Receiver, there is believed to have been on the part of the debtor fraud, which the creditors are disposed to overlook.

The creditors in all cases where bankruptcy does not ensue, should have power, by a majority of two-thirds in number, to grant the debtor's discharge.

The creditors, by resolution of a majority in number, should have the right to report the debtor under a voluntary assignment or composition to the Court for negligence in trading, or not keeping proper books of account, recklessness in trading, or fraud, whereupon the debtor should undergo public examination, and be liable to the same provisions as in bankruptcy.

Trustees' accounts should be officially audited.

Trustees' and solicitors' bills should be taxed by the Registrar.

Trustees should furnish security in all cases.

HULL.—There should be an official audit of all assignments; the assets should be under the control of the inspection committee. It is desirable that the economy of assignment should be united with the security of an official audit; the trustee ought to give security and to apply to the Board of Trade for his release as in bankruptcy; and the debtor should be obliged to obtain a certificate from the Judge in Bankruptcy, who should have power to withhold such certificate for a specified time if a creditor or the trustee furnish adequate cause.

LEEDS.—No answer.

LIVERPOOL.—The committee consider it would be an advantage to the creditors if the trustee were compelled to issue to all creditors a statement of affairs, and, at the conclusion of the realisation, an account of his receipts and payments; also if he were compelled to pay all moneys of the estate into a special banking account, and to furnish in every case a guarantee bond for such amount as should be decided by the creditors, the premium thereof being paid for out of the estate.

See also answer to Question 4, ante, page 360.

LONDON.—The law in reference to voluntary arrangements between debtors and creditors requires amendment to meet the views of the commercial community, and the committee make the following recommendations in regard thereto:—

(a) Every arranging debtor should be compelled to convene a meeting of his creditors within seven days of suspending payment of his debts, such meeting to be held at the place and time most convenient to the majority of the creditors for £10 and upwards.

(b) At such meeting the majority of the creditors or their representatives should appoint a chairman, whose duty should be to see that the resolutions come to are duly recorded and signed. He should also verify by affidavit the correctness of the same and of the list of creditors present or represented.

(c) The issuing of notice of meetings to the creditors should operate as a stay of proceedings until after the meeting so as to obviate the necessity of an assignment to prevent the goods of the debtor from being taken in execution. Such notice should constitute an "act of bankruptcy," but such "act" should not be available for the purpose of a bankruptcy petition until seven days after the meeting, and then only in the event of the creditors failing to pass a resolution or appoint a trustee.

(d) No trustee should be appointed prior to the meeting of creditors; the majority in number and value of the creditors present or represented and entitled to vote thereat should make the appointment subject to the proposed trustee giving proper security by bond of a guarantee society named in the resolution and deed, the cost of such guarantee to be paid out of the estate.

(e) The committee of inspection should be selected from creditors or their representatives who need not necessarily be in the regular employ of the creditors whom they represent

(f) The committee should not be entitled to any payment out of the estate beyond the amount of their out-of-pocket expenses.

(g) The trustee should be compelled to issue a report to the creditors within four months of the date of his appointment and pay a dividend within six months of such date, provided there are funds in hand available for the purpose.

(h) Any deed providing for the payment of any creditor (other than preferential creditors) in full should be void, and as soon as a deed has been assented to by a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors it should no longer be available as an "act of bankruptcy."

(i) After a debtor has in pursuance of a resolution of his creditors passed at a duly convened meeting executed a deed of assignment or arrangement he should in no circumstances be allowed to apply for a receiving order against himself.

(j) The officer to certify that the resolutions have been assented to by the requisite majority of the creditors of the debtor, and to check all other matters, should be the Registrar of the Court.

(k) A deed of arrangement to which a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors have assented should be binding on all the creditors.

(l) The bills of costs of all solicitors in connection with deeds of arrangement should be taxed in the same way as in bankruptcy, and the trustee's accounts should be audited by a majority of the committee of inspection or in such manner as they shall direct, and their certificate should be final, subject to the right of the trustee to submit his accounts, duly verified, to a general meeting of creditors for their approval and audit, and a resolution of the creditors approving the accounts passed by a majority in number and three-fourths in value should be binding.

The committee see grave objections to making the Board of Trade the authority for auditing the trustee's accounts and supervising the trustees under arrangements outside bankruptcy.

The procedure above recommended for private arrangements will in the opinion of the committee be found much cheaper and more satisfactory than that of the Board of Trade and its officers.

The intervention of the Board of Trade in private arrangements, outside bankruptcy, is strongly deprecated, as that department is very expensive from a creditor's point of view. The creditors are the persons chiefly interested and if they decide on a deed of assignment or composition they should have entire control over the estate free from all official intervention.

There should be power under every deed for the creditors to cause a new meeting to be held for the purpose of removing a trustee and appointing another in in his place, such power to be exercised by a majority in value of the creditors.

The chamber are of opinion that the fact of a trustee having acted bona fide under a deed of assignment he should not be debarred from acting when bankruptcy ensues if the creditors so desire his appointment.

If any person is aggrieved by any act or decision of a majority of creditors passed at a general meeting, or by the trustee, or the committee of inspection of an estate which is being wound up under the Deeds of Arrangement Act, he (the creditor) may appeal to the Court, and the Court may confirm, or reverse, or modify the decision, act, or matter complained of, and make such order as it thinks just. Provided always that such application be made within fourteen days from the taking place of the decision complained of. This will, in the opinion of the chamber, give ample protection to minorities as against majorities.

(The intention of the above being to confer upon parties interested analogous rights to those acts existing in Sections 138, C.A. 1864, and Section 24, C.A. 1900, in regard to companies in liquidation.)

That voluntary arrangements under the existing statute have worked satisfactorily and economically to the advantage of the trading community, and that this chamber would deprecate any alteration in the law which would put the terms and conditions of voluntary arrangements or compositions or the assets of debtors' estates under official control.

LUTON.—Any amendment of the law relating to deeds of arrangement should provide for the following :—

The trustee under the deed should be compelled to issue an intimation of the execution of the deed to all creditors of whom he has knowledge as shown by the debtor's affidavit.

That he should file in addition to the papers at present required, (1) copy of notice above referred to, (2) affidavit of postage, and (3) cover note of approved guarantee society for the estimated value of the assets.

That the trustee shall have power at any time after receiving assents of a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors to apply to the Court to confirm the deed, giving notice of such application to outstanding or dissenting creditors. The Court to have full power of enquiry and adjournment, and discretion as to confirmation. Dissenting creditors to be entitled to represent to the Court, in writing, their objections to the confirmation.

The deed, if confirmed, to be binding on all parties, and the debtor to be unable to file his own petition in respect of the debts included in the assignment.

Where deed voided by subsequent bankruptcy, unless in the opinion of the Court the estate has been wrongfully or negligently administered, the Trustee to be treated as an agent and not as a trespasser and his acts admitted. Particularly that no debtor to an estate paying money to the trustee under the deed should be liable to be sued by the trustee in bankruptcy.

Subject to the foregoing the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act should apply, and the power of disclaimer given to trustees in bankruptcy should also apply.

The accounts of trustees under deeds should be subject to the same audit as in bankruptcy.

The funds should not, except in very small estates, be paid into the trustee's private account, but be kept in a separate account at the bank. All unclaimed dividends to be paid to the Board of Trade on the final audit of accounts.

A trustee should be compelled to issue to all creditors on closing the estate a summary of receipts and payments, and file a copy with the Board of Trade with his final accounts.

Any failure to comply with the monetary clauses should lead to punishment and deprivation of office.

MANCHESTER.—The board suggest that it is not desirable to place any obstacle in the way of a debtor and his creditors making an arrangement between themselves where so minded. The interests of the public appear to be safeguarded by the publicity of registration.

The board would, however, welcome an enactment :—

(a) That a trustee under a deed of assignment must provide security in an amount approximate to the estimated realisation, the cost of such guarantee to be borne by the estate.

(b) That such a trustee must report to the committee, if any, every two months, or to the creditors every three months, until he has held a final meeting of creditors and presented his final account thereto.

(c) A provision that a copy of this final account should be filed.

The board also consider that some legislative provision should be made to the following effect :—

(a) To enable a majority in number, and a large majority (for instance, five-sixths) in amount of a body of creditors to bind a dissentient minority to the terms of a deed of assignment or composition, possibly with a right to the dissentient minority to apply to the Court.

(b) To require that every trustee under a deed of assignment shall be approved of by a substantial proportion of creditors (say not less than one-half in value of the amount sworn to by the debtor as his estimated liabilities).

(c) To provide some easy, inexpensive and speedy procedure to compel a trustee to convene meetings of creditors, submit accounts, and divide the estate.

At present the law is in a very unsatisfactory condition: one example out of many is attached to this as an illustration.

The following is an instance of the difficulty of dealing with a defaulting trustee under deed of arrangement :—

"In November, 1902, the creditors of a draper in Yorkshire received a circular from a person who described himself as an 'accountant and auditor, professional trustee in bankruptcy, and under deeds of arrangement, collector of rents and debts, insurance broker and bailiff by special appointment under the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888 to 1896, to levy distresses for rent in England and Wales.' The circular announced that the debtor had executed a deed of assignment to the person issuing the circular as trustee and asked for assents of the creditors thereto, the liabilities being stated at £338 and the assets at £237. The Manchester creditors sent down their accountant to investigate, and ultimately, to avoid the expense of bankruptcy and on the undertaking of the trustee to pay all moneys into the bank to a joint account of himself and the representative of the Manchester creditors, the deed was accepted and the trustee realised the estate. He, however, failed to open a joint account as he had undertaken to do, or to divide the proceeds when he had realised the assets. Repeated letters were written to him by several of the creditors and their accountant, and ultimately by their solicitor, insisting upon the matter being disposed of forthwith. To these the trustee kept replying, making various excuses for the delay, and promises to divide forthwith, none of which promises he kept. Accordingly proceedings were instituted against him in the local County Court to compel him to furnish an account and pay over the moneys in his hands, the principal creditors paying the solicitors. Taxed costs of these proceedings amounted to £29 15s. 4d. Upon this an order was made for an account which he ultimately furnished, and he was directed to pay over the balance appearing thereby to be in his hands, viz. : £53 odd, and to pay the costs of the proceedings. Whilst these proceedings were pending, however, a prosecution was instituted against him for fraudulent misappropriation of moneys collected by him. Upon this charge he was committed for trial at the assizes, but was acquitted. He was, on his own petition, then made a bankrupt, having previously paid in full the sum he was charged with embezzling.

"The nominee of the creditors was authorised by the Court to prove on the estate for the sum of £53, the balance of the estate, and he ultimately received the sum of £5 2s. 8d., being a dividend thereon of 2s. in the £.

"It may be pointed out that had the appointment of the trustee been subject to the approval of a majority in value of the creditors the estate would have been realised by their nominee and the proceeds of realisation would have been properly divided, while if the trustee had been bound to furnish security, the balance of the trustee's cash account and the costs of the proceedings could have been recovered."

PORTSMOUTH.—No answer.

READING.—That the provisions of the laws relating to voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors, should be amended so as to place the debtor and the trustee under any such arrangements or composition, and the terms and conditions of the arrangements or composition more under control and provide for official audits of the trustee's accounts and official control over the assets in his hands. Provided no attempt is made to prevent private arrangements and that the creditors are called together within a limited time to receive a report on the estate.

SHEFFIELD.—The Sheffield Chamber divides this subject into two heads.

(a) Compositions made with creditors after receiving order has been made and which compositions can, as the law stands at present, only be carried into effect with the approval of the Court.

(b) Arrangements made with creditors entirely outside the Court.

As to (a) At present no application can be made to the Court to approve a scheme until after the conclusion of the public examination and the scheme must also provide for payment of at least 7s. 6d. in the £. The Sheffield Chamber recommend that a four-fifths majority in value of the unsecured creditors should be given power to decide whether any public examination should be held or not, because there is no reason why when a proposal for a scheme is put forward that there shall be a cast iron rule that there must be a public examination. The chamber also consider that all the creditors whose debts are at least £2 ought to be able to accept a composition scheme without the consent of the Court at all and without any specific minimum sum in the £.

As to (b) That a four-fifths majority in value of unsecured creditors ought to be at liberty to bind a dissentient minority to accept a deed of assignment or arrangement, because very often two or three creditors by standing out either throw over altogether a beneficial scheme of arrangement or obtain a preference over the other creditors by getting paid out in full.

Let any dissatisfied creditor have a right of appealing to the County Court Judge providing :

1. That his debt is at least £10.
2. That he deposits £25 in Court as security.
3. That a majority in value of unsecured creditors present at a meeting to which all the creditors have been summoned ought to be entitled to compel the trustee under a deed of assignment to give security for the due administration of the property coming into his hands by way of a guarantee policy in some reputable society or by depositing in the County Court some sum in cash.

As the law stands there is no account into which unclaimed dividends under a deed of assignment or arrangement may be paid but it is submitted that there ought to be some special fund into which these unclaimed dividends can be paid.

That in the event of a deed of assignment or arrangement being upset by bankruptcy, any bona fide transaction of the trustee under the deed should be protected. Very often a trustee will not sell before the three months have gone by but in any case he has to hold the proceeds until this period has elapsed.

It is suggested that as soon as possible after the deed has been executed a trustee should call a meeting of the creditors and that a four-fifths majority in value of the unsecured creditors should be entitled to decide that the deed should be binding and that the estate should not be thrown into bankruptcy.

That the accounts of trustees under these deeds should be audited to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade.

That a trustee under a deed of assignment or arrangement should be eligible to be trustee in bankruptcy in case the deed is upset by bankruptcy, as he probably knows more about the estate than anybody else, and why should not the creditors be able to appoint him trustee in bankruptcy ?

SOUTH OF SCOTLAND.—It is not thought that it would be in the interests of creditors to bring voluntary arrangements under official control ; indeed it is doubted whether it would be possible to do so. If an arrangement entered into is not found to be working satisfactorily, or if the debtor is refusing to give full information as to his estate, the creditors have a remedy in their own hands, by being able at any time to apply for sequestration. No majority of the creditors can in a voluntary arrangement bind the others, and any one creditor has it in his power to bring the winding up under official control.

It is thought that it would be an improvement that might be effected at a small cost if provision were made for audit of the trustee's accounts by the accountant of Court.

TORQUAY.—That in view of the Registrar-General's report that in the great majority of cases the trusts of deeds of arrangement are honestly and efficiently carried out, there is no reason for imposing further official control upon the trustees of such deeds.

WAKEFIELD.—The debtor should be more under the control of the trustee and committee, but an increase of official control over the trustee would appear to be generally unnecessary and would add greatly to the expense of the most efficient method of realising the estate.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The chamber is of opinion that private arrangements should be discouraged, and that the estates of insolvent debtors should be administered in bankruptcy.

WORCESTER.—Your committee heartily agree with this suggestion, and consider that all such arrangements or compositions should be under the control of local Official Receivers to the extent of the proceedings thereunder being scrutinised by them as a matter of course, and the trustees' accounts officially audited. With these provisions it would not appear necessary for the assets to be under official control also.

9. Whether the existing laws which prescribe the registration of certain classes of securities given by debtors should be extended, so as to include, and apply to, general assignments of book debts, hiring agreements and other forms of securities which are at present exempt from registration.

BARNSLEY.—The extension of the registration of certain classes of securities given by debtors would seem to be an undoubted benefit, prescribing the registration of assignment of book debts, hiring agreements, and other forms of securities at present exempt from registration.

BIRMINGHAM.—No answer.

BLACKBURN.—No answer.

BRISTOL.—No answer.

BRADFORD.—Assignment of book debts should be placed on the same footing as assignments of other personal estate, and should therefore be invalid against creditors unless registered. Hiring agreements of machinery, plant, or furniture used by a trader in his business should be registered, this being the one way of giving to persons dealing with such persons the opportunity of knowing that these assets do not belong to him. Deeds Registries.—Provisions similar to those of the Yorkshire Registry should be made throughout the country, so that persons dealing with the mortgagor may be able to ascertain the existence of the security.

BRIGHOUSE.—In common fairness to all traders no one should be allowed to assign any part of his assets in favour of any one creditor without adequate notice through some recognised channel.

CLECKHEATON.—We consider that assignments of book debts should be registered.

COVENTRY.—Yes, all general assignments (as distinguished from specific assignments) by a trader of either present or future book debts should be registered, or provision should be made that all securities upon personal property capable of falling within the order and disposition, and which securities are not now governed by the Bills of Sale Act, should be registered where possession remains in the mortgagor.

Such registers should be kept in the County Court of the district so that they may be readily consulted.

Ordinary hiring agreements either with or without the option of purchase should not be registered.

CROYDON.—In the opinion of this chamber it is not desirable to extend the existing laws so as to include the registration of general assignments of book debts, but this chamber would welcome any extension of the law which included a satisfactory system of the registration of hiring agreements.

DERBY.—It is not necessary to provide for the registration of such securities as hiring agreements, assignments of book debts and the like.

HALIFAX.—Yes, all general assignments (as distinguished from specific assignments) by a trader of either present or future book debts should be registered, or provision should be made that all securities upon personal property capable of falling within the order and disposition, and which securities are not now governed by the Bills of Sale Act, should be registered, where possession remains in the mortgagor.

Such registers should be kept in the County Court of the district so that they may be readily consulted.

HULL.—All securities should be registered and within a very short period of being given.

LEEDS.—Registration should be required of any assignment of future debts of a person.

LIVERPOOL.—The Committee recommend that the existing laws which prescribe the registration of certain classes of securities given by debtors should be extended to include and apply to general assignments of book debts.

LONDON.—We strongly recommend that a system of registration is urgently needed in all cases of assignments of book debts, and we are also of opinion that registration would be advantageous in the case of hiring arrangements, whether entered into by traders or non-traders.

LUTON.—General assignments of book debts and hire agreements of plant and fixed machinery should be registered.

It is difficult to see how hire agreements, furniture and domestic machinery, such as sewing machines can be registered without practically abolishing the hire trade. If registration of hire agreements in respect of furniture is contemplated they should not be for less than say £30.

MANCHESTER.—The Board suggest that a mortgage or assignment of trade debts should be required to be registered in the same manner as a bill of sale of chattels.

PORTSMOUTH.—The existing laws which prescribe the registration of certain classes of securities given by debtors should be extended so as to include and apply to hiring agreements.

READING.—The existing laws which prescribe the registration of certain classes of securities given by debtors should be extended so as to include and apply to general assignments of book debts, hiring arrangements, and other forms of securities which are at present exempt from registration.

SHEFFIELD.—The Sheffield Chamber have on several occasions considered the subject of general assignments of book debts, and they have no hesitation whatever in saying that assignments of book debts ought in every case to be registered as bills of sale. Very often it may be known that a man who has been trading has some real good book debts, and frequently, with this knowledge, creditors have either withheld their hands in pressing the debtor, or they have sold some additional goods, and then perhaps the crash comes and it is found that some individual, or it may be a bank, holds an assignment of the book debts. No registration is at present required, and the only people who know of the assignment are the persons to whom notice of the assignment has been given, viz., those persons who owe money to the debtor.

Hiring agreements ought to be registered, and in case of bankruptcy all hired goods in the possession of the bankrupt should form part of the bankrupt's estate unless protected by an agreement registered like a bill of sale.

SOUTH OF SCOTLAND.—The law of Scotland in regard to securities over moveable property stands in a much better position from a creditor's point of view than does the law of England. In Scotland it is impossible to create a security over personal property such as furniture, jewellery, etc., without delivery of the security subjects to the creditor. General assignments of book debts are not possible in Scotland. Certain particular debts might be assigned, but the amounts would be fixed as at the date of the assignment, and the creditor would have to complete his title to them by intimation of the assignment to each debtor, so as to put the debtors in bad faith in paying their debts to the original creditor, or to any one other than the assignee.

With regard to hiring agreements, it is thought that this form of doing business should not be facilitated, as it tempts people, especially of the working class, to order more goods than they are in a position to pay for, in the hope that by the time the later instalments fall due they will be in a better position. It would be very difficult to formulate a system of registration to cover all hiring agreements which would be of practical service to tradesmen.

TORQUAY.—It is desirable to make hire purchase agreements and general assignments of book debts registerable documents.

WAKEFIELD.—Hiring agreements should be registered, but not others.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—Yes.

WORCESTER.—The registration of securities is not always an unmixed advantage of trade, but your Committee consider that the advantages of registering a general assignment of book-debts would outweigh the drawbacks.

The following observations were offered by the undermentioned Chambers of Commerce upon subjects not specially referred to the Committee for consideration.

BIRMINGHAM.

Appointment of Official Receivers.

It appears to be inadvisable to appoint as Official Receivers men who may also be engaged in private professional practice, and that the law should therefore be amended so as to provide that the Board of Trade shall not appoint Official Receivers except to give their whole time to the duties and act entirely as Officers of the Court. If some districts are insufficient to employ an official solely as an Official Receiver, adjoining districts could be absorbed.

Official Receivers should also be paid by salary as in some cases, and not as in others by a commission upon the assets realised.

Acts of Bankruptcy.

Section 4 (c) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which reads as follows:—

"If in England or elsewhere he makes any conveyance or transfer of his property, or any part thereof, or creates any charge thereon," should have the words which follow deleted, "which would under this or any other Act be void as a fraudulent preference if he were adjudged bankrupt," so that where a debtor gives a bill of sale or other charge (excluding mortgages on real or leasehold property) over his property, it would be a sufficient act of bankruptcy on which to file a petition.

Section 4 (h) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provides that an act of bankruptcy is committed if a debtor gives notice to any of his creditors that he has suspended, or that he is about to suspend, payment of his debts, should be supplemented by the provision that an act of bankruptcy is also committed "if he has convened a meeting of his creditors, either by himself or through his solicitor, and submits a statement of his affairs," as at the present time notices convening meetings are sometimes worded so as not to convey notice of suspension of payment, when no doubt it is intended to include such a proceeding.

If at a meeting a debtor submits a statement of his affairs power should be given to the creditors to apply for adjudication as a bankrupt without the present delay of 14 days.

A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy if execution against him has been levied by seizure of his goods under process in an action in any Court or in any civil proceeding in the High Court, and the goods have been either sold or held by the Sheriff for twenty-one days, but it would be advisable if the period were reduced to five days, and the goods have been announced to be sold by the Sheriff. This would have the advantage of preventing a sale by auction, and consequently the expense would be saved, as where a Sheriff holds the goods for five days he is entitled to announce a sale.

Section 103 (5) provides that "in lieu of committal of a judgment debtor, the Court may, if it thinks fit, decline to commit, and in lieu thereof, with the consent of the judgment creditor, make a receiving order against the debtor." Instead of remaining in the discretion of the Judge, and only applicable to Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction, it should be compulsory for a receiving order to be made where a debtor's liabilities exceed £50, in view of the tendency of County Court Judges to abolish committing debtors to prison in default of orders for payment for instalments. Several cases transpire where debtors dispose of their business to a nominee, leaving no remedy at present except the County Court procedure. The difficulty of obtaining an order and commitment in the event of non-payment leaves the creditor with practically no remedy for the recovery of his account.

Bankruptcy Petitions.

Section 7 (2) of the Act of 1883, which provides that before making a receiving order the Court shall require proof of the act of bankruptcy, should be amended so as to provide that proof be only required where the act of bankruptcy alleged in the petition is disputed. It should be sufficient proof of same if substantiated in an affidavit by the petitioning creditors, unless it is set out by the debtor in his defence that he disputes the act of bankruptcy. This would have the effect of lessening the costs of bankruptcy, which at the present time are so very excessive.

The Section which provides that a creditor's petition shall not be withdrawn without the leave of the Court should be amended so as to provide that such leave shall only be granted if the Court is satisfied that the petitioning creditor has not received payment of the whole, or any portion of his debt, or entered into an arrangement to withdraw same for a consideration either by the debtor or third parties where a deed of assignment has been executed by the debtor, as it is contended that in some cases creditors file a petition and very often receive an advantage which is not shared by the creditors who have assented to the deed.

Proofs of Debt.

A simpler form of proof of debt should be issued to the creditors, and instead of being sworn before the Trustee or a Commissioner for Oaths, should be declared by the creditor himself, or in case of a firm by one of the partners. At the present time these proofs are usually made by a clerk, who has little or no knowledge of the debt which he or she swears is justly and truly owing, and a declaration would overcome this difficulty, as under the provisions of the present Act it is a risky proceeding for a creditor to file a false claim.

Proxies.

Proxies used for meetings of creditors are only in exceptional cases correctly completed. A creditor should be entitled to give a general proxy to any other creditor whose claim amounts to not less than £20 in the same manner as he can give one at present to a manager or clerk in his regular employment. At present where given by a third party the proxy has to set out the resolutions in anticipation which the proxy can vote for, and the proxy must be filled in by the creditor himself, or by a clerk in his regular employment, who has to complete a certificate at the foot of the proxy. It should be sufficient for a creditor to sign it in person providing he declares he signed it after the body of the proxy was filled in.

Debts Provable in Bankruptcy.

At the present time the creditor is only entitled to prove for costs incurred by him before a receiving order where he has signed judgment, or is in a position to sign judgment at the date of the receiving order, consequently by this restriction a creditor who has incurred costs and the time for judgment has not expired at the date of the receiving order is not even entitled to prove for the costs and accept the dividend thereon.

This requires amending to enable a creditor who has instituted County Court proceedings, or issued a writ, at any time before a receiving order, to be entitled to prove upon the estate for the costs incurred, and accept dividend along with his debt.

Meetings of Creditors.

Meetings of creditors should follow as quickly as possible after a receiving order so that the costs of holding possession by the Official Receiver, and the consequent depreciation of the assets, should be limited as far as possible. Instead of the present fourteen days (which is very often extended) the first meeting should take place within ten days of the receiving order.

To enable this to be carried out the debtor should be required to supply within four days of the receiving order a list of his creditors with their respective addresses, and the meeting could then be convened to be held after the lapse of a further period of six days, before which time the debtor should be required to file his statement of affairs. It is only in exceptional cases that this requirement could not be carried out. The statement could then be considered at the meeting, and copies afterwards furnished to the creditors together with the Official Receiver's and Trustee's report upon the same.

Only creditors for amounts of over £10 should be entitled to vote in the bankruptcy as is the case in Irish matters, so that forms of proxy should only be issued to creditors above that amount. It is very rarely that creditors under £10 trouble to take part in the meeting.

Composition or Schemes in the Bankruptcy.

At present only in rare cases is any scheme of composition attempted to be carried through after bankruptcy proceedings have been instituted owing to the formality and expenses attendant upon compositions in bankruptcy.

It should be sufficient where a debtor intends to make a proposal for composition in satisfaction of his debts, that the Official Receiver should hold a meeting of bona fide creditors and a copy of the proposals should be sent to them, and if at that meeting a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the bona fide creditors over £10 resolve to accept the proposal, same should be duly accepted by the creditors, and be binding without the approval of the Court, providing such proposal provides reasonable security for a composition of not less than 10s. in the £.

This is suggested to simplify a satisfactory composition in bankruptcy without the delay attendant on a public examination, which delay and publicity at present prevents the satisfactory working of any composition scheme under the present Act.

Public Examinations.—General.

To avoid the legal expenses attendant upon a public examination, and the very heavy shorthand writers' charges at present existing (which should under any circumstances be reduced), the public examination of a debtor should not necessarily take place where his affairs appear to be straightforward, and a full discharge has been made, but that it should take place upon an application from the Official Receiver or Trustee of an estate, or a bona fide trade creditor for £50 or over. This would enable Official Receivers and Trustees to examine a bankrupt upon oath where they were not satisfied with the conduct of the bankrupt or his dealing with the estate, and the Registrars should have power to commit a bankrupt for contempt in cases where a bankrupt trifles with the Court, as has transpired recently in cases of bankrupt solicitors before the Birmingham Court.

Trustees' Remuneration.

This Act requires amendment to the extent that the commission payable to trustees shall be a fixed amount on the assets realised as on the dividend distributed. In view of the fact that Official Receivers, architects, auctioneers and valuers' charges are passed by a fixed percentage it would be the better course for a percentage to be fixed for trustees' remuneration, and the following payment is suggested :—Under £1,000, 5 per cent. on the net assets realised and 5 per cent. upon the dividend distributed. Where the net assets realised amount to more than £1,000 the remuneration should be fixed by the committee of inspection. At the present time the question of remuneration of trustees seems to depend upon the friendly attitude or otherwise of the committee of inspection, and a great difference in charges is continually observed in the realisation of estates, some trustees being paid double ; one receiving a very high percentage for a small amount of work, and others a small percentage for a large amount of work.

Trustees' travelling and hotel expenses should be limited by a scale of so much per day, trustees' first-class railway fare and clerks' third-class fares and expenses.

Fees.

The costs of filing a petition in bankruptcy at the present time are excessive, and where a debtor has divested himself of his estate it is very rarely that creditors are disposed to contribute the amount required for the purpose of filing a petition in bankruptcy. As the law stands at present, the debtor without assets stands a better chance of getting off without investigation owing to the expense.

When the assets amount to less than £1,000 the stamp of £5 on the petition (which under the old Act was only £1) is too high, and should be reduced to £1, while the creditor should not be called upon to pay an additional £5 as deposit to the Official Receiver in case the assets are insufficient to cover the Official Receiver's expenses.

The charges made by Official Receivers of 1s. for the notice of a first or other meeting of creditors should not apply to creditors under £10. Neither 1s. for each creditor for the use of the room to whom notice has been given of such meeting. A small estate may have a large number of small creditors, while a large one may only have a few, and the fees in the former class work out on this basis at the heavier rate. Neither of these fees should be paid where creditor's claims are under £10.

Official Receivers' expenses are too heavy as at present existing, and by the time a trust ee is appointed a large amount as a rule stands to the d ebit of the estate.

Property Passing to a Trustee.

Very often when a trustee is appointed it is ascertained that a large portion of the assets are claimed by specific creditors as having been sent on "sale or return," or approval, and trade customs are now being created on the same lines in respect of machinery, stock, safes, etc. The sending of goods on sale or return in the first place was with the view of giving the trader an opportunity of returning them if he did not wish to purchase, but now it has resolved itself into one or more creditors protecting themselves at the expense of the general body. If the trader sells goods which are supplied on sale or return the creditor can only prove for the amount, and as the debtor holds them for sale prior to his bankruptcy, they should after having been held for a period of 14 days be considered as assets, and pass to the trustee in the event of bankruptcy if they are not sold.

As an alternative it is important that the goods should be registered as a bill of sale and a time limit fixed for the return of same.

Where a builder erects a house on contract the building materials and loose goods belonging to the builder at the time of his bankruptcy ought to pass to the trustee as devisable assets. Proprietors in the contract very often stipulate that building materials and other effects of a builder on the ground, in the event of possession having to be taken of the property, should also pass to the proprietor, but this is obviously unfair to the creditors of the estate, unless registered as an ordinary bill of sale.

The conveyance or transfer of property to a creditor by a bankrupt ought to be void without proof that it was the intention to prefer the creditor, providing such conveyance or transfer is made within six months of the bankruptcy, and is not within the ordinary scope of the debtor's business.

Cases are continually being met with where debtors have given an assignment of book debts, or forwarded stock in bulk to relatives or others in payment of alleged claims with the view of preferring the particular creditor, and the onus on the trustee, that it was the debtor's intention to prefer the creditor is very difficult to prove, and the present time limit of three months gives the debtor the opportunity of allowing this time to elapse by deferring filing his petition until same has existed above the period.

Where debtors assign book debts as security for money owing, the assignee can complete the assignment by giving notice to the debtors any time prior to the bankruptcy, and this prevents the debt passing to the trustee, and by collusion of the debtor, the assignee being probably a friendly creditor, no difficulty is experienced in this. A clause should be inserted that notice of an assignment should have been given by the assignee to the party owing the debt of at least one month prior to the bankruptcy, and the assignment should be registered under the Bills of Sale Act in the same way as a charge given upon moveable effects.

Any settlement of property made on the wife or children after marriage is good against the trustee, providing the parties claiming under the settlement prove that the settlor was solvent at the time of making the settlement, but in cases where no books of account have been kept or the transactions cannot be traced back, no difficulty is, as a rule, placed upon the party claiming the goods to show that the business was solvent at the time.

Household furniture and other property should in every case pass to the trustee where a settlement has been made after marriage. In most cases at the present time the furniture is claimed by the wife upon some statement that it has been purchased by her (without any documentary proof) probably from moneys saved from an allowance made to her by the husband prior to the failure.

The bankruptcy of a debtor relates back to three months preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition, so that the trustee is entitled to investigate fraudulent transactions which have taken place within the three months, but this time limit is too short, and should be about 12 months.

Payments into Bankruptcy Estates Account.

Trustees having given security against any misappropriation of moneys of an estate, the formality and delay of paying into the bankruptcy estates account at the Bank of England, and applying to the Board of Trade to issue cheques, should be dispensed with, and the trustee authorised to make his payments into and out of a special account opened at a local bank as the committee of inspection may select. Any interest receivable in respect of the account to be part of the assets of the estate.

Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy:

Wages.

In view of the large amount of preferential payments invariably shewn by the summary of realisation the preference now given to a clerk or servant of four months before the date of receiving order should be reduced to one month, and the same in respect of wages to any labourer or workman which stands at two months.

Rent.

The limit of six months' rent now existing should be reduced to one period of rent, namely:—Where weekly tenancy, one week; monthly, one month; annually, one quarter; the same to have become due and payable prior to the date of the receiving order. In the event of the landlord having distrained for a longer period, and the bailiffs being in possession at the time of the bankruptcy proceedings, such amended time only to apply, and in cases where rent is payable in advance such power of distress for future rent should not be exercised after the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, but the trustee to pay for use and occupation during the time he holds the possession of the premises.

Gas and Water.

Some of the Gas Companies or Corporations have powers of distress without legal process, and in such cases the items are payable in full in the bankruptcy. These Companies or Corporations should be placed on an equal footing and rank for dividend with the other creditors where distress is levied at the time of the bankruptcy.

Debtors Act, 1869.

The Act as it at present stands covers a wide area, ut its effectiveness is curtailed by the fact that after most of the provisions it is stipulated that they only apply "unless the jury is satisfied that the bankrupt had no intention to defraud," and these words should be deleted from the Act, as owing to their retention it is very difficult to get a conviction under such circumstances, and very rarely are proceedings adopted under the Act.

The time limit of four months before the bankruptcy should also be extended to twelve months, and where a debtor disposes of goods by pawning or by sending to auction sales within such a period, providing such goods have not been paid for, he should be guilty of a misdemeanour under the Act.

It should also be a misdemeanour for a debtor, being a trader, to dispose of goods except in the ordinary way of his trade, in bulk, without keeping an account showing the particulars of such goods, and any person receiving the goods without an account should be guilty as accessory to the transaction.

Provision should also be made for the prosecution of debtors who have not kept proper books showing their position at any time within three years of the bankruptcy, and where, being insolvent, they engage in betting transactions or rash or hazardous speculations which have contributed to the bankruptcy.

The limit of £20 where an undischarged bankrupt obtains goods without disclosing the fact that he is an undischarged bankrupt should be reduced to £5, or £20 in the aggregate, as the £20 limit enables the debtor to get extensive credit for individual amounts from a number of creditors without disclosing the fact that he is an undischarged bankrupt.

Administration Orders.

Provision is made under the present Act for a debtor who is unable to pay the amount of the judgment forthwith, and whose indebtedness does not exceed £50, to apply for administration of his estate and arrangement for payment of his debt by instalments, or otherwise, in full or to such an extent as the County Court consider practicable, and this should also be a provision, not only for the debtor, but given to a creditor of his estate. In view of the tendency of County Court Judges to abolish committal orders in cases where a judgment order has been obtained for payments by instalments, creditors have no other remedy to obtain payment of their assets, or of attaching undisclosed assets which the debtor may have, and this remedy they would have if they could apply for an administration order, as they would thus be able to secure legal access to the estate. A small trader may at present dispose of his business and keep a creditor at arm's length, although probably having means wherewith to pay the debt. The limit of a composition arrangement by the Court should not exceed two years where it appears to the Court that there is reasonable prospect of the debtor being able to pay within that period—subject to the power of the Court on further application to extend that period.

Registration of Partnership Names.

The registration of partnership names of firms carrying on Companies or under different titles is a matter requiring urgent attention. We understand the matter has already been introduced before the proper authorities. At the present time any bankrupt appears to be able to trade under any high-sounding title, and such names as The Colossal Trading Company or The British Manufacturing Company may be merely the trading title of A.B., an undischarged bankrupt, or his wife. Particularly does it refer to the Bankruptcy Act so far as regards a bankrupt trading in the name of his wife, say A. Jones. If his wife is named Elizabeth he may merely alter the name of trading as E. Jones, or perhaps merely as Jones, or Jones and Co. There is nothing to show to the outside world that the business is not his as before. If it was compulsory to put the name in full, as Elizabeth Jones, it would be apparent to the creditors that they were dealing with the wife, and the assumption that the husband was an undischarged bankrupt.

Deeds of Arrangement.

It is considered that the position of large creditors under the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, is at present very unsatisfactory. The large creditors—that is to say, the men who are interested more than others in the preservation of an estate under a Deed of Arrangement, are often defeated in their efforts by the attitude of some of the smaller creditors, who, unless they are paid in full, refuse to assent to the Deed, and throw the estate into bankruptcy. Experience proves that the result of this is to reduce the amount which would otherwise be available for dividend. It is therefore contended that greater power should be placed in the hands of creditors, and that, under certain circumstances, a Deed of Arrangement should be made binding upon all—in other words, that the execution of a Deed of Arrangement within limits to be clearly defined, should be a bar to any subsequent petition in bankruptcy. The following suggestions are made with the view of carrying out this suggested amendment of the law:—

(1) That in the case of all estates where the unsecured liabilities amount to £1,000 or more a Deed of Arrangement assented to by bona fide trade creditors to the amounts of not less than £20 each, and representing in the aggregate at least three-fourths of the total unsecured liabilities, shall be binding upon the whole of the creditors.

(2) That in the case of all estates where the unsecured liabilities amount to not less than £300 nor more than £1,000, a Deed of Arrangement assented to by bona fide trade creditors for amounts of not less than £10 each, and representing in the aggregate at least three-fourths of the total unsecured liabilities, shall be binding upon the whole of the creditors.

It might be deemed necessary to give some appeal either to creditors who would not be able to vote under the above conditions, or who may dissent from the Deed, and in this event it is suggested that this right should only be granted on the ground that under the Deed of Arrangement either their own interests will be unduly prejudiced, that the arrangements under the Deed will be detrimental to the estate, or that the Deed has been secured in a fraudulent manner.

Solicitors' Bills of Costs under Deeds of Assignment should be taxed by the Court in the same way as is provided for by bankruptcy. Very heavy charges are sometimes made by solicitors under Deeds of Assignment, especially where they nominate their own trustee, or vice versa.

At present there is no account into which unclaimed dividends under a Deed of Arrangement may be paid. It is suggested that one should be opened, and that every trustee under a Deed of Assignment should be compelled to pay into such account any unclaimed dividends in his hands at the time of rendering his final statement of accounts. This should also apply retrospectively, so that dividends already in their hands, which must have accumulated to very large sums, should also be paid into the same account.

It is suggested that the remuneration of trustees under Deeds of Arrangement should be the same as that suggested for trustees in bankruptcy.

The accounts of trustees under Deeds of Arrangement should be audited to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade.

Deeds of Arrangement Act.

At the present time a debtor may make a Deed of Assignment for the benefit of his creditors and file a petition any time within three months from the date of the Deed, which will have the effect of rescinding the Deed of Assignment. The result of this is that trustees under a Deed of Assignment are very chary of realising an estate conveyed by a Deed within three months in case the debtor should file his petition, and the trustee may be brought to book by the Official Receiver, and, again, he is unable to distribute the estate until three months have expired, on the same grounds.

This requires amendment, so that a debtor should not be entitled to file his petition except within one month from the date of the Deed, providing that at the expiration of the month the Deed of Assignment has been assented to by creditors representing three-fourths in number and a majority in value of the creditors above £20.

Registration of Judgments.

Although County Court Judgments are registered and appear in the "London Gazette," where not satisfied within fourteen days from the judgment, singularly enough judgments obtained under writs issued in the High Court, though for more substantial amounts, are not registered, and this deficit should be remedied so that all judgments, whether obtained in the High Court or County Court, should duly appear. We expect this was some omission in framing the Act.

BLACKBURN.—We have gone carefully into the question of the attitude which this chamber should take towards the proposed amendments of the Bankruptcy Law, and also considered the Memorandum of Evidence which the Birmingham Chamber propose to submit to the Law Amendment Committee, and as the Birmingham Memorandum deals in a full and comprehensive manner with every point, we think it will assist if for our report we give our views on the proposals set out in their Memorandum.

Appointment of Official Receiver.

We advise the chamber to support the views of the Birmingham Chamber on this head.

Acts of Bankruptcy.

We do not agree that the mere giving of a bill of sale, or merely calling a meeting of creditors by a debtor should constitute an act of bankruptcy. It might work very harshly in some cases. With regard, however, to the other proposals as to what acts should constitute acts of bankruptcy, etc., and the question of making receiving orders in certain cases, we advise the chamber to support the proposed amendments.

Bankruptcy Petitions.

We advise the chamber to support the views of the Birmingham Chamber on this head.

Proof of Debt.

Whilst agreeing that the form of proof of debt should be made simpler, we do not agree that the present requirements as to proof being sworn before a competent authority should be dispensed with.

Proxies.

This is a difficult question, and the proposals of the Birmingham Chamber might bring again into practice the objectionable use of proxies, which caused the present stringent provision to be made. We agree that it should be sufficient for a creditor to sign the proxy in person, with a declaration that the proxy was filled in before he signed it, without requiring him to personally fill in the body of the proxy. In all other respects we do not advise any alteration in the present law.

Debts Provable in Bankruptcy.

We agree with the proposals of the Birmingham Chamber on this head.

Meeting of Creditors.

We agree with the proposals named, excepting that we do not see any reason for depriving a creditor under £10 of his vote.

Composition or Schemes in the Bankruptcy.

We welcome the proposals on this head as valuable amendments. We agree that schemes of composition are rendered almost impossible by the formalities and expense at present attendant upon any such scheme.

Public Examination—General.

We agree with the proposals on this head. There are cases of bankruptcy in which the public examination might well be dispensed with, and so long as the rights of creditors to have such an examination, if thought desirable, are respected there seems good ground for the proposed amendment.

Trustees' Remuneration.

We agree that it is desirable to fix, if possible, the scale of remuneration to trustees, and the scale named seems reasonable, but we should reserve the right to a committee of inspection to increase the scale in small matters where in their opinion the winding-up has been an exceptionally difficult one.

Fees.

We recommend the adoption of the proposals on this head.

Property Passing to Trustee.

With such portions of the recommendation as relate to goods sent on sale or return, and those relating to building, also the recommendation relating to the assignment of book debts, we agree.

With regard to settlement of property on the wife or children after marriage, the statement in the memorandum as to the present legal position does not appear to be complete. A voluntary settlement made on a wife or child after marriage (even though the settlor was solvent at the time) is void against the trustee in bankruptcy if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years, and it is also void if the settlor becomes bankrupt within ten years, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was at the time of making the settlements able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement, and that the interest of the settlor in such property had passed to the trustee of such settlement on the execution thereof. We do not think there is any sufficient call to alter the law as it now stands.

It would also introduce considerable difficulties to bona fide transactions if the bankruptcy related back to a period of 12 months. The period might be extended at the most to six months.

PAYMENTS INTO BANKRUPTCY ESTATES ACCOUNT.

We fully agree with the proposals on this head.

PREFERENTIAL PAYMENTS IN BANKRUPTCY:

WAGES.

We do not agree with the proposal to reduce the present reasonable preferential claims for the wages of the clerks and servants of the debtor to the extent named. Clerks' salaries might be fixed at not more than three months and labourers one month.

RENT.

We approve of that portion of the recommendation which suggests that the trustee in bankruptcy shall in any event pay for use and occupation of the premises during the time he holds possession.

We sympathise with the proposals touching the preferential powers of gas companies, as we wish for as few preferential claims as possible.

We agree to the rent claimed being limited for one period, say, weekly tenancy one week, monthly one month, six months six months, and so on.

DEBTORS ACT, 1869.

On this head we adopt the words of Mr. Henry Attlee, the President of the Law Society, who in his presidential address at Manchester on the 9th October, 1906, said:—

> "There should be an examination at an early stage into the bankrupt's conduct, and a report brought before the Court and punishment in proper cases awarded: but that punishment should not take the form of withholding a discharge, but on the contrary the bankrupt should be as soon as possible encouraged to resume the duty of earning his own living, and the punishment in cases requiring it should be calculated to mark with disgrace bankruptcy due to extravagant living or dishonesty in such a manner as would be really felt, and would distinguish it from the bankruptcy resulting from the ordinary incidents, accidents, and misfortunes of business."

ADMINISTRATION ORDERS.

We do not think the recommendation on this head would be of any material assistance. We would place no restrictions on the powers of the County Court Judge with regard to composition arrangements. The Judge has all the evidence before him, and is the person best qualified to make a suitable order.

REGISTRATION OF PARTNERS' NAMES.

We do not approve of this clause. This chamber has already expressed an opinion on this subject, and we do not recommend they should go beyond it.

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT.

We foresee great difficulties attending the suggestions under this head, though we agree in limiting the period in which such deeds should become binding. If the present period of three months was limited to one month it would meet most of the objections raised, and after that period it should be made binding on all parties. A meeting of creditors should be held within six days after making of the deed. It must be remembered that a creditor who intimates to the trustee under such a deed that he will accept his debt in full with a condition that unless it is paid in full he will present a petition in bankruptcy might not succeed in a petition if opposed by the trustees. Recent decisions on this point remove some of the difficulties complained of.

With regard to taxation of solicitors' costs, this course is already open to any trustee who wishes to have a taxation, and we see no objection to the suggestion. The committee of inspection are the best judges as to the remuneration of the trustee.

We see no objection to an account being opened for unclaimed dividends if provision is made for repayment out to the creditor without placing him to any undue expense.

REGISTRATION OF JUDGMENTS.

We think there are many reasons against publishing all judgments obtained in the High Courts in the "London Gazette," and do not approve the suggestion. There is already provision for registration in certain cases.

BRISTOL.—This Chamber having decided to adopt as the basis of their report the memorandum of the Birmingham Chamber as set out above concurred in the views of that Chamber upon the points not specially referred for consideration subject to the alterations and additions which are indicated in italics as follows:—

ACTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

Section 4 (h) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provides that an act of bankruptcy is committed if a debtor gives notice to any of his creditors that he has suspended, or that he is about to suspend payment of his debts should be supplemented by the provision that an act of bankruptcy is also committed "if he has convened a meeting of his creditors, either by himself or through his solicitor and submits a statement of his affairs," as at the present time notices convening meeting are sometimes worded so as not to convey notice of suspension of payment, when no doubt it is intended to include such a proceeding.

If at a meeting a debtor submits a statement of his affairs power should be given to the creditors to apply for his adjudication as a bankrupt without the present delay of 14 days, unless it should appear to the creditors that, at the time of the meeting the debtor was solvent.

COMPOSITIONS OR SCHEMES IN THE BANKRUPTCY.

It should be sufficient where a debtor intends to make a proposal for composition in satisfaction of his debts, that the Official Receiver should hold a meeting of creditors and a copy of the proposals should be sent to them, and if at that meeting a majority in number representing three-fourths (four-fifths at least) in value of the bona fide creditors over £10 resolve to accept the proposal, same should be duly accepted by the creditors, and be binding without the approval of the Court, providing such proposal provides reasonable security for a composition of not less than 10s. in the £.

This is suggested to simplify a satisfactory composition in bankruptcy without the delay attendant on a public examination, which delay and publicity at present prevents the satisfactory working of any composition scheme under the present Act, because there are cases where the creditor cannot be expected to accept a composition.

PUBLIC EXAMINATION—GENERAL.

[To avoid the legal expenses attendant upon a public examination, and the very heavy shorthand writers' charges at present existing (which should under any circumstances be reduced) the public examination of a debtor should not necessarily take place where his affairs appear to be straightforward, and a full disclosure has been made, but that it should take place upon an application from the Official Receiver or Trustee of an Estate, or a bona fide trade creditor for £50 or over.]

The Bristol Chamber suggest the deletion of the above paragraph and the substitution of the following:—

In all cases where an estate is wound up through the Bankruptcy Court, a public examination must take place, and, where the judge is not entirely satisfied as to the methods which have been adopted by the debtor previous to his bankruptcy, he shall have extended powers for the purpose of making what are distinctly unbusinesslike or objectionable methods punishable to a greater extent than at present.

This would enable Official Receivers and Trustees to examine a bankrupt upon oath where they were not satisfied with the conduct of the bankrupt or his dealing with the estate, and the Registrars should have power to commit a bankrupt for contempt in cases where a bankrupt trifles with the Court as has transpired recently in cases of examinations of bankrupt Solicitor before the Birmingham Court.

This suggestion assumes that the legislature would go so far as to empower County Court Judges to inflict summary punishment by imprisonment for commercial offences. Unless the County Court Judges or Special Bankruptcy Judges to be appointed for the purpose have this power, it is difficult to see what good results will follow by bringing bankrupts before the Court merely to obtain discharges for which they have no desire and which prevents creditors getting the benefit of after acquired property.

PROPERTY PASSING TO A TRUSTEE.

Very often when a Trustee is appointed it is ascertained that a large portion of the assets are claimed by specific creditors as having been sent on "sale or return," or approval, and trade customs are now being created on the same lines in respect of machinery, stock, safes, etc. The sending of goods on sale or return in the first place was with the view of giving the trader an opportunity of returning them if he did not wish to purchase, but now it has resolved itself into one or more creditors protecting themselves at the expense of the general body. If the trader sells goods which are supplied on sale or return, the creditor can only prove the amount, and as the debtor holds them for sale prior to his bankruptcy they should after having been held for a period of 14 days be considered as assets and pass to the trustee in the event of bankruptcy if they are not sold.

Nothing in the proposals mentioned above shall interefere with bona fide consignments where the Trader is acting as a broker or agent for the original owner.

Where debtors assign book debts as security for money owing, the assignee can complete the assignment by giving notice to the debtor any time previous to the bankruptcy, and this prevents the debt passing to the trustee, and by collusion of the debtor, the assignee being probably a friendly creditor, no difficulty is experienced in this. A clause should be inserted that the notice of an assignment should have been given by the assignee to the party owing the debt of at least one month prior to the bankruptcy, and the assignment should be registered under the Bills of Sale Act in the same way as a charge given upon moveable effects, and that such assignment shall be void if the debtor is adjudged a bankrupt within one month of registration.

Bankrupt's Discharge.

Having regard to the very large number of undischarged bankrupts in the country it should be compulsory for every bankrupt to notify his present address and occupation to the County Court at the conclusion of every period of six (three) months from his adjudication as a bankrupt, and to apply for his discharge within a period of two years of the bankruptcy, and where merely technical offences have been committed to do away with suspension of discharge and make a monetary penalty, to be payable by instalments to be fixed by the Court, and that any debtor who does not apply for his order of discharge within two years shall be subject to a term of imprisonment, and if no criminal practices can be proved against him before the Judge he shall then be granted his discharge unless circumstances are known which render further delay advisable.

Deeds of Arrangement.

The following suggestions are made with a view of carrying out this suggested amendment of the law :—

(1) That in the case of all estates where the unsecured liabilities amount to £1,000 or more a deed of arrangement assented to by bona fide trade creditors for amounts of not less than £20 each and representing in the aggregate at least three-fourths (four-fifths) of the total unsecured liabilities shall be binding upon the whole of the creditors.

(2) That in the case of all estates where the unsecured liabilities amount to not less than £300 nor more than £1,000, a deed of arrangement assented to by bona fide trade creditors for amounts of not less than £10 each and representing in the aggregate at least three-fourths (four-fifths) of the total unsecured liabilities shall be binding upon the whole of the creditors.

BRADFORD.—The chamber desire to urge the desirability of instituting a system of registration of firms whereby it may be possible for traders to ascertain who are the constituent members of firms to whom they are from time to time asked to give credit. Such a system would do much to mitigate the difficulties arising in the case of persons who trade in a fictitious name, or use the words "& Co." in their trading name, for the purpose of representing that there are several partners in a business of which in fact one person only is the proprietor. The facts in such cases are only ascertained in the event of insolvency arising. The Chamber consider that, in addition to providing adequate means of dealing with insolvencies, the legislature should take all means possible to assist traders to judge whether they should or should not extend credit to particular persons or firms.

COVENTRY.—Winding up, realisation and distribution of insolvent estates should be left as much as possible in the hands of the creditors.

The law relating to deeds of arrangement should be altered so that a majority in number and value of two-thirds of the creditors should bind the minority, unless any creditor can show fraud on the part of the debtor.

All amendments to the existing law should be upon lines making the enquiries into the debtor's conduct matters of public concern, and therefore strictly compulsory and official, and making the realisation and distribution of assets matters of private concern, and therefore for the creditors' own consideration and under their control.

That the Debtors' Act, 1869, limiting the time to four months within which offences under Section 11 must occur in order to involve prosecution, should be amended and the time limit extended to one year.

HALIFAX.—Winding-up, realisation and distribution of insolvent estates should be left as much as possible in the hands of the creditors.

The law relating to deeds of arrangement should be altered so that a majority in number and value of two-thirds of the creditors should bind the minority unless any creditor can show fraud on the part of the debtor.

All amendments to the existing law should be upon lines making the enquiries into the debtors' conduct matters of public concern and therefore strictly compulsory and official, and making the realisation and distribution of assets matters of private concern and therefore for the creditors own consideration and under their control.

The Debtors' Act, 1869, limiting the time to four months within which offences under Section 11 must occur in order to involve prosecution should be amended and the time limit extended to one year. Further, powers should be given to the Judge of a Bankruptcy Court to punish debtors guilty of offences against the Acts, or in the alternative that the Summary Jurisdiction Acts should be extended so as to embrace offences by negligent, reckless or fraudulent bankrupts so that cases could be remitted to the police courts by the county court judge for summary trial, as, according to present arrangements the prosecution of a fraudulent bankrupt has to be undertaken by the Public Prosecutor, and involves great delay and expense, whereas if the Bankruptcy Judge had power himself to punish by a short term of imprisonment, for at any rate minor offences, or to refer cases to the police courts as well as to the Public Prosecutor, the deterrent effect would no doubt be very great.

LEEDS.—That in the case of voluntary deeds of arrangement by way of absolute assignment provisions should be made for compelling the assistance of the insolvent at the instance of the trustee with the approval of the committee of inspection.

Complete lists of undischarged bankrupts should be published periodically so as to give the public the utmost facilities for ascertaining the facts, and that it be an offence for an undischarged bankrupt to trade under a name other than his own.

LIVERPOOL.—The committee wish to call attention to the system that prevails of so-called "touting for trusteeships." They deprecate what appears to be the increasing tendency of a certain class of accountants "to tout" for trusteeships, and suggest that the Board of Trade issue such regulations as would terminate or minimise this evil.

LONDON.—

Proxies.

Experience of the present Act has shown that the proxy system should be modified so that a creditor should be enabled to appoint as his "general proxy" a person other than an Official Receiver or a person in his general or regular employ. He should be allowed to appoint any trusted representative such as his solicitor or accountant or other person, conditionally that the name of the person or persons appointed are filled in before the proxy is signed by the creditor. A sufficient safeguard against the abuse of such a power will be provided by the requirement as to filling up the form before it is signed. The form of proxy might be much simplified and brought more into accordance with the form of proxy used under the Companies Act.

Proofs and Proxies.

If meetings of creditors are held more promptly, as above recommended, it will of course give creditors less time for lodging their proofs and proxies. It should therefore suffice if the proof and proxy are lodged with the Official Receiver at the meeting and not on the day previous; for instance, London creditors would frequently be "disfranchised" in cases of meetings held in the provinces, and provincial creditors would suffer in a like manner with meetings held in London.

The chamber are of opinion that all Official Receivers should be paid by salary and that their remuneration should not in any way be dependent upon fees or commission. An Official Receiver paid by salary has always been more satisfactory than one paid by fees or commission. Moreover, an Official Receiver should devote the whole of his time to his office and not be engaged in any other profession or business. This reform might involve a reduction in the number of Official Receivers and the enlargement of certain provincial districts, and this the committee consider would be an advantage. Prior to the Act of 1869 the whole of the bankruptcy business of England and Wales, outside the London district, was administered from provincial centres.

Fees.

The Board of Trade and other fees should be reduced especially in regard to the charge of 1s. for each creditor, no matter how trifling the case may be, and also the charge for use of the room in which the meeting is held at the rate of 1s. for each creditor notified of the meeting, irrespective of the number attending. Cases have frequently occurred in which one hundred or more creditors are notified and perhaps only half a dozen have attended, and yet up to £5 is charged for the use of the meeting room, the meeting lasting not more than a quarter of an hour, whereas perhaps the rent of the whole office might not amount to £5 a month. Then meetings are often held at the Board of Trade offices, for which no charge ought to be made, but no difference is made whether the meeting is held in a Government building or in the private office of an Official Receiver. Then again Official Receivers are in the habit of holding meetings at hotels at a cost to them or the department of 10s. 6d. or £1 1s., but the charge of 1s. per creditor called up to £5 is made whether the creditors attend or not, thus making an indefensible profit at the expense of the estate. Unofficial trustees who call general meetings at their own offices rarely make any charges for the use of their meeting room. Small estates should not be burdened in this way by Official Receivers or by the Government department.

Nor should creditors be taxed as they are at present by the imposition of a 1s. stamp duty on their proofs of debts. This charge should be abolished.

As to Administration of Deceased Debtors' Estates.

(A) Executors' Rights of Retainer.—The present arrangements under this heading are very unsatisfactory; for instance, the order for administration is made without prejudice to the executors' right of retainer, and therefore a position sometimes arises somewhat as follows, viz.: A trader carries on business on credit from the merchants, who may, or may not, know that the capital in the business has been borrowed from the wife, but, with the knowledge that in the event of the trader's bankruptcy the wife cannot prove in competition with them for dividend, they therefore grant credit. The trader, who perhaps has a large policy on his life (the premiums of which are, of course, paid out of the business), dies, appointing his wife executrix. Possibly the estate is hopelessly insolvent and the creditors eventually decide upon bankruptcy, and after they have paid the costs of proceedings they find that the widow, acting as executrix, has received life policy moneys, realised the personal estate, and paid herself preferentially a claim which in the event of the debtor's bankruptcy in his lifetime could not have even ranked for dividend. We have quoted the case of the wife being executrix, but the result is similar in the case of a brother or other relative or friend being appointed as executor. We suggest that under the laws of administration of deceased debtor's estates the position should be exactly the same as in ordinary bankruptcy and the laws altered accordingly.

(B) Executors' Transactions with Estates prior to Order for Administration being made.—Under the present Administration Order it is a difficult and complicated matter to hold executors personally responsible for mismanagement of insolvent estates, if and when an Order of Administration under Section 125 is made. It sometimes happens that a will is proved and the executor knows full well that the estate is an insolvent one, intermeddles with the affairs, and perhaps, after the lapse of six months, an Order under Section 125 is made. It is then discovered that the estate has seriously depreciated from its position at the date of the death, owing solely to the executor's incapacity for dealing with it. A clause should be inserted in Section 125 to the effect that the executor should account to the trustee for his transactions, and the trustee should report upon such transactions to the Judge of the Court in which the Order is made, and if in the opinion of such Judge the estate has suffered in consequence of the executor's dealing with it, he should be compelled to make good the loss sustained by the estate, the figures to be settled by the Judge or as he may direct.

(C) As to Appointment of Trustee.—Under Section 125, as it stands at present, the Official Receiver of the Court is appointed trustee under the Order, and only upon requisition of a number of creditors is a meeting called The section should be altered to correspond with the usual procedure in bankruptcy. The creditors would then have no difficulty in appointing their own trustee at a meeting convened by the Official Receiver in the ordinary course.

The chamber would like to (1) call attention to, and (2) to complain of the injustice creditors generally suffer in lunacy cases where the patient (i.e., the debtor) is insolvent at the time of his illness, and also in cases where the estate becomes insolvent after his declared lunacy, and after the appointment of a committee.

In either case the creditors generally make a total loss, the Master taking the whole of the assets for the benefit of the lunatic (even of goods supplied by the order of the committee) not leaving for the creditors any dividend, although perhaps a very large quantity of goods have been delivered at the very hour of the Master making up his mind to have the estate realised in a summary manner for present and future maintenance of the lunatic.

This chamber is strongly of opinion that if an insolvent becomes a lunatic, he shall be liable to be made a bankrupt (or his estate declared a bankrupt estate). The chamber also considers that, if after the patient has become a "lunatic so found" and his estate shall become insolvent under the committee, the estate shall be declared bankrupt and wound up under a trustee and committee the same as in bankruptcy.

LUTON.—Vesting clauses of materials in building contracts should be made null and void against a trustee so far as relates to all materials not permanently fixed to buildings agreed by the contract to be erected.

The law relating to fraudulent preference should be amended, making the result of a debtor's action, not his intention the test.

READING.—All firms should trade in their own names, or their right names should be registered, and that no preference should be given to creditors for rent, rates or taxes.

SHEFFIELD.—

Builders' Tools and Appliances.

The clause which is frequently placed in building contracts providing that if the contractor fails, all tools, scaffolding, ladders, cranes, wheelbarrows, and other loose tools or appliances of the builder shall all become the property of the employer, is a hardship to the general body of creditors, and any Agreements which contain this power ought to be registered as Bills of Sale, but that building materials and things which are brought on to the place in order that they may form part of the finished whole, shall not be affected but shall be sacred to the employer as at present without such registration.

Proof of Debt.

A simpler form of proof of debt should be issued to the creditors.

Proxies.

A general proxy can only be given to a person in the regular employment of the creditor; e.g., a general proxy might be given to the office boy, but it could not be given to the creditor's solicitor. It is suggested that it should be lawful for the general proxy to be given by one creditor to another creditor who has a debt against the bankrupt of at least £20.

Public Examinations.

Do not make these examinations compulsory, but let it take place upon an application from the Official Receiver or Trustee of the estate, or on the application of a majority in value of unsecured creditors each having debts of £10 or more. If this alteration were made it would render it unnecessary in many cases to incur the expense of a public examination, in which shorthand charges would form a heavy item. Let Registrars of County Courts also have the power to commit a bankrupt for contempt in cases where he trifles with the Court.

Fees.

The cost of filing a Bankruptcy Petition should be reduced.

Instead of £5 stamp on filing the Petition a stamp of £1 should be charged, but that a £5 stamp should be paid if the gross estate amounted to £10,000.

The £5 deposit which at present has to be paid by the creditor and returned to him out of the estate (if there is sufficient estate), should not be paid by the creditor in any case, but should be a first charge on the estate.

Payments by Trustees in Bankruptcy.

The present method of requiring Trustees in Bankruptcy to apply to the Board of Trade to issue cheques is cumbersome and inconvenient, and a Trustee in Bankruptcy should be allowed to pay moneys received by him into a local Bank and draw cheques himself on the account. The Board of Trade at present allow a local Bank to be used for payment of wages, but never on any other account.

Trading in Partnership Names.

Frequently individuals trade under some high-sounding title, such as "The British Manufacturing Company" or "The Empire Furnishing Company," and sometimes the high-sounding title may really be an undischarged bankrupt trading in the name of his wife.

Very often a man goes bankrupt whose name is, possibly, "Henry Smith," his wife's name may be "Harriet Smith," but she may probably commence to trade as "H. Smith," and the outside world might have no idea that they were trading with a woman at all, as all the while the bankrupt husband manages the business.

In these cases it is submitted that wives ought to be compelled to put their full names on the shops and also on the bill heads.

It is further also submitted that except in the case of a single individual carrying on business in his own name, it shall be necessary for any person or persons or firms carrying on business to register at the County Court of the district the title of his or their trading styles, with particulars showing the name or names of the person or persons using such trading styles, and also in cases of partnership the individual names of the members composing the firm. It is suggested that this registration should be made once each year, except in case of removal to the district of another County Court, in which case the registration ought to be repeated in the County Court of the district to which the individual or individuals have gone. No doubt this requirement would cause a little trouble and would be of no use in the case of genuine firms, but on the other hand the law must be made applicable to all persons, and it would be impossible to make exceptions.

Registration of Judgments.

High Court Judgments should be registered. County Court Judgments are registered, but High Court Judgments are only registered when they affect lands.

General.

"Unsecured Creditor" when used in this Report includes also a creditor who, being partially secured, has valued his security, and who shall to the extent of the unsecured balance be considered an unsecured creditor.

TORQUAY.—The 31st Section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which makes it a misdemeanour for an undischarged bankrupt to obtain credit for £20 or upwards without disclosing his status, should be more stringently enforced, and should be amended by making it a misdemeanour for him to obtain such credit under the pretence of being manager for another person, and that any person aiding and abetting him in obtaining such credit should likewise be guilty of a misdemeanour.

WAKEFIELD.—An undischarged bankrupt should at stated periods provide sworn information as to his name, address and means. The Official Receiver to make a report from time to time, upon this and his general conduct to the court.

An undischarged bankrupt trading under an assumed or strange name should be liable to fine or imprisonment.

A wife's claim to property apparently in her husband's possession should be null and void against the Trustee of her husband's estate, unless she can prove good and sufficient consideration.

In cases involving assets of the apparent value of £150 or more, an Official Receiver should forthwith summon a meeting of the principal creditors known to him to decide whether trading operations should be continued or not.

In the case of Deeds of Arrangement, the resolutions of creditors representing 75 per cent. of the unsecured liabilities should be binding on all the creditors.

QUESTIONS REFERRED TO THE COMMITTEE FOR CONSIDERATION AND REPORT, WITH REPLIES THERETO OF TRADE PROTECTION SOCIETIES.

1. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt, or insolvent debtor, and the imposition on him of punishment or disabilities, should be amended, or provision be made that the conduct of such a debtor should in every case be brought before the Court for consideration, whether he applies for a discharge in his bankruptcy or not.

BEDFORD.—It should be made a penal offence for a bankrupt: (1) To have traded without keeping proper books of account; or (2) To fail to give a satisfactory account of loss of any substantial portion of his estate; (3) To commence trading again in the name of his wife, or of any relative, or of any other person without first obtaining his discharge; and (4) That the limit of four months within which offences under Section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, must occur, in order to be prosecuted, should be extended to one year.

HULL.—The Bankruptcy Law should be made more stringent and penal, and undischarged bankrupts should not have the latitude now allowed them in trading in the name of irresponsible nominees.

In particular it is recommended that it should be made a penal offence for a bankrupt

(1) To have traded without keeping proper books of account; or

(2) To fail to give a satisfactory account of any substantial portion of his estate;

(3) To commence trading again in the name of his wife, or of any relative, or of any other person, without first obtaining his discharge; and

(4) That the limit of four months within which offences under Section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, must occur, in order to be prosecuted, should be extended to one year.

LEICESTER.—It should be a penal offence for a bankrupt

(a) To have traded without keeping proper books of account such as are usually kept in his trade;

(b) To fail to give a satisfactory account of loss of any substantial portion of his estate;

(c) To commence trading again in the name of his wife, or of any relative, or of any other person, without first obtaining his discharge.

The limit of four months within which offences under Section 11 of the Debtors Act, 1869, must occur, in order to be prosecuted, should be extended to one year.

LIVERPOOL.—This society welcomes the inquiry into the working of the Bankruptcy Law and would especially urge the importance of the following reforms that our association at its annual meetings has repeatedly approved by special resolutions, namely, "That it should be made a penal offence for a bankrupt (1) to have traded without keeping proper books of account, or (2) to fail to give a satisfactory account of loss of any substantial portion of his estate, (3) to commence trading again in the name of his wife or of any relative, or of any other person, without first obtaining his discharge, and (4) that the limit of four months within which offences under Section 4 of the Debtors' Act, 1869, must occur, in order to be prosecuted, should be extended to one year."

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—1. It should be made a penal offence for a bankrupt—

(a) To have traded without keeping proper books of accounts, provided his liabilities exceed £500.

(b) To fail to give a satisfactory account of loss of any substantial portion of his estate.

(c) To adopt for the purpose of trade or otherwise a name other than the name or names under which he was made bankrupt, unless and until he has obtained his discharge.

NORWICH AND NORFOLK.—Our members do not approve of making it a penal offence for a bankrupt to have traded without keeping proper books of account, or to fail to give a satisfactory account of loss of any substantial portion of his estate, but they do approve of making it a penal offence for a bankrupt to commence trading again in the name of his wife or relative or any other person without first obtaining his discharge, and also that the period within which the offence under Section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, must occur in order for the debtor to be prosecuted be extended from four months to twelve months.

OXFORD.—This association does not consider that such amendment should be made. They consider the provisions of the present law on this point adequate and sufficient.

PENRITH.—1. It should be a penal offence for a bankrupt (a) to have traded without keeping proper books of account; (b) to fail to give a satisfactory account of loss of any substantial portion of his estate; (c) to commence trading again in the name of his wife or of any other person without first obtaining his discharge; and

2. The limit of four months within which offences under Section 4 of the Debtors' Act, 1869, must occur in order to be prosecuted, should be extended to one year.

SCOTTISH.—It must be kept in mind that the conditions which prevail in Scotland dealing with the investigation of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent are somewhat different from those which prevail in England. In Scotland the investigation into the conduct of the bankrupt rests mainly with the Trustee, but it may also be undertaken by one or more of the creditors. The Trustee and the creditors in Scotland have very full powers of investigation, and if there be any limitation it is caused by the question of expense. Neither the Trustee nor the creditors wish to incur much expense, unless there be some probability of some good end being attained by the expenditure. In every case it is the duty of the Trustee to make investigation as to the conduct of the bankrupt, and generally he satisfies himself as to whether the bankrupt has been guilty of any fraudulent or undue conduct. If he has reason to suspect this, he is entitled to make a thorough investigation, and there is no limitation except what is afforded by the question of expense. The creditors, as a rule, do not make a very thorough investigation. Usually they confine themselves to facts and incidents which have happened to themselves, or they report the facts and incidents to the Trustee, and in this way if there be anything very seriously wrong with the conduct of the bankrupt, it generally comes out.

In Scotland, the question of the punishment of the bankrupt remains with the Public Prosecutor. If the Trustee has reason to believe that a punishable offence has been committed by the bankrupt, he reports it to the Public Prosecutor, called in Scotland the Procurator Fiscal, who, if he concurs in thinking that a punishable offence has been committed, sets the Criminal Law in motion. It is not thought that the Scotch Law requires much, if any, strengthening on these points.

2. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the discharge of a bankrupt and the conditions on which such a discharge should be granted, refused, or suspended, should be made more stringent, so as more effectually to check improper and reckless trading, and the neglect by traders to keep proper books and accounts, or be otherwise altered or modified.

OXFORD.—Your committee think that the law as at present in force is sufficient, because it gives the Official Receiver and creditors ample opportunity of stating their views as to the conduct of the applying debtor, and gives a wide discretion to the Judge to refuse, suspend, or grant the discharge applied for, on the facts before him, which your sub-committee consider sufficiently cover the objects of this clause of the terms of reference.

SCOTTISH.—As to the discharge of a bankrupt, it is thought that some amendment of the law ought to be made on this point. In Scotland there are three modes in which a bankrupt may obtain his discharge—(a) by composition ; (b) by deed of arrangement, and (c) without a composition.

(a) The composition settlements are generally carried through in this way. At the first statutory meeting of the creditors, that is the meeting for the election of the trustee, the bankrupt may submit an offer of composition and if the creditors resolve that it be entertained the trustee forthwith intimates the same to all the creditors and notifies them that a second meeting shall be held after the public examination of the bankrupt to decide upon accepting the offer. If a majority in number and nine-tenths in value of the creditors assembled at the meeting accept such offer, it is forthwith reported to the Sheriff, who, after hearing any objections by creditors, if he finds that the offer is reasonable and that it has been duly made and accepted, confirms the resolution which discharges the bankrupt.

(b) Usually the deed of arrangement takes the form of a composition contract, and the main difference between it and the composition arrangement is that the deed must be subscribed by four-fifths in value and number of the whole creditors of the bankrupt. There may also be a question as to the reasonableness of the deed of arrangement, and if the Sheriff finds that it is not reasonable he may refuse to interpose authority, but if he does not object to the deed on this ground it becomes final and the bankrupt obtains his discharge in terms of the deed.

(c) Where the bankrupt neither makes an offer of composition nor of a deed of arrangement he may apply to the Court for his discharge after the second statutory meeting of creditors—that is, after his public examination—on condition that every creditor concurs ; on the expiration of six months from the date of the bankruptcy if he has the consent of a majority in number and four-fifths in value of his creditors ; at twelve months from the date of the bankruptcy provided he has the consent of a majority in number and two-thirds in value of the creditors ; and at the expiration of eighteen months if he has a majority in number and value of his creditors ; and after two years he may apply without the consent of any creditors. Where there is nothing against the conduct of the bankrupt and no suspicious circumstances attending his failure, he has very seldom difficulty in obtaining the necessary consents of creditors, and the vast majority of bankrupts are discharged at one or other of the periods mentioned.

There is an overriding provision contained in the Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881, to the effect that a bankrupt shall not at any time be entitled to his discharge unless it be proved that a dividend or composition of not less than 5s. in the £ has been paid out of the estate of the bankrupt or that the failure to pay 5s. in the £ has, in the opinion of the Judge, arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible. The minimum dividend or composition is too small and ought to be raised to 10s. in the £, especially in view of the proviso which enables the Judge to grant a discharge if he is of opinion that the bankrupt should not be held responsible for the smallness of the dividend. The Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, Section 13, makes it a punishable offence for a debtor if, being indebted to an amount exceeding £200 at the date of his sequestration, he has not for three years before said date kept such books or accounts as, according to the usual course of any trade or business in which he may have been engaged, are necessary to exhibit or explain his transactions. That provision appears to be pretty wide, and it is thought that it would not be improved by making the penalty more severe. The difficulty arises from the unwillingness of juries to find that the failure to keep books arose from an intent to defraud, and it is thought to be doubtful whether Parliament would grant power to punish a bankrupt merely because he kept no books, provided that this failure did not arise from an improper motive.

3. Whether power should be given to the Law Society to refuse to renew the Certificates of Solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, subject to appeal to the Master of the Rolls.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—We consider that the Law Society should be compelled to refuse to renew the certificates of any bankrupt solicitor who has failed to obtain his discharge.

OXFORD.—Your sub-committee recommend that such power should be given to the Law Society. They have reason to believe that evil is existent in consequence of the continued issue of certificates to practise to undischarged bankrupts in the profession of solicitors.

Your sub-committee recommend a right of appeal in all cases to the Master of the Rolls in view of the possible injustice of such power to the individuals concerned.

SCOTTISH.—It is thought that solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts should not be allowed to practise.

4. Whether the existing provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the realisation and administration of property should be amended so as to secure a more immediate realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt as soon as possible after a Receiving Order has been made.

OXFORD.—Your sub-committee consider that no change is advisable in the law as it now exists on this point. They consider that in many cases it is better for the creditors that the business should be carried on under the supervision of the trustee so as to wind up the affairs as advantageously as possible instead of realising at a loss. Your sub-committee consider that in this respect the circumstance of each particular case should be considered.

SCOTTISH.—The provisions of the Scotch Bankruptcy Acts leave the realisation and administration of the property very much in the hands of the trustee, who as a rule realises and divides the estate with reasonable expedition, and should he fail to do so he may be called to account by the Accountant of Court.

5. Whether the law so far as it enables the trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the bankrupt's estate all the bankrupt's after acquired property should be modified in any, and what, way, so as to protect persons who have honestly become creditors of the bankrupt since his bankruptcy or have purchased or taken mortgages or securities over such after acquired property from the bankrupt.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—We consider the law should be modified to protect persons who are bona fide creditors of a bankrupt who afterwards acquires property. It is a distinct hardship that creditors under a previous bankruptcy should have first claim on property afterwards acquired by the bankrupt.

OXFORD.—Your sub-committee, while recognising that hardship often exists under the existing law, consider that any such change as suggested here would be attended with the risk of traders abstaining from proper enquiry and even of fraud to the injury of the creditors of an undischarged bankrupt, and that on these grounds, in the interests of traders and creditors in general, such a change is undesirable.

SCOTTISH.—It is thought that the vesting clause of the Scotch Bankruptcy Act should be extended so as to embrace the whole of a bankrupt's property. At present it does not embrace what is technically called a spes successionis. Now this is a marketable asset which a bankrupt could sell. Why, therefore, should his creditors not have the right to realise it? When an undischarged bankrupt trades in Scotland and acquires property, the Court exercises a discretion as to the disposal of this property, generally in this way—that it allows the original creditors of the bankrupt to rank pari passu with the subsequent creditors. This is considered fair for all parties. It is almost impossible for an undischarged bankrupt in Scotland to acquire and mortgage real property; at all events, if he does so it is owing to the gross carelessness of the mortgagee in not examining the registers. Moveable property in Scotland can only be pledged by delivery of the article to the pledgee, and the Scotch law is this—that if the creditors of an undischarged bankrupt allow him to have possession of moveable property so as to enable him to deliver it to a bona fide pledgee, it is thought it would be unfair to deprive him of the benefit of the security he got for his advance.

6. Whether the provisions of the law by which a married woman can in certain circumstances be made bankrupt should be extended so as to render all, or some, and what, classes of married woman who incur debts on their own account (whether trading separately from their husband or not) subject to the Bankruptcy Laws.

LEICESTER.—1. Liabilities incurred by married women should be enforceable against their property in the same manner as if they were unmarried.

2. A married woman who trades should not be allowed to escape the Bankruptcy Law, but should be amenable thereto.

3. Some remedy should be provided to reform the present unsatisfactory state of the law with regard to the properties and liabilities of married women to prevent husbands and wives by collusive action from defrauding their creditors.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—All married women who incur debts on their own account ought to be subject to the bankruptcy laws.

OXFORD.—Your sub-committee recommend that an extension of the law should be made on this point so as to make all married women subject to the Bankruptcy Laws in respect of their own debts. Your sub-committee desire to take this opportunity of calling attention to the cases of evil and injury to traders by reason of the state of the present law with regard to the liability of husbands for the debts contracted by their wives and vice versa, and they regret that this subject is not within the terms of reference now before them.

SCOTTISH.—In Scotland a married women who carries on trade separate from her husband, may be made bankrupt and subject to all the law applicable to an unmarried woman who is made bankrupt. If a married woman trades along with her husband, they are co-partners in trade, and she will, of course, be liable to bankruptcy with all its effects as a co-partner with her husband. The law of Scotland with regard to debts incurred by a married woman who is not engaged in trade, is not in a satisfactory condition, but the remedy for this state of matters, does not arise in the law of bankruptcy, because if the debt can be fixed upon the married woman, then the existing bankruptcy law will apply to her in the same way as to an unmarried woman or to a man. The difficulty is to fix liability on her for the debt.

7. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the avoidance of marriage and other settlements, and covenants and securities made by persons who afterwards become bankrupt, should be extended so as to prevent the trustees and persons claiming under such settlements, covenants, and securities from afterwards competing unfairly with the persons who have become creditors of the bankrupt for valuable consideration in money or money's worth, and to protect bona fide purchasers and incumbrancers of property under such disposition as above described.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—We do not consider that the provisions of the law should be extended in the way suggested.

OXFORD.—Your sub-committee are of opinion that the law on this point is sufficiently stringent. It has been found by experience that the cases in which the existence of marriage settlements and similar documents have resulted in injustice to creditors and purchasers are comparatively few, and that these are entirely outweighed by the advantage to the community in general by the use of such documents.

SCOTTISH.—There is not much room for complaint of agreements in Scotland, relative to settlements made by persons while solvent, but who afterwards become bankrupt, because if the settlement deals with personal property it must be delivered to the trustee or trustees and held by him or them and away from the control of the bankrupt. If it be heritable property the deed must be recorded in the public register, where it is seen by all if they choose to look.

8. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors should be amended so as to place the debtor and the trustee under any such arrangement or composition, and the terms and conditions of the arrangement or composition, more under control, and provide for official audits of the trustee's accounts, and official control over the assets in his hands.

LEICESTER.—The following amendments in connection with deeds of arrangement are urgently required :—

1. The trustee shall immediately on execution of the deed, convene a meeting of the creditors to be held within four days of the execution.

   A majority in number and value of the creditors present or represented at the meeting shall appoint a committee of inspection, and may by resolution substitute another trustee for the trustee named in the deed. In such case the resolution shall be registered with the deed, and the trustee named in the resolution shall be deemed to be the trustee under the deed.
2. The trustee shall be compelled to give security, as in bankruptcy.
3. The Board of Trade shall have power to remove a trustee on proof of his incompetency, or his failure to carry out the trusts of the deed, or to distribute the assets within a reasonable time.
4. The trustee's accounts should be approved and passed by the committee of inspection, and audited by the Board of Trade, as in bankruptcy.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—1. The Trustee shall on execution of the deed convene a meeting of the creditors to be held within ten days of the execution. A majority in number and value of the creditors present or represented at the meeting may appoint a committee of inspection and may by resolution substitute another trustee for the trustee named in the deed. In such case the resolution shall be registered and the trustee named in the resolution shall be deemed to be the trustee under the deed, but the trustee named in the deed shall be entitled to be paid all such reasonable fees and disbursements earned and paid by him prior to the notification to him of the said resolution as the committee of inspection, or, if none, the creditors, or a majority of them in number, shall decide.

2. The trustee shall be compelled to give security as in bankruptcy.

3. The Bankruptcy Court shall have power to remove a trustee on proof of his incompetency, or of his failure to carry out the trusts of the deed, or to distribute the assets within a reasonable time.

4. The trustee's accounts shall be approved and passed by the committee of inspection.

5. Provision should be made whereby a certain majority of the creditors shall be given power to bind a minority, subject to the right of appeal by the minority to the Court.

6. The period within which a deed of assignment shall be rendered void by bankruptcy supervening shall be reduced from three months to one month.

7. The remuneration to which a trustee under a deed of assignment would be entitled shall not be increased by virtue of any clause contained in a deed of arrangement, unless such clause shall have been inserted in pursuance of a resolution of a meeting of creditors.

OXFORD.—Your sub-committee consider that voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors are of great value in the commercial world often enabling as they do small and struggling tradesmen to tide over misfortune.

Although in some few cases it may be an occasion for abuse of the advantages of the law (owing largely to the failure of creditors to duly and carefully guard their own interests) such abuses are happily few, and do not warrant the introduction of official control and audits from which your sub-committee consider additional expenditure would result.

SCOTTISH.—In Scotland voluntary arrangements and compositions between an insolvent and his creditors are merely private contracts between debtor and creditor, and must be entered into with each creditor, otherwise they will not be binding, and the law allows a creditor the space of sixty days within which to set aside a private trust deed, whereby a debtor may divest himself of all his property and hand it over to a trustee for behoof of all his creditors. No number of assets will bind any creditor, and no debtor can, by executing a voluntary trust deed, put his estate beyond the reach of his creditors. That is to say, the creditors who do not assent to the trust deed, can compel the trustee to give them the same dividend, or share of the trust estate, as those creditors who accede to the trust deed receive.

The essence of these arrangements is their absolutely voluntary nature and the entire absence of legal procedure. Hence it is an exceedingly cheap method of winding up an insolvent estate : and if an honest and competent trustee be obtained, this forms an ideal method of winding up. There is no expense but the cost of the trust deed, say, between £4 and £5, and the remuneration of the trustee. The discharge of the debtor is no part of the scheme. Generally the debtor stipulates for a discharge, but owing to the voluntary nature of the scheme, this stipulation cannot be enforced upon an unwilling creditor, otherwise the arrangement would not be a voluntary one. The creditors are thus absolutely free to grant a discharge or refuse it at pleasure. In practice, however, very few creditors refuse to grant the insolvent a discharge, and such refusal is almost always owing to some improper conduct on the part of the insolvent.

The drawbacks connected with trust deeds are inherent in their voluntary character, and cannot be remedied without destroying that character by the creation of legal machinery and rules—thus involving the costs of proceedings similar to those which obtain in the case of bankruptcy ; and as creditors can always throw the estate into bankruptcy, if they wish a thorough investigation or to compel a recusant creditor to fall into line, it is preferable that trust deeds remain on their present footing with its attendant cheapness and expedition, rather than increase the cost of all trust deeds by applying legal procedure and rules to all of them.

Indeed, it is hardly possible to prevent an insolvent and his creditors from entering into a voluntary arrangement if they please, so that although certain legal rules were applied to trust deeds, as they now exist, this would not prevent voluntary arrangements going on all the same.

There is one important improvement which might be effected without at all infringing the voluntary nature of the deed, and it would create very little additional expense,—that is, the accounts of the trustee ought to be subject to audit by the accountant of Court. If such an audit were made imperative it would remedy most of the evils connected with voluntary trust deeds.

9. Whether the existing laws which prescribe the registration of certain classes of securities given by debtors should be extended, so as to include, and apply to, general assignments of book debts, hiring agreements and other forms of securities which are at present exempt from registration.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—The business done on the hire and purchase principle has grown to such enormous dimensions that we fear any attempt to extend registration to these agreements would do more harm than good. Any movement in this direction should, in our opinion, be preceded by a most careful consideration of all the interests concerned.

OXFORD.—Your sub-committee do not recommend the registration of assignment of book debts, they are of opinion that the expense and publicity of registration is calculated to hamper legitimate and useful transactions ; on the other hand they do most strongly recommend registration of hire purchase agreements considering that the increasing use of these agreements without the publicity of registration is injurious to commerce and trade in general.

SCOTTISH.—The law of Scotland does not favour the creation of securities over moveable property in the possession or control of the granter of the security, except in the case of ships. But then there is a very complete register of mortgages over ships which is considered sufficient for the protection of creditors. It is not possible in Scotland to create a security over fluctuating book debts. No doubt a debt, or a number of debts can be assigned, but the property is only transferred by intimation of the assignment to the debtor, and this at once fixes the amount of the debt, as at the moment of intimation, and any debt which might be incurred after intimation would not be carried by the assignment. Indeed it is doubtful if a debt incurred subsequent to the date of the assignment would be carried by it though the intimation were deferred until after the debt was incurred.

Hire purchase agreements are making their appearance in Scotland chiefly introduced by traders in England who do that kind of business in Scotland. But the validity of such agreements cannot be said to be firmly established. Some of them would certainly not be held to be valid, such as those regarding articles which perish in the using—say, a suit of clothes. It is doubtful whether a hire purchase agreement regarding such an article would be valid in Scotland, or would not rather be considered a mere device to evade the law; as an attempt to create a security for the price, while the purchaser had the use and enjoyment of the article, and was actually in the course of consuming it. Security over heritable (real) property in Scotland is valid in a question with creditors from the date of registration only.

The following observations were offered by the undermentioned Trade Protection Societies upon subjects not specially referred to the Committee for consideration.

LEICESTER.—1. In view of the heavy costs and uncertainty as to results of prosecutions in bankruptcy, and the desire of creditors to get as much as possible out of an estate, and of the reluctance of the Board of Trade to order prosecutions in cases in which the Official Receiver is trustee, with little or no estate, it is recommended that the entire cost of such prosecutions should be undertaken by, and at the expense of, the Board of Trade.

2. With the view of simplifying these prosecutions as much as possible, power should be given to the County Court Judges to commit the debtor to prison for a term not exceeding six months, where, at the public examination, it has been shown that the debtor has :—

(a) Continued to trade after he found himself insolvent;

(b) Wasted his estate in extravagant living, betting, or disposal of his goods under cost price;

(c) Failed to satisfactorily explain the loss of his estate or the causes of his failure;

(d) Not having kept proper books of account, so as to show his trading for at least three years next immediately preceding his failure.

Note.—This would make the public examination a reality, and not a sham or farce as is now frequently the case.

3. A debtor whose debts are under £50 is in a far worse position than the one with liabilities over £50. In the former case he applies for an administration order, under which he is ordered to pay a dividend of, say 5s. to 10s. per £ by instalments spread over a period of four to six years, whilst the latter, on being able to find the initial fees for filing his petition, and without any assets, is practically set free at once. It is true that in such cases he may not obtain his discharge, but as a rule he cares nothing for it, the practice being to commence trading in the wife's or some other assumed name. This is undoubtedly an evasion of the spirit, if not of the letter, of the Act, and it is quite time the Act should be amended so as to make it penal for a debtor to obtain credit, either in his own or any other name, until he has satisfied his former creditors or obtained his discharge.

The penal clause in the present Act fixing the amount at £20 is far too high, and should apply to the obtaining of credit for any sum, say, above £5 without disclosing that he is an undischarged bankrupt.

4. The Official Receiver or trustee shall, within six or twelve months, or so soon as the estate be realised, report to the Court all cases where the estate has failed to yield sufficient to pay a dividend of 5s. per £, or immediately where there is no estate. At the hearing the debtor shall submit himself for examination, and the Judge shall then make an order that the debtor shall pay such a sum per week out of his earnings until a dividend of 10s. per £ has been paid, and if it be found that the debtor is not in work or has no means of payment, then he shall submit himself to the Court every three months for examination as to his means until he is in a position to make such payments.

5. The 1s. stamp upon proofs over £2 be abolished. This charge, though trivial, is a tax upon creditors for making a bad debt, which in itself is vexatious enough without being taxed for doing it.

6. Where a creditor is suing at the time of the bankruptcy, such costs as may have been incurred before the receiving order be paid in full out of the estate, so that the suing creditor, whose action has probably caused the debtor to file, shall be put in no worse position than the other creditors.

7. Where the Court calls upon a suing creditor under Section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, to refund any amount recovered by him, the creditor shall be entitled to retain thereout his full costs.

8. The initial costs on filing the petition should be reduced.

Administration Orders.

These orders made under Section 122 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, are no doubt a relief to the working classes, but there are certain amendments needed.

1. All debtors shall immediately report any change of address to the Court, and that the penalty for failing to do so shall be the cancellation of the order.

2. Where the debtor is in arrear a notice by registered post to him at his last known address shall be sufficient notice to him to attend the Court, and that it shall be not necessary to serve him personally with a judgment summons.

3. Should the debtor fail to attend the Court as directed above, no proof of means or ability to pay shall be asked for by the Judge; that he shall grant a warrant of committal, and that if the officers of the Court are unable, from any cause to execute such warrant within three months, he shall report it to the Judge, who shall thereupon cancel the order.

4. The decision of the Courts in Pearson v. Adcock is a great injustice to creditors, and that so much of Section 122 of the Bankruptcy Act as refers to creditors for after incurred debts be repealed, such creditors not to be bound by the administration order.

(The case referred to is now waiting the decision of the Court of Appeal.)

5. Any debtor obtaining or attempting to obtain credit without disclosing that he has obtained an administration order shall upon proof thereof be liable to one month's imprisonment.

6. The fees charged by the Treasury, 2s. per £, are excessive, and should be considerably reduced.

7. Where a debtor has once obtained an administration order, and it has been cancelled by the Judge, or where a debtor after completing one order, shall apply for a second order, such order shall not be granted unless the debtor offers to pay 20s. per £, except with the consent of all the creditors.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—1. Upon the application of the trustee, with the consent of the committee of inspection, any debtor who has executed a deed of arrangement may be brought within the discipline of the Court of Bankruptcy, such application to be made within nine months after the execution of the deed of arrangement.

2. A creditor, although his debt be under £50, shall be entitled, by leave of the Court, to present a petition if the debtor intends to leave the country.

3. The powers of sale and other powers reserved to mortgagees shall not be exerciseable at any earlier date, or be increased because of the mortgagor becoming a bankrupt or making or attempting to make an arrangement with his creditors, unless with the consent of the Court.

4. Similar provisions shall apply to lessors and other persons.

5. The Register of Bankrupts should be kept in a manner to afford greater facilities for reference.

6. The fees in small bankruptcies should be considerably reduced.

7. Greater facilities for the prosecution of fraudulent debtors should be afforded.

8. Proxies. The form of proxy under the Bankruptcy Act and the conditions for filling up the same are intricate and lead to much confusion. The forms and regulations ought to be simplified.

TRUSTEE'S REMUNERATION AND DISBURSEMENTS.

As a general principle a solicitor or a trustee shall not be disentitled to be paid all usual charges and disbursements reasonably and properly incurred by him in and about the calling together of the creditors, the preparation and registration of the deed and execution of the trusts thereof, &c., by reason only that (a) Within three months of the execution of the deed the estate is thrown into bankruptcy.

(b) A new trustee is appointed by resolution of the creditors after execution and registration of the deed.

The amount of such charges and disbursements shall, in case of dispute, be determined by the registrar of the County Court within whose district the debtor resides.

PENRITH.—The association are of opinion that your Committee should consider the question of the expense entailed in bankruptcy proceedings, with a view to a reduction of such expense being brought about.

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.—It should be made a penal offence for a bankrupt (1) to have traded without keeping proper books of account, (2) to fail to give a satisfactory account of loss of any substantial portion of his estate, (3) to commence trading again in the name of his wife, or of any relative, or of any other person, without first obtaining his discharge, and (4) that the limit of four months within which offences under Section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, must occur, in order to be prosecuted, should be extended to one year.

MEMORANDUM BY BOARD OF TRADE IN REGARD TO MATTERS UNDER CONSIDERATION OF THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.

1. The Board consider that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts are sufficient for a full investigation of the debtor's conduct. Minor offences under the Debtors Act and the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, might be made punishable by summary conviction, and the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, might apply as if such offences were specified in the first and second columns of the first schedule to that Act, provided that punishment by fine should be excluded.

It is undesirable to require the bankrupt's conduct to be considered by the Court in all cases, whether he applies for discharge or not. The object in view is to reduce the large number of undischarged bankrupts in the country in the interests of those who have dealings with them in ignorance of their status. It must, however, be remembered that the remedy proposed would not entirely remove the evil, as in some cases the discharge would be refused and in others suspended. At present about 3 per cent. to 4 per cent. of discharges are refused, while 67 per cent. are suspended for two years or more. In other cases—perhaps the worst class—the bankrupt absconds, and his discharge could not well be dealt with in the absence of all investigation of his conduct. Considerable expense would be incurred in dealing with discharge in every case. At present a bankrupt who applies for discharge has to pay a fee of 30s. to cover the costs in connection with the application and 1s. for each notice to creditors, but payment could hardly be enforced if the Court considered the question of conduct, and dealt with the discharge, without any application by the bankrupt. The proposed change in the law would also greatly increase the work of the Court and of official receivers and would thus entail considerable additional cost. No doubt hardships arise occasionally out of the transactions of undischarged bankrupts, but it is considered that the extent of the evil has been exaggerated, and that it can best be dealt with by amendment of the law relating to after-acquired property, and by requiring all persons trading in other than their own names, and all persons trading under firm names, to register their trade name with a statement of their true names, and place the word "registered" after the trading name on their business premises and billheads. Women traders should also be required to describe themselves on their premises and billheads as "Mrs." or "Miss."

2. In about 66 per cent. of applications for discharge the offence of not keeping proper books of account is proved. The Board consider that the failure to keep simple accounts sufficient to show the bankrupt's transactions and financial position, e.g., cash book, journal, or day book, annual balance sheet, or statement of assets and liabilities, should be made a criminal offence punishable by not more than three months imprisonment, but the making of an order to prosecute for such offence should be within the discretion of the Court. This provision should not come into operation until the expiration of (two years) from the commencement of the Amending Act.

4. In exceptional cases, where the interests of the estate appear to require it, the official receiver might be authorised to apply to the Court for an order for sale of any specified assets prior to adjudication, and the Court should be empowered to make such order. Otherwise the provisions of the Act are sufficient.

5. The Board are of opinion that the law should be altered so as to protect the rights of a person acquiring title through the bankrupt to after-acquired property, whether real or personal, in good faith, for valuable consideration, and without knowledge of the bankruptcy.

At present a person can acquire a good title to personal property even if he has knowledge of the bankruptcy, (Cohen v. Mitchell), while he cannot, generally, acquire a title to real property even if he has no such knowledge.

The Board consider that the claims of creditors whose debts have been incurred subsequent to the bankruptcy should be recognised whether there is a second bankruptcy or not, and they should be entitled to payment out of after-acquired property not already distributed par passu with the creditors under the prior bankruptcy.

6. The Board consider that married women carrying on business, whether apart from their husbands or not, should be subject to the Bankruptcy laws. Cases occur in which it is difficult to determine whether a married woman is trading separately from her husband (re Helsby and re Edwards), and difficulties sometimes arise when a married woman is trading with her husband and proceedings in bankruptcy are taken against both. There is not the same necessity for enacting that married women who do not trade should be subject to bankruptcy, while it would be open to the objection that it would enable a creditor to bring improper pressure to bear upon the husband in order to obtain payment of the debt due from the wife. The claims of husbands on the estates of their wives in respect of money lent or property transferred to the wife for the purposes of her business should be postponed to the claims of other creditors.

7. The following clause is suggested in substitution for Sub-section 2 of Section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883:—

Any payment of money or transfer of property made in pursuance of a covenant or contract made in consideration of marriage either for the future payment of money or for the future settlement on or for the settlor's wife and children of property wherein the settlor had not at the date of his marriage any estate or interest, whether vested or contingent, in possession or remainder, and not being money or property in right of his wife, shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the payment or transfer, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy, and shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years of the payment or transfer, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy unless the parties claiming under the covenant or contract can prove that the settlor was at the date of the payment or transfer able to pay all his debts without the aid of the money so paid or the property so transferred, and any claim under or in respect of such covenant or contract to dividend in the settlor's bankruptcy shall be postponed until all claims of the other creditors for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied.

This amendment of the law would meet the mischief of such cases as in re Knight ex parte Cooper, 2 Morrell 223, where it was held that a covenant for settlement of money not specifically ear-marked is not within Section 47 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that the trustees of the settlement are entitled to prove in a subsequent bankruptcy of the settlor under such covenants in competition with creditors for value in money or money's worth. Also such cases as re Reis ex parte Clough, (1904) 2 K.B. 769, where the claim of the trustees of a marriage settlement was upheld as against the trustee in the bankruptcy. In this case the bankrupt covenanted to settle after-acquired property on his wife and children, and just prior to his bankruptcy conveyed to the trustees of the settlement a freehold house and furniture purchased by him long after his marriage.

8. The Board consider that it is undesirable to interfere with the purely voluntary nature of a deed of arrangement between a debtor and his creditors, and the debtor should not therefore be amenable to the jurisdiction of the Court. If his conduct requires investigation and punishment bankruptcy is the proper course.

A majority of the creditors represented at a meeting should not have power to bind the minority in regard to acceptance of a deed. It is seldom that a majority of all the creditors are represented at the meeting. Moreover, the door would be opened to great abuses by reason of solicitation, and of admission of fictitious claims which would control the meeting. At this early stage creditors have not had the time or opportunity to consider whether the conduct of the debtor should undergo the strict examination that is entailed by bankruptcy, and it would be a hardship to deprive them of the rights they now have of presenting a bankruptcy petition, or of reserving their right to proceed against the debtor at any subsequent time.

Proposals of the above nature, viz., that the majority should bind a minority, would practically be a return to the procedure under the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, Sections 192–200. This procedure produced grave scandals which the liquidation and composition Sections (125–126) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, were apparently an unsuccessful effort to cure. It is considered that if any of these methods, which after experience of their results were discarded under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, were again adopted, the evils they caused would be revived, and would produce a great increase in the volume of insolvency, which under the present Acts has been so much diminished.

It is not considered that good ground has been shown for curtailing the time during which a deed is an available act of bankruptcy, but a creditor might be disabled from presenting a petition unless he does so within one month after receiving notice of the deed.

As creditors under £50 cannot file a petition without combining with other creditors and risking costs, which they are seldom willing to do, they are practically unable to exercise pressure to gain special terms for themselves ; and creditors not of this class form a very small proportion of the total number, only about one out of every nine.

It might be provided :—

(1) That security by a bond of a guarantee society be given by the trustee in favour and to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade, and power to be given to the Court to remove a trustee if he failed to give or keep up the security required of him.

(2) That solicitors' costs shall be taxed.

(3) That the provisions of Section 162 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, shall apply to unclaimed dividends and undistributed funds.

(4) That the Board of Trade may audit the accounts of a trustee if it appears desirable.

The Bankruptcy Court might have power to deal with applications by trustees, creditors, the Board of Trade, or persons aggrieved.

Similar powers should be given to the Court and to the Board of Trade in the case of voluntary arrangements without deed. A clause to the following effect is suggested :—

"If, without any formal deed of arrangement duly registered, a person undertakes to realise the property of a debtor and distribute the proceeds among the creditors, or to receive moneys from the debtor for payment to the creditors, he shall, if required, account to the Board of Trade for his administration of the property or funds, and be amenable to the jurisdiction of the Court, in the same manner as if he were trustee under a registered deed of arrangement."

The accompanying memorandum (see page 385) is referred to as illustrating some of the evils existing under the present state of the law in regard to deeds of arrangement.

9. The Board consider that assignments of future book debts arising out of contracts not in existence at the date of assignment should be void. The evils arising from secret assignments of such debts are shown by a recent case, viz., re L. and E. Joseph, trading as M. Joseph & Co., High Court No. 1372 of 1905. In this case the business was acquired by the bankrupts from their mother in 1891 ; the capital then stood at £14,983. The bankrupts' mother undertook two liabilities amounting to £4,500 and retained for herself the lease of the premises, valued at £5,219. She credited the bankrupts with £5,000 as a gift from herself, and a further £1,000 in discharge of legacies from the bankrupts' father. The debt due to her on capital account was thus reduced to £8,264, which she left in the business at 4 per cent. interest. In October, 1902, she advanced the bankrupts £2,000, and in October, 1903, a further sum of £1,500, and was given as security for the whole amount due to her a general charge on present and future book debts. In October, 1905, she called in her capital, and as the bankrupts could not pay, she gave notice to book debtors. Receiving order was made on debtors' petition on the 18th November, 1905. The statement of affairs disclosed unsecured liabilities amounting to £28,290 and free assets amounting to £7,151, while the secured creditors' debt amounted to £11,630 and the estimated value of security £10,783.

It is not considered desirable to require registration of assignments of existing book debts or book debts growing due. Registration of such debts might be an advantage in some cases, but in others great hardship would be caused, e.g., in the case of a contractor who has to expend large sums on the work before receiving payment, and who may legitimately obtain advances from a bank, or from some other source, while the work is in progress by giving a charge on the contract money.

The Board are of opinion that the registration of hiring agreements would to a large extent defeat its own object, as the register would be so enormous that it would be of little practical utility. It would, moreover, entail a very heavy cost to keep up such register. Another drawback would be the hindrance to trade which such a requirement would cause. The system of hire-purchase of furniture, pianos and other household goods has proved a great advantage to persons of small but regular incomes, and the effect of registration would be to deter many such persons from availing themselves of the advantage they now enjoy. The custom of hiring various classes of goods is so well known that it is considered that creditors are not, or should not be, led into presuming ownership from the mere fact of possession.

Sheriffs, high bailiffs, official receivers and trustees in bankruptcy might be protected by enacting that if after inquiry as to the ownership of the goods they have no reason to believe they do not belong to the execution debtor or bankrupt, and the sale under execution or in bankruptcy is duly advertised, the owner of the goods sold shall have no right of action for trespass and conversion, but shall be entitled to follow the proceeds in the hands of the sheriff, high bailiff, execution creditor, official receiver or trustee in bankruptcy, as the case may be.

MEMORANDUM AS TO ABUSES ARISING UNDER DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT EXECUTED BY INSOLVENT DEBTORS.

EXTRACT FROM REPORT BY THE INSPECTOR GENERAL IN BANKRUPTCY FOR THE YEAR 1897.

The duty of getting in statistics of receipts and payments under deeds of arrangement imposed upon the Board of Trade by Section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, brings under their notice instances of the abuses to which this form of winding up insolvent estates is liable. The following case may be mentioned by way of illustration:—A trustee under a deed wrote to me to explain that after he had sent in his final statement of receipts and payments, he received a letter from the debtor's solicitor alleging that the latter's liability to a particular creditor, who was also a member of the committee of inspection, was £85 and not £185, as was stated in the schedule to the deed; and that the creditor in question had received a dividend on £100 more than was due to him. The creditor was called upon to return the excess dividend, and his explanation to the trustee was as follows:—"I return you the sum of £46 6s. 4d., being 9s. 3⅛d. in the £ on £100, which I received from you, and to which I find I was not entitled. At the request of Mr. J. (the debtor) I increased my claim from £85 to £185, as he wished me to recover the whole of the amount I had lent him. It was an arrangement between him and myself, and we did not disclose such arrangement either to the meeting of creditors, the committee of inspection, or any person. It was entirely between myself and Mr. J."

If this estate had been wound up in bankruptcy, it would have been necessary for the claim in question to have been verified by affidavit, both in the debtor's statement of affairs and in the creditor's proof of debt; and they would both have been liable to prosecution for a misdemeanour under the provisions of the Debtors Act, 1869. False claims may thus easily be put forward under deeds of arrangement by collusion between debtors and creditors.

The mere registration of a deed of arrangement under the Act of 1887 affords very little safeguard to creditors. A debtor may, without consulting a single creditor, execute a deed of assignment to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, and such assignment effectively withdraws his estate from the control of creditors, provided no petition in bankruptcy is presented within three months of its execution. The trustee is practically uncontrolled in administering the estate; and, although he is required for statistical purposes to furnish a statement of receipts and payments to the Board of Trade, his accounts are not subject to any audit, nor is he required, like trustees in bankruptcy and liquidators in voluntary windings-up, to pay over undistributed balances and unclaimed dividends to the Bank of England. Many trustees, desiring to get a complete discharge from their trust, have voluntarily offered to pay over unclaimed dividends to the Bankruptcy Estates Account; but the Board of Trade have no power to accept them, and they accordingly remain in the hands or under control of the trustees.

There is no provision by which security is compulsorily required from trustees under deeds of arrangement, and as a result creditors under deeds sometimes suffer considerable loss through the trustee's defalcations. Neither is there any provision corresponding to Section 85 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, by which the office of such trustee is vacated on a receiving order being made against him, and consequently, unless the creditors take steps to get the trustee removed, he remains in office, although a bankrupt, and has the right of proving on his own estate in respect of his own defalcations. In a bankruptcy, which occurred in 1895, the bankrupt had been trustee under a number of deeds of arrangement and compositions, and from his statement of affairs it appears that at the date of the receiving order he was indebted to nine estates, of which he was trustee, in sums amounting altogether to £953. His total liabilities amounted to £3,104, while his assets realised only £300, and, as he had furnished no security in respect of his trusteeships, the creditors under the deeds will receive but an insignificant portion of the assets that should have been available for distribution amongst them.

EXTRACT FROM REPORT BY THE INSPECTOR GENERAL IN BANKRUPTCY FOR THE YEAR 1899.

In my Report for the year 1897 I referred to the information which reached me from time to time as to the abuses to which this form of winding-up insolvent estates is liable. I fear that there is no indication that these abuses are decreasing. On the contrary, the weak points of the system are becoming more fully appreciated, both by debtors and by persons who act as trustees under deeds, while, on the other hand, a certain class of creditors have found that they are able to sell their active or passive assent to deeds of arrangement under conditions which give them a preference over the general body of creditors. *Thus, for instance, in a case which came into bankruptcy about seventeen months after the debtor had executed a deed, it appeared that £611 of the deficiency was attributed to old claims being paid in full and costs. Upon being pressed for an explanation, the debtor admitted that he had not fully disclosed his liabilities to the assignment trustee, because he had arranged to pay certain creditors in full; also that he had given bills to other creditors to induce them to come in under the deed. The effect of these secret arrangements was that while the trustee under the deed only paid a dividend of 4s. in the £, some of the creditors were paid in full by the debtor, and others received payment from him in addition to the rate paid by the trustee. It appears that the debtor executed an assignment once before, and that the same process took place then, a good many creditors insisting upon being paid more than the dividend. This is typical of many cases which have been brought to my notice. Very often it is the trustee and not the debtor who buys off dissentient creditors, and express power is sometimes taken under the deed to pay creditors differentially. In such cases the amount of dividend which a creditor receives is proportioned to the resistance which he is able or disposed to offer. A case illustrating this method of procedure has recently been brought before the judge of the Worcester Court by the official receiver. A debtor, M., executed an assignment to a trustee on March 25th, 1899. A., a dissentient creditor for £55, filed a petition against him on April 11th. On the day fixed for hearing the petition (but previously to the hearing) the solicitor acting for the assignment trustee paid to A., and also to C., a creditor for £78, whom A. claimed to represent, a sum equal to about 12s. in the £ and costs. Notwithstanding this settlement A. made an affidavit that M. was then indebted to him in the sum of £55, and that upon information supplied it was, in his opinion, in the interests of the general body of creditors to have the deed carried out. Upon the strength of this affidavit A. applied for and obtained leave to withdraw his petition, and the administration under the deed proceeded. Subsequently another creditor, M., who had issued process with a view of obtaining a receiving order under Section 103, was paid off in full with costs. The dividend distributed to the general body of creditors was only 6s. Id.

* The illustrative cases quoted here are not confined to 1899 but relate to a series of years.

in the £, and the trustee, in the accounts rendered to the Board of Trade under Section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, included the additional payments to A., C., and M., under a misleading entry. The deed contained a clause permitting the trustee to pay dissentient creditors in full, or otherwise than by dividend, subject to the assent of one-sixth in value of the creditors. Such assent was obtained, three months after the payments had been made, from creditors who were secured by a guarantee. In December last a receiving order was made against a creditor under the assignment who had only received the dividend of 6s. 1d. in the £, and the facts thus came to the knowledge of the official receiver, who, by direction of the Board of Trade, applied to the Court to review, rescind, or vary the order allowing A.'s petition to be withdrawn. The judge granted the application and restored the petition to the file, commenting severely on the suppression of facts and the misleading character of the statements by which the withdrawal of the petition was obtained. A proposal by the assignment trustee to distribute in dividend the additional amounts paid to the preferred creditors is now under consideration.

Where a creditor is not in a position to upset the deed by a bankruptcy petition, he is practically at the mercy of the assignment trustee. Thus, a creditor wrote to the Department complaining that he was unable to obtain information from the solicitor acting for the trustee, who threatened to exclude him from dividend unless he signed the deed. Sometimes a trustee, who is also a creditor, prefers himself to other creditors. Thus, an assignment trustee, who was a creditor for £90, induced the debtor to give him a bill of sale on the assets assigned under the deed. The proceeds were only brought into account in in consequence of pressure from this Department.

Another trustee, who was a creditor for £111, out of total liabilities for £177, got the other creditors to accept a composition of 4s. in the £, while he paid himself at the rate of 17s. 10½d. in the £.

Under the bankruptcy rules the trustee may not purchase any part of the estate, or buy goods from his employer or partner for the purpose of carrying on a business without the express sanction of the court, but there is no such safeguard in the case of deeds, and instances are found of both abuses. Thus a trustee under a deed was a clerk or manager of a firm of creditors. He carried on the debtor's business for three years, during which time he purchased goods from his employers' firm. The debtor estimated his assets at £226. The trustee sold them at £142 without valuation, his explanation being that he wished to save auctioneer's and valuer's charges.

There is no control over solicitor's costs, which are sometimes excessive. In a case in which only one creditor signed the deed, the accounts showed a payment of £111 10s. to a solicitor for defence of actions. It was alleged by a complainant that the trustee in this case had a broken-down solicitor in his employ to whom he paid a small weekly sum and used his name as a cover for payment of law costs, of which he (the trustee) personally had the benefit. In another case the solicitor's charges were found to include the costs which the trustee had been compelled to pay in connection with the proceedings instituted by the Board of Trade to enforce the transmission of the prescribed annual account.

There is no guarantee that persons employed by the trustee are properly brought to account. Thus the auctioneers who sold an estate were allowed by the trustee to retain an amount of £16 2s. 6d. due to them by the debtor before the execution of the deed. The other creditors received 6s. in the £ only. In the absence of any provision for the payment of moneys into a separate banking account there is nothing to prevent trustees from mixing estate moneys with their own, and the less scrupulous of their number have accordingly a direct interest in delaying distribution. In the case of a trustee who acts under numerous deeds, some of the creditors complain that he retains dividends payable to them for a very long time and that his agents write to creditors from a private address, offering to purchase claims for a rate in the £ less than the assets are sufficient to pay. In one of this trustee's cases I have received separate complaints from five creditors as to the difficulty experienced in obtaining their dividends, but the Board of Trade have no power to intervene in such cases. The system appeared to be to pay dividends only under pressure. There are numerous instances in which trustees after realising assets have absconded, and as there is no system of taking security from assignment trustees the creditors have of course lost the benefit of the estate. Persons entirely without means and of indifferent character frequently obtain trusteeships. Bankruptcy does not disqualify a trustee from acting under a deed, and instances occur in which the person appointed is either an undischarged bankrupt or becomes bankrupt or executes an assignment while continuing to act as trustee. The Department is put to great trouble and expense in obtaining accounts from such impecunious trustees, and when an order is obtained against them they are unable to pay the costs. Thus two brothers working together as principal and clerk have obtained assignment in numerous cases, and they only render accounts pursuant to Orders of Court, and are then unable to pay the costs of the motions. It cost £60 in one year to obtain accounts from one of them. Another trustee who has caused much trouble and expense was formerly a solicitor's clerk, and, after taking his employer's money, filed a petition in bankruptcy. Although an undischarged bankrupt, he managed to get appointed trustee under two deeds of arrangement. The trustee in another case was a solicitor. He furnished one account showing a balance of £57, and no further account could be obtained. Proceedings against him were useless, as he was reported to be destitute, and to be begging for coppers in the street. It is noteworthy that, in 1899, twenty-nine trustees acting in fifty eight cases were reported as "Gone away," and the demands for accounts were returned through the Dead Letter Office. In twenty-four of these cases no accounts at all had been received, and in thirty-four cases the total balances shown by the last accounts rendered amounted to £1,384.

Debtors have not been slow to find out that the execution of a deed of assignment to a friendly trustee practically affords an immediate protection to them from their creditors. Thus, in one case, the debtors being threatened with proceedings by a creditor, assigned the estate to the trustee for protection. In the meanwhile they arranged with their creditors, and the trustee then re-assigned the estate back to the debtors. In another case the debtor assigned his estate to his own traveller, who filed one account showing receipts £327, and payments (not including anything to creditors), £211, but applications for further accounts were returned through the Dead Letter Office marked "Gone away," and endeavours to trace the whereabouts of either debtor or trustee were unsuccessful.

A debtor with the assistance of a competent solicitor and accountant can generally carry an arrangement. It is by no means necessary for this purpose to call a meeting of creditors. It is true that in organised trades such as drapery, leather, grocery, etc., private meetings are usually called as a preliminary to the execution of a deed, and in such cases the debtor's affairs and conduct are subjected to a more or less rigorous scrutiny, but a debtor often finds it to his advantage to negotiate with creditors individually rather than at a meeting. To quote the words of an official receiver who has had large experience in the investigation of deeds: "The debtor and his solicitor employ an accountant to make a preliminary statement of affairs, and the registered deed in favour of such accountant is often the first public information which the creditors receive of the insolvency. The trustee thus appointed (nominally to represent the creditors) owes his nomination to the grace of the debtor and his solicitor, and, in this invidious position, he to some extent fights the debtor's battle in helping him to keep his affairs out of the bankruptcy court." Creditors do not fail to discover that they have practically no control over trustees nominated in such circumstances, and complaints are frequent as to their inability to obtain information as to the position of the estate or as to the prospect of dividend. They appeal to the Board of Trade, and learn with surprise that the Department can do nothing to assist them outside the provisions of Section 25 of the Act of 1890, which merely gives certain powers to the Board of Trade to get in accounts.

The following extract from a letter received from a solicitor acting on behalf of creditors is a good specimen of other letters received respecting the conduct of trustees under deeds of arrangement :—

"I am beyond measure surprised to find that the Board of Trade have no control over the administration of estates under deeds of arrangement. To put it plainly, it amounts to this: that the trustee of a deed of arrangement can receive as much money as he can possibly obtain; that he can hold this money as long as he chooses; and that when he is applied to by the largest creditor for information he can write the most insulting letters without the slightest provocation, save that of demanding an account, and yet that the Board of Trade are absolutely powerless in the matter."

In another case a complainant wrote that the trustee had decamped with all the available assets, and that although the creditors wished to substitute another trustee, the substitution could only be made by an application to the Court, for which there were no funds to pay; "this scandalous state of affairs seems likely to obtain, that a trustee takes away the whole of the proceeds of an estate and the creditors are powerless either to remove him from the trust which he has so shamefully abused or to appoint someone else to look after their interests."

In July last a creditor under a deed complained that he could get no dividend, although the trustee had sold the estate and received the proceeds in February. The Board of Trade have no control over the trustee, but I asked him for an explanation and received an evasive answer. In January of the present year the creditor complained that he could still get neither dividend nor information. My further inquiries were met by the trustee with a plea of illness. This particular accountant has had thirteen cases since December 1897, only one of which has been wound up. In three of them complaints have been received as to his dealings with the estate or as to non-payment of dividend, and in several the trustee is in default as to his accounts. In four cases the deeds were set aside by bankruptcy proceedings and the trustee was required to account for his transactions, with the following results:—

Re G. G.—Account, unverified, showed receipts £313 3s. 3d., payments £309 12s. 6d., balance paid to trustee in bankruptcy.

Re F. W. B.—The official receiver took proceedings against him and obtained an order for amount claimed, £122 9s. 6d. and costs, but nothing has been recovered.

Re M. R.—His account, unverified, showed receipts £19 5s. 6d. and payments £25 18s.

Re C. G. F.—The trustee in bankruptcy has been unable to obtain any account and letters have been returned through the post marked "gone away."

In another case of the present year, in which this accountant is concerned, the largest creditor has complained that an effort was made to induce him to accept 10s. in the £ by a representation that the debtor's liabilities were £1,084 against assets of the approximate value of £600. The accountant (or his firm) wrote that "as a result of our investigation we are of opinion it is to the distinct advantage of the creditors that they fall in with this arrangement." The creditor, not satisfied with these assurances, made inquiries and found that the liabilities were £1,665 against assets £2,200, and an offer of 20s. in the £ from the debtor's father was then forthcoming. The circular offering 10s. in the £ appears to indicate a deliberate attempt on the part of the debtor and the accountant to induce creditors to accept an amount far below what the estate would yield.

The extent to which deeds of arrangement are executed and carried through without any reference to the wishes of creditors is becoming serious. This system is much facilitated by the methods of certain accountants, not belonging to any of the recognised professional bodies, who carry on an advertising and touting business under the cloak of some high-sounding name of an association for the guardianship or protection of trade. Their proceedings are attracting the attention of professional accountants, and the following extract from "The Accountant" newspaper may be taken as a very fair representation of the modus operandi of these so-called associations:—

"The most frequent device appears to be to circularise small traders against whom judgments have been entered. These circulars usually warn the trader against getting into the clutches of a money-lender, but in every other respect they bear a strong family likeness to the ordinary money-lender's touting circular, and the ultimate effect upon the trader is also very similar. The first step is to induce him to pay the 'association' a call, and he is then interviewed by one of the managers (or, in other words, by one of the accountants who work the concern) and induced, for the protection of his estate for the general body of his creditors, to execute a deed of assignment in favour of one of the employees of the 'association.' The trustee under the deed of assignment probably undertakes to pay the creditors a composition, or to perhaps even pay them in full; but to enable this to be done the debtor is usually required, in addition to surrendering his whole estate, to make a further payment weekly to the trustee, presumably out of anything that he may earn after parting with all his assets.

"It will thus be seen that the benefit derived by the debtor under such an arrangement is a minus quantity, but even his position is probably preferable to that of the creditors. The trustee at once sets about realising the estate and running up a heavy bill of charges. Probably there are no creditors sufficiently large to enable them to file a petition in bankruptcy, and they are generally too ignorant of the law to combine for a joint petition; while outside of bankruptcy, the position of the trustee under a deed of assignment is, of course, unassailable. He can realise the estate as he likes, and charge what he pleases for doing so, with the result that in the long run the whole of the proceeds probably find their way into his pocket. In the unusual event, however, of bankruptcy proceedings being taken, it will generally be found that the trustee is either a man of straw—against whom it would be idle to waste money in law costs—or else (as has occurred in some cases) he cannot be found, and grave doubts are cast upon the question as to whether he ever existed. So that, whether the matter ends in bankruptcy or not, the net result generally is that the creditors receive no dividend, while the debtor has had to surrender, ostensibly for their benefit, not merely the whole of his estate, but also a portion of his subsequent earnings."

The ease with which trustees of the class mentioned above can defy creditors and manipulate estates to their own advantage is largely attributable to the high minimum limit of the debt which qualifies a creditor to file a bankruptcy petition, viz., £50. It will be observed from Table IX., p. 4[1], that more than half the debts disclosed in debtor's statements of affairs are under £10, and it may be assumed that the debts of £50 and upwards form a very small proportion of the whole. If therefore the few large creditors on an assigning debtor's estate can be "squared" or kept quiet for three months from the date of the assignment, the remaining large numerical majority are practically at the mercy of an unscrupulous trustee. It is true that a combination of small creditors whose debts jointly amount to £50, may file a petition, but creditors do not necessarily know each other, and it is always difficult to secure such co-operation. Where a deed is entered into at the instance of creditors who select their own trustee, there is no reason why this form of liquidation should not be carried out advantageously for all concerned so long as dissentient creditors are not coerced into acquiescence, but where the invitation by the debtor or his assignee, the present conditions as to the amount of the petitioner's debt seriously affect the control which the creditors might otherwise exercise over the proceedings of the assignment trustee.

Extract from Report by the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy for the Year 1904.

It has been frequently pointed out that Section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, while empowering the Board of Trade to collect statistics of proceedings under deeds of arrangement, does not enable them to exercise any control over the trustees acting in pursuance of such deeds except for the purpose of enforcing the annual accounts of receipts and payments required by the section. It has, however, been thought desirable to furnish the Director of Public Prosecutions with informa ion as to the conduct of some trustees whose proceedings have been of a fraudulent character. In three cases proceedings have been instituted and warrants issued.

In one case in which a conviction was obtained the assignment was made to a nominee of the person who dealt with the assets and who may be described as the acting trustee. This latter person, aided by a confederate, removed and apparently retained some of the assigned stock-in-trade and misappropriated the proceeds (estimated at from £125 to £150) of the sale by auction of the remainder of the stock, also two promissory notes of £25 each handed to him by the debtor as forming part of the estate. The debtor was adjudicated bankrupt within three months of the execution of the deed, which was therefore invalidated, but neither accounts nor the money received under the deed could be obtained by the official receiver. The acting trustee and his confederate were found guilty of conspiracy to defraud, and were sentenced respectively to twelve months and four months hard labour. This trustee had been an undischarged bankrupt since July, 1900, but had nevertheless succeeded in securing trusteeships under twenty-two deeds of arrangement by using the names of other persons. Nine of these deeds were set aside by bankruptcy proceedings, leaving thirteen estates to be dealt with by him. Except in one case, no accounts have yet been obtained, the persons in whose names the trusteeships were taken disclaiming all knowledge of the matters. In the single case in which an account was furnished, the net realisations were shown at £188 8s. 1d., out of which credit was taken for trustee's remuneration, £66 4s. 6d.; trustee's out of pockets, £40 17s.; costs of registering deed, £2 17s.; preferential rent, £15; leaving balance in hand undistributed at end of 1902, £63 9s. 7d. Complaints from six creditors have been received in this case alone. The imprisonment of this practitioner has for the time being checked his activities, but there is apparently nothing to prevent him from acquiring trusteeships under deeds as previously when he is released.

During 1904 receiving orders were made against four accountants who were in the habit of taking trusteeships under deeds of arrangement, and the following particulars indicate the position in respect of their trusts:—

H. had seven outstanding trusteeships when he was adjudicated bankrupt. The particulars given below (taken from the last accounts lodged) show that large amounts were due from him in respect of some of these matters.

The Statement of Affairs filed by this accountant admitted liabilities in respect of five of these deeds amounting to £4,344, subject to some claim for remuneration. It is estimated that his assets will not yield a dividend of more than a few pence in the £. He has left the country.

C. was trustee under six deeds of arrangement, and the last accounts received show balances amounting in the aggregate to £1,031 6s. 4d. Communications have been received by the Department from creditors in these matters complaining of the non-distribution of the estates. This accountant absconded just before a warrant was issued for his arrest, proceedings against him having been commenced by the Director of Public Prosecutions. No dividend is likely to be paid under his bankruptcy.

D. was trustee under twelve deeds of arrangement. The balances in his hands, as shown by his accounts rendered to the Department, amount in all to £734 10s. 5d. The unsecured debts in this accountant's bankruptcy include liabilities in respect of deeds of arrangement amounting to £846, and his assets are not likely to yield any dividend.

W. was trustee under two deeds of arrangement. He has rendered no account to the Board of Trade in respect of one of these matters, but in the other matter accounts to December 31st, 1903, have been furnished, which show a balance of £227 2s. 3d. In the statement of affairs filed by him in his bankruptcy he shows balances remaining in his hands as trustee under these deeds of £137 17s. 4d. and £17 respectively. A dividend of 1s 1¾d. in the £ has been declared in his bankruptcy.

In addition to these cases in which the trustees have been adjudicated bankrupt, the following cases may be mentioned of trustees who have recently died or disappeared after having kept in hand balances, of the distribution of which there is no evidence:—

G. died quite recently, being then trustee under four deeds of arrangement executed in October, 1896, February, 1897, April, 1902, and December, 1903. In the first three cases, accounts had been received showing the position up to December 31st, 1903, but those for 1904 were not rendered. The balances in hand at December 31st, 1903, were respectively £583, £227, and £257 (out of £877, £306, and £528 gross receipts). The accounts do not show any payment of dividend. In the fourth case, in which the estimated assets were £340, the position is unknown. I have no precise information as to the state of this accountant's affairs, but as a result of some informal inquiries it is gathered that his estate is insolvent, and is not likely to produce a dividend.

L. is reported to have committed suicide towards the end of 1903. He was trustee under five outstanding deeds of arrangement at the time of his decease, and the accounts rendered to the Department show balances amounting in all to £1,736 7s. 9d. In three of these cases, in which the balances due amounted to £1,699, the new trustees have received from the administration of the deceased's estate £295 by way of first and final dividend for distribution amongst the creditors.

L. is reported to have absconded recently. He has eight outstanding trusteeships, and the accounts to December 31st, 1903, rendered in six of these matters show no dividend whatever paid to creditors, and balances in hand amounting in all to £765 9s. 5d. In the two remaining cases no accounts have been rendered. Several complaints have been received from creditors respecting this trustee's conduct.

F., who has recently disappeared, was trustee under nine deeds of arrangement. In four cases the last accounts received, brought down to December 31st, 1903, showed balances in hand amounting to £187 15s. 2d. In four other cases in which the deeds were executed during 1904 no accounts have been received.

The above cases are mentioned as illustrating the grounds of the complaints which are from time to time made by creditors to the Department, but it is not suggested that they are typical of the administration of estates by trustees under deeds of arrangement generally.

On the contrary, there is no reason to doubt that, in the large majority of cases, the trusts of the deeds are honestly and efficiently carried out.

Further instances not published in Annual Reports.

The acting trustee under a deed who was sentenced to twelve months' hard labour for conspiracy to defraud creditors—see Extract from Report for 1904, ante—upon being released from prison towards the end of the year 1905, changed his name by deed poll, and between December, 1905, and August, 1906, obtained trusteeships under seven deeds of arrangement. Five of these deeds were set aside, four by subsequent bankruptcy and one by a fresh deed appointing another person trustee.

The following are the particulars of two other cases in which the affairs of a trustee acting under a deed of arrangement have come into bankruptcy:—

(1) The bankrupt, a chartered accountant, effected a private arrangement with his creditors in 1875, and paid them 1s. in the £. He then took a situation as clerk until 1893, when he entered as partner a firm of accountants. In that year he was appointed trustee under a deed of assignment in which capacity he received £909, and took credit for £534 distributed in dividend. The dividend lists, however, which he furnished with the accounts required by Section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, showed that at least £122 of the dividends had not been paid away. He admitted that he ought to have had that amount in hand, but that he mixed the moneys of the trusteeship with his own in his private bank account, and had spent the balance for which he was accountable. His assets have only realised £1 13s., and there is, therefore, nothing available for dividend on his own liabilities (£1,238), or on the amounts due to the unpaid creditors under the deed. The case illustrates the importance of having some such provision in regard to deeds of arrangement as that contained in Section 162 of the Bankruptcy Act, by which trustees in bankruptcy are required to pay unclaimed dividends into the Bankruptcy Estates Account, there to await claim by the persons entitled. It may be mentioned that many trustees under deeds of arrangement would be glad to relieve themselves of the custody of unclaimed dividends by such an expedient; but the Board of Trade have no power to receive the funds.

(2) A man carrying on business as an auctioneer was appointed trustee under six deeds of arrangement during the years 1893 and 1894, and the accounts which have been rendered to the Department up to the present time show that he has received in respect of these cases the sum of £3,652 1s. 5d., but has paid nothing whatever to creditors. In one case the accounts show an undistributed balance of £592 10s. 11½d., which has evidently been misappropriated by the trustee. He was adjudicated bankrupt in July, 1895, and under his bankruptcy a dividend has been reserved in respect of the amounts due from him as trustee in these matters, but the total amount reserved is only about £40, and, failing action on the part of creditors to get the trustee removed, he himself is the only person who can deal with this money. Notwithstanding the way he has administered the six estates referred to, and notwithstanding his bankruptcy in July, 1895, he was appointed trustee under another deed in February, 1898, and in that case his accounts show that he has received £437 7s. 1d., and paid creditors only £94 14s. 5d., whilst a balance of £131 6s. 11d. is shown to have been standing to the credit of the estate since December, 1898. Complaints from ten different sources have been received by the Board of Trade respecting this man's conduct, two having relation to his administration of the last-mentioned estate.

Two other instances in which an undischarged bankrupt has been appointed trustee under a deed of arrangement were brought to the notice of the Department during the year 1901.

Frequently trustees retain money for an unreasonable time, but the Board of Trade have no power to assist the creditors who complain; e.g., in a case in which the trustee was appointed in June, 1895, the accounts show that he has retained in his hands £279 2s. 10d. since December, 1896, and creditors have complained to the Board of Trade that they cannot get him to pay a dividend. No satisfactory explanation can be obtained from the trustee, and from inquiries made by the summoning officer of the Department it appears that the address given by the trustee is that of a small newspaper shop where he calls for letters.

Reference was made in the Annual Report for 1899 to the methods of certain accountants who carry on an advertising and touting business under the guise of an association for the guardianship or protection of trade.

It was pointed out that their method is to circularise small traders, against whom judgments have been entered, and induce them under specious promises to execute deeds which are administered in the interest of the trustee, rather than of the debtor or of the creditors. These practices have been the subject of further representations to the Department during the year 1900.

The principal practitioner in this class of business has had 172 cases since January 1st, 1894, and at least fifty complaints against him have been received. His practice of retaining the proceeds of estates until forced by individual creditors to pay dividends to them rendered him unpleasantly notorious in the district where he carried on business, and during 1899 and 1900 he ceased to obtain trusteeships personally, but there is reason to believe that he acted either through a substitute or under an alias, as about this time an accountant of different name, but whose handwriting appeared to be similar, obtained twenty-five trusteeships, with assets estimated at £3,115, in the course of six months. Similar complaints from creditors as to non-receipt of dividends were also addressed to the Department in these cases. In only two out of the twenty-five cases were accounts lodged with the Department. The trustee has disappeared, leaving no trace behind him. An official receiver who was asked to serve him with an order for accounts replied, "I have had several summonses to serve upon this man, but have been unable to effect service. He has a bad reputation, has left the district, no one knows where he has gone to, and his offices are closed."

The following is a copy of a circular addressed by a touting trustee to a debtor in financial difficulties who subsequently had to file his petition:—

"Dear Sir,—I am prepared to assist you out of your difficulties. I invariably carry out successfully private arrangements with creditors varying from 2s. 6d. to 5s. in the £, in full settlement, without publicity, and I also protect your stock and household furniture against seizure by County Court bailiffs and the sheriff. I consider it is a great mistake for tradesmen, when they find themselves in difficulties, to continue to pay heavy legal costs, as the same would go a long way to clear their liabilities. I also blame tradesmen in filing their petition in bankruptcy; by so doing the official receiver or trustee steps in and takes possession of all you possess, and you afterwards have to be publicly examined and stand the stigma of being called a bankrupt, and be obliged to trade in some other name than your own. Again, no guarantee company will assist an undischarged bankrupt, which often means ruin to a man who is offered a profitable situation in a commercial house. My system of business obviates all this. I make advances at a reasonable rate of interest. I am also the largest purchaser of book debts in Wales. I pay cash prompt when purchase price agreed, and can be seen any day by appointment. All business with me strictly private.

"Yours respectfully,
"E. L."

The debtor subsequently placed himself in correspondence with L., who wrote him a series of letters pointing out how successful he had been in other cases in getting creditors to accept a small composition, and how in the meantime, provided the debtor executes a deed in his favour, "no bailiff dare distrain upon any of your goods, and all Court summonses are stopped. . . . Your business will not at all be interfered with; you will go on as usual. No one in your district will know anything. . . . I shall stop at once all County Court executions and all other proceedings immediately you sign the deed.

. . . I can protect you as safe as the bank." By these representations the debtor was induced to execute a deed and to pay L. five guineas for "out of pocket expenses." The deed purported to be between the debtor, L., and "the several persons and firms, whose names are subscribed in the schedule herein, being creditors of the said debtor," and to be in consideration of the creditors making and executing a release to the debtor. It went on to recite that the creditors had agreed to accept the proposal. Power was given to the trustee to realise the debtor's stock-in-trade, book debts, personal effects, etc., and to apply the proceeds in payment of costs and debts with a resulting trust for the debtor. Power was reserved to the trustee to postpone the sale and carry on the business for such time as he might think fit. Notwithstanding the recitals as to the assent of creditors, the creditors knew nothing of the deed until they saw notice of it in a trade gazette. L. admitted that he never received any consent from the creditors, and that the deed was drawn up in his office by his clerk, who, he said, adopted the wrong form. Ultimately the debtor filed his own petition, and the matter came into the hands of the official receiver.

The following instance shows how a trustee who does not dishonestly retain moneys may contrive to administer the estate in the interest of the assigning debtor. In the case of J. J. R. the assets produced £602, and the claims of the ordinary creditors amounted to £460. After providing for costs and preferential debts (£87) there was more than sufficient to pay 20s. in the £. Instead of doing so, however, the trustee induced thirteen creditors for £203 to accept 12s. in the £, one creditor for £32 to accept 16s. in the £, three creditors for £20 to accept 7s. 3d., 10s., and 13s. 6d. in the £ respectively, whilst the four largest creditors for £206 in all (including the trustee's firm for £97) received 20s. in the £. The surplus of £152 was handed to the debtor. It would be interesting to know what representations the trustee made to the creditors who were induced to accept less than 20s. in the £.

J. A. P. makes a practice of sending letters to persons against whom County Court judgments are registered with a view of obtaining trusteeships under deeds of arrangement. He and his partner have been appointed trustees in 230 deeds of arrangement since the year 1892. Many complaints have been received from creditors as to non-payment of dividend; accounts in respect of twenty-five of P.'s closed cases, taken at random, were examined, and it was found that in twenty-one of them no dividend whatever was paid, and that in the remaining four cases the aggregate amount paid to creditors was £25 13s. 1d. only. The net realisations in these twenty-five cases amounted to £788.

In one case P. rendered in July, 1904, an account which he verified by affidavit in the form used for verifying final accounts, and in which he charged £37 17s. 1d. for dividends. The dividend list forwarded with the account, however, showed all dividends as unpaid, and consequently in January, 1906, the trustee was asked to render a further account, but this he refused to do. Enquiries were then addressed to seven of the largest creditors; five replied that they had not received the dividend or notice thereof, and the other two replied that they were paid in March, 1905, and August, 1905, respectively, after considerable pressure had been brought to bear upon the trustee.

In another case P. declared a dividend of 20s. in the £, but the list forwarded with the final account showed only six creditors, whose dividends amounted to £21 4s. 2d., as paid, whilst five creditors, whose dividends amounted to £50 5s., were shown as unpaid. Four months after the final account was transmitted, the five creditors stated, in reply to enquiries made by the Department, that they had not been paid their dividends, and three of them stated that they had received no notice that a dividend had been declared.

In order to ascertain the extent to which creditors are in a position to exercise an effective control over deeds of arrangements by filing bankruptcy petitions, in the event of their being dissatisfied with the proposals submitted to them, an analysis was made of the liabilities in the first 500 deeds of arrangement registered in the year 1900. It showed a total of 15,268 creditors whose claims were under £50; and of only 2,057 creditors whose claims were over £50. In 115 cases out of the 500 there was no creditor whose claim was over £50. If these cases, as may fairly be assumed, are typical of the whole number, it would appear that the £50 limit, imposed by Section 6 (1*a*) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, deprives the vast majority of creditors of the power to bring into bankruptcy the affairs of a debtor, who, without perhaps any prior consultation with his creditors, has executed a deed of assignment to a trustee.

The whole of the cases during the year 1900 were examined with a view of ascertaining the class of persons who act as trustees under deeds, and as a result it was found that in a very large number of cases the persons appointed were not members of any recognised body of accountants, and were, therefore, not subject even to such moderate control as is exercised in the case of professional trustees.

It is not surprising, therefore, to find that the number of defaulting and absconding trustees under deeds of arrangement is very considerable. While under the Bankruptcy Act every estate is duly accounted for and officially audited, and every loss by a defaulting trustee is required to be made good by means of adequate guarantees, there were no fewer than 235 cases during the past six years in which deeds of arrangement were entered into and no accounts of any kind have been rendered to the Department, while guarantees for fidelity in administering the funds are practically unknown. And, even if default occurs and the trustees does not abscond, there are no means of bringing him to account except at the instance of defrauded creditors, who can only do so in the rare cases where they are in a position to prove the acts of fraud, and then only at an expenditure of time, trouble and money which the vast majority of creditors cannot, or will not, incur.

Arrangements with Creditors without Deed.

A number of complaints have been received from creditors in respect of the conduct of trustees under arrangements without registered deeds. The following is an instance :—

J. H. V. was formerly a member of the Society of Accountants and Auditors, but was excluded from the society in 1903. While acting under a private arrangement without deed he received moneys for distribution, and, although he sent a statement to a complaining creditor showing payment of a dividend, enquiry disclosed the fact that no creditor except the one who had complained received any dividend. V. was elected trustee in a bankruptcy in July 1905, but after having had an opportunity (of which he failed to avail himself) of explaining his conduct in the above case, and of furnishing evidence that the creditors had received the benefit of the moneys placed in his hands for settlement of their claims, his appointment as trustee was objected to on the ground that he was not fit to act as trustee. Complaints against V. in connection with several other private arrangements without deed have been received in the Department.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE COUNCIL OF THE LAW SOCIETY AS TO MATTERS INCLUDED IN THE REFERENCE TO THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE OF THE BOARD OF TRADE ADOPTED BY THE COUNCIL, JULY 20th, 1906.

It has been referred to the Departmental Committee to inquire into and report upon the effect of the provisions of the laws at present in force in the United Kingdom in relation to bankruptcy, deeds of arrangement, and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors, and the prevention and punishment of frauds by debtors on their creditors, and the points and matters in which those laws and the procedure and administration under them require amendment, with special reference to the following questions:—

1. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor and the imposition on him of punishment or disabilities should be amended or provision be made that the conduct of such a debtor should in every case be brought before the Court for consideration, whether he applies for a discharge in his bankruptcy or not.

2. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the discharge of a bankrupt and the conditions on which such a discharge should be granted, refused or suspended should be made more stringent, so as more effectually to check improper and reckless trading, and the neglect by traders to keep proper books and accounts, or be otherwise altered or modified.

3. Whether power should be given to the law society to refuse to renew the certificates of solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, subject to appeal to the Master of the Rolls.

4. Whether the existing provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the realisation and administration of property should be amended so as to secure a more immediate realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt as soon as possible after a receiving order has been made.

5. Whether the law so far as it enables the trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the bankrupt's estate all the bankrupt's after acquired property should be modified in any, and what, way, so as to protect persons who have honestly become creditors of the bankrupt since his bankruptcy or have purchased or taken mortgages or securities over such after acquired property from the bankrupt.

6. Whether the provisions of the law by which a married woman can in certain circumstances be made bankrupt should be extended so as to render all, or some, and what, classes of married women who incur debts on their own account (whether trading separately from their husband or not) subject to the bankruptcy laws.

7. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the avoidance of marriage and other settlements, covenants and securities made by persons who afterwards become bankrupt, should be extended so as to prevent the trustees and persons claiming under such settlements, covenants and securities from afterwards competing unfairly with the persons who have become creditors of the bankrupt for valuable consideration in money or money's worth, and to protect bona fide purchasers and incumbrancers of property under such disposition as above described.

8. Whether the provisions of the laws relating to voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors should be amended so as to place the debtor and the trustee under any such arrangement or composition, and the terms and conditions of the arrangement or composition, more under control, and provide for official audits of the trustee's accounts, and official control over the assets in his hands.

9. Whether the existing laws which prescribe the registration of certain classes of securities given by debtors should be extended, so as to include, and apply to, general assignments of book debts, hiring agreements and other forms of securities which are at present exempt from registration.

The observations of the Council of the law society have been invited.

The Committee propose in the first place to deal with the special questions included in the reference, leaving other matters on which they desire to make suggestions to be dealt with at the end of the report.

1. The Committee regret to observe that the tendency of the suggestions generally is in the direction of increased punishments, disabilities, and restrictions.

In their opinion the bankruptcy laws are already too stringent, and so far from checking reckless trading they have tended largely to increase the number of undischarged bankrupts who accept the disabilities attaching to that state rather than face the ordeal of an application for discharge. In this connection it may be useful to compare the law of the United States with our own. In a note on the Penal Consequences of bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Laws of England and the United States, by Mr. E. W. Hansell, in "The Journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation," New Series, No. 12, the author says that the United States Bankruptcy Law prescribes five offences relating to misconduct by a bankrupt and other persons in connection with the bankruptcy for which the maximum penalty is two years' imprisonment, and that as against this the English Acts prescribe no fewer than nineteen misdemeanors and one felony, for which the maximum penalty is, in all but three cases, two years' imprisonment with hard labour.

The Committee are of opinion that without any application on the part of the bankrupt his conduct should at a convenient stage of the proceedings be brought before the Court for its consideration preparatory to the bankrupt's discharge.

2. The Committee are doubtful how far improper and reckless trading and the neglect to keep proper books are matters that are capable of remedy by legislation. Certainly the present regulations have not operated as a deterrent, and the committee have no reason to suppose that more stringent regulations would be more effective. They think that in the interests of the community a bankrupt's discharge should be granted in all cases in which it is supported by a substantial majority of the creditors, and in other cases should be in the discretion of the Court but should be refused only in special circumstances, and that the punishment of the bankrupt should in general be other than the withholding of his discharge.

By refusing the discharge where the bankrupt's assets are not of a value equal to 10s. in the £ on the amount of his unsecured liabilities the legislature has practically reduced all bankrupts to one common level without distinctive treatment notwithstanding that there may be a material difference in the circumstances causing or resulting in the debtor's failure. The latter part of Sub-section (a) of Clause 3 of Section 8 of the Act of 1890 which doubtless was intended to give opportunity for making distinctions is practically a dead letter.

The Committee are of opinion that a complete list of undischarged bankrupts and of persons against whom administration orders have been made should be published annually as a supplement to the London Gazette.

3. The Committee are of opinion that power should be given to the Law Society to refuse to renew the certificates of solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts subject to an appeal to the Master of the Rolls.

A Bill with this subject has been prepared by the Society and introduced from time to time in Parliament, but notwithstanding the goodwill of the Government has failed to pass.

4. The existing regulations as to the realisation and administration of a debtor's property, except as hereinafter stated, appear to the Committee to be ample. They are certainly not in favour of additional facilities being given for realisation of the debtor's property between the date of the receiving order and adjudication, except that in urgent cases there should be power for the Court to order an immediate sale. The Committee are of opinion however that the realisations upon County Court Administration Orders under Section 122 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 have been more satisfactory and much less expensive than in the case of estates administered summarily in bankruptcy under Section 121. Section 122 has also enabled County Court Judges to give relief to a judgment debtor and at the same time to compel him to pay a reasonable sum by instalments out of his future earnings towards the total or partial liquidation of his debts. This system, which may be said to have been at first experimental, has now been tried for some years and has, the Committee believe, proved entirely beneficial. It is however at present confined to cases where the total indebtedness does not exceed £50. The Committee think that this low limit might with much advantage be now raised to £150 or even £200, and so made to include many cases which are at present administered summarily as "small bankruptcies" under Section 121.

5. In Cohen v. Mitchell 25 Q.B.D. 262 the proposition was formally laid down by the Court of Appeal that until the trustee intervenes all transactions by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy with any person dealing with him bona fide and for value in respect of his after acquired property, whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, are valid. This rule was held in Re Clayton's Contract [1895] 2 Ch. 212 to apply to leasehold property, but the Court refused in re New Land Development Association and Gray [1892] 2 Ch. 138 to extend it to freeholds. It appears to the Committee that under the existing law real injustice is done to the bona fide purchaser of freehold property, and they think that an amendment of the law which will extend the rule laid down in Cohen v Mitchell to these cases is very desirable. They adopt the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Bill 1903 prepared by the Council of the Law Society. It would be a convenience to conveyancers and also a safeguard against fraud if a similar statutory provision to that contained in Section 2 of the Conveyancing Act 1882 were made with regard to searches for bankruptcies and deeds of arrangement.

6. The Committee consider that the balance of convenience is in favour of limiting the operation of the bankruptcy law applicable to married women to those who are trading separately from their husbands but they are of opinion that it should be made possible to found a bankruptcy notice on the usual form of judgment against a married woman as settled in Scott v. Morley 20 Q.B.D. 120.

7. The Committee consider that the law as to the avoidance of settlements on bankruptcy should not be made stringent and might reasonably be relaxed in favour of bona fide purchasers and incumbrancers whether before or after the bankruptcy.

8. The Committee do not recommend any alteration of the law as regards deeds of arrangement except that a certain majority, say a majority in number and three-fourths in value of creditors assenting should be competent to bind a dissenting minority, unless within a certain time any creditor for say £50 satisfies the Court that it is unreasonable that they should be bound or at any time that there is fraud, or fraudulent concealment, or misrepresentation. In the Board of Trade Report for the year 1904 it was stated that the accounts collected under Section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act 1890 "continue to illustrate the numerous abuses connected with the administration of estates under the deeds of arrangement Act 1887." There is nothing in the Report itself to confirm this ; on the contrary not only the Report in question but the succeeding Report show that creditors who are as a rule men of business prefer to withdraw their debtors' estates from the operation of the existing bankruptcy law and that such estates are administered with economy and dispatch.

9. The Committee consider that the registration of securities should not be extended. The ordinary hire purchase agreement which apparently is intended to be included in the term securities is now of such everyday occurrence that a person giving credit ought to assume in default of evidence to the contrary that the hire purchase system has been adopted and be guided accordingly.

Turning now to matters not specifically dealt with in the reference, the Committee venture to suggest that the present bankruptcy administration is unpopular with creditors and is conducted at a great annual loss to the State by reason that it fails to conform to the scheme outlined by Mr. Chamberlain when he introduced the Bill of 1883. He said that "the principle which he had adopted was that the collection and distribution of the assets of a bankrupt estate were primarily the duty of the creditors themselves, and he had accordingly limited official interference to the supervision which was necessary for the protection of a minority of creditors and in order to secure honest dealing on the part of all persons employed on the administration of the estate."

It is not in the Act itself, but in the administration of it that this principle has been departed from, and the Committee consider that such amendments of the Act are necessary as will tend to bring the administration into accord with the scheme originally laid down by Mr. Chamberlain.

The following is an outline of the amendments the Committee suggest for this purpose :—

10. Section 12 of the Act of 1883 should be so amended as to give either the Court or an official receiver or a interim receiver power to appoint a manager, and it should be made clear that if the official receiver or interim receiver should refuse to make such an appointment, any creditor might, nevertheless, apply to the Court to appoint ex parte on affidavit, stating shortly the grounds and the fitness of the proposed manager.

It is only the official receiver who at present, under Section 12 of the Act of 1883, has power to appoint a manager and if he refuses to do so there is no appeal from his decision. It is also by no means clear that an official receiver who is only appointed interim receiver under Section 10 has power to make such an appointment.

11. The regulations as to proxies should be relaxed and the distinction between special and general proxies should be abolished. This could be carried out by amending Rule 17 of Schedule 1 in such a way as to enable a creditor to give a general proxy to any person instead of, as at present, to his manager or clerk or other person in his regular employment. It is reasonable that he should have the right to appoint his solicitor or accountant or another creditor to represent him fully for the purpose of voting. The creditor however should be at liberty to limit his proxy if he so desired. The Committee see no reason why all forms of proxy should be issued by the official receiver or trustee (Bankruptcy Act, 1890, Section 22), provided the form, which should be simple in character, is substantially followed nor for the requirement (Rule 19 of 1st Schedule of Bankruptcy Act 1883 and Bankruptcy Rule 245) that proxies cannot be used unless deposited with the official receiver or trustee the day before the meeting. The Committee think that these regulations might well be recinded. The proxies could be tendered with the proofs or statements of the claims at the first meeting.

12. The expense and trouble of proving all the debts by affidavit might advantageously be saved by allowing creditors to send in written and signed statements of their claims as is done in the case of liquidations under deeds of arrangement. These claims could of course be verified by affidavit if the trustee should require it. In the majority of trade failures the claims in respect of trade debts could readily be checked from the bankrupt's books.

13. Within one month from the date of his appointment the trustee should file with the Board of Trade a summary of the statement of affairs and a report, and should send copies to each creditor. He should also be required to send at regular periods, say once or twice a year, not only to the Board of Trade as directed by Section 81 of the Act of 1883, but also to each creditor who has proved his debt, a statement showing the progress of the bankruptcy, the amount realised since the last report, and the assets still outstanding.

14. The accounts of the trustee should be audited by the Board of Trade, and the Board of Trade should be entitled to inspect all books and documents in the trustee's possession, and to have the power to apply to the Court for the removal of any trustee on proper grounds.

15. To provide the necessary expenses of the Board of Trade of public examinations, control and audit, a reasonable percentage on the gross realised assets should in every case be paid.

16. One of the causes of the present large number of undischarged bankrupts is that it is in a very considerable number of cases found impossible to propose any composition or scheme of arrangement with the creditors which, owing to the stringent provisions of Section 3 sub-sections 8 and 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, would obtain the sanction of the Court. The Committee think that a far larger number of compositions and schemes would be carried through to the advantage of creditors if that section were amended in such a way as to provide that the acceptance of a composition or scheme by the requisite majority of the creditors should in all cases be binding unless within a certain time the trustee or official receiver or any creditor for say £50 satisfied the Court on motion that it should be disallowed upon the ground that there was no reasonable security or probability that the scheme would be carried out or the composition paid, or at any time on the ground of fraud or fraudulent concealment or misrepresentation in obtaining the sanction of the creditors to the composition or scheme or in carrying it out.

REPLIES BY THE COUNCIL OF THE INSTITUTE OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS IN ENGLAND AND WALES TO THE QUESTIONS SUBMITTED TO THE BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENT COMMITTEE.

Question 1.

Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the investigation and consideration by the Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction of the conduct of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor and the imposition on him of punishment or disabilities should be amended, or provision be made that the conduct of such a debtor should in every case be brought before the Court for consideration, whether he applies for a discharge in his bankruptcy or not.

Answer 1.

Where a debtor has not kept proper books of account and where his assets do not amount to a given proportion of his liabilities the Court shall have power to administer such punishment as Parliament may prescribe, the present system of withholding the discharge having proved utterly inadequate. The punishment should be administered by the Courts having bankruptcy jurisdiction, with right of appeal to the judge in bankruptcy.

The Court should be at liberty to make an order for the deportation of all aliens whose bankruptcy shows a bad state of affairs.

The punishment at present prescribed for a bankrupt is insufficient. In the majority of cases owing to the debtor failing to keep proper books of account the deficiency account at present required from a bankrupt has proved to be almost entirely useless.

Some such obligation as the compelling of an undischarged debtor to account every year to the trustee, or to the official receiver as the case may be, as to his income and position during that year, should be enforced.

There are no means under the Act at present of ascertaining the acquisition by an undischarged bankrupt of after-acquired property.

Question 2.

Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the discharge of a bankrupt and the conditions on which such a discharge should be granted, refused or suspended, should be made more stringent, so as more effectually to check improper and reckless trading, and the neglect by traders to keep proper books and accounts, or be otherwise altered or modified.

Answer 2.

The present system of discharges being dealt with entirely by the Court should be repealed, as it would appear that the creditors interested have the right to decide this. A meeting of creditors should be called at the conclusion of the winding-up, as in companies, or earlier, at the debtor's request and expense, and a resolution taken thereon. If agreed to by a three-fourths majority in number and value of the creditors present who have proved their debts, the Court, having regard to the terms of the resolution, shall grant, suspend or withhold it as the Court may think fit, but under no circumstances shall a discharge be granted unless such resolution be passed.

It is a well-known fact that unless there are assets in the estate the official receivers will take no action—thus fraudulent debtors with no estate get off scot free, which remark particularly applies to aliens. This Act, from the point of view of general benefit to the commercial morality of the country is an absolute failure, as, without more drastic punishment, any Act will be.

Question 3.

Whether power should be given to the Law Society to refuse to renew the certificates of solicitors who are undischarged bankrupts, subject to appeal to the Master of the Rolls.

Answer 3.

Yes.

Question 4.

Whether the existing provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts relating to the realisation and administration of property should be amended so as to secure a more immediate realisation of the entire property of a bankrupt as soon as possible after a receiving order has been made.

Answer 4.

No.—In no case should any official receiver or trustee sell any assets (unless of a perishable character). Obviously, if a debtor files his petition, and the official receiver immediately proceeds to realise without regard to whether there is a goodwill, or whether a debtor can pay a composition, and without any consultation with the creditors as to how the goods supplied by them can best be dealt with, abuses are apt to occur. No public demand is made for such power, and in the interests of the commercial community it is a very proper thing that the creditors should be consulted before any step towards realising is taken.

Answer 4—continued.

Any person claiming to be a creditor should be compelled to prove his debt within twenty-eight days of receiving notice from the trustee.

The trustee being a trustee for the creditors and not of the debtor should not be responsible for onerous contracts under Section 55 of the Act.

Question 5.

Whether the law so far as it enables a trustee of the property of an undischarged bankrupt to claim for the bankrupt's estate all the bankrupt's after-acquired property, should be modified in any, and what, way so as to protect persons who have honestly become creditors of the bankrupt since his bankruptcy, or have purchased or taken mortgages or securities over such after-acquired property from the bankrupt.

Answer 5.

The law should be modified so that all creditors, both new and old, should be admitted to proof.

Question 6.

Whether the provisions of the law by which a married woman can in certain circumstances be made bankrupt should be extended so as to render all or some and what classes of married women who incur debts on their own account (whether trading separately from their husbands or not) subject to the bankruptcy laws.

Answer 6.

Debtors who are married women should be amenable to be made bankrupt whether they are in trade or not, and a married woman should be jointly and severally liable with her husband for all debts incurred by her in respect of her own apparel. Recent disclosed cases certainly call for alteration to this effect.

Married women trading in partnership with their husbands should be liable to be made bankrupt.

Question 7.

Whether the provisions of the laws relating to the avoidance of marriage and other settlements and covenants and securities made by persons who afterwards become bankrupt should be extended so as to prevent the trustees and persons claimin under such settlements, covenants and securities from afterwards competing unfairly with the persons who have become creditors of the bankrupt for valuable consideration in money or money's worth, and to protect bona fide purchasers and incumbrancers of property under any such disposition as above described.

Answer 7

In our opinion the provisions of the law in this respect should not be extended, except that any settlement which comprises assets included in a business should be registered.

Question 8.

Whether the provisions of the laws relating to voluntary arrangements and compositions by insolvent debtors with their creditors should be amended so as to place the debtor and the trustee under any such arrangement or composition, and the terms and conditions of the arrangement or composition more under control, and provide for official audits of the trustee's accounts, and official control over the assets in his hands.

Answer 8.

We are of opinion that if any control other than that of the creditors themselves were exercised it would of necessity mean delay and expense, and would probably have the effect of stopping all compositions, which would entail serious loss on creditors generally.

Question 9.

Whether the existing laws which prescribe the registration of certain classes of securities given by debtors should be extended so as to include and apply to general assignments of book debts, hiring agreements and other forms of securities which are at present exempt from registration.

Answer 9.

Assignments of book debts and hiring agreements should be registered in the same way as are bills of sale at the present time. No mortgage should cover plant, machinery, and trade fixtures unless such mortgage shall have been registered under the Bills of Sale Act with a schedule attached.

MEMORANDUM AS TO BOOKS PREPARED BY THE BOARD OF TRADE FOR SEARCHES PURSUANT TO SECTION 131 OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1883.

The Board of Trade Search Registers are kept at the Search Office, Bankruptcy Buildings, in charge of two clerks detailed for the purpose.

The searcher obtains a stamped application for search (1s. fee) at the Inland Revenue Office in Bankruptcy Buildings or at a post office.

Three search registers are now provided for each year, one for High Court cases, and two for County Court cases (A—K and L—Z). Until the year 1901 separate registers were not provided for each year, but the books were used until the space was exhausted.

The registers contain a record of the proceedings in every case under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, in which a receiving order has been made. Searches for proceedings prior to receiving order, viz., bankruptcy notices and petitions, are made in the department of the senior bankruptcy registrar.

The entries in the registers are made under the initial letter and the first following vowel of the debtor's surname, certain pages being apportioned to each letter of the alphabet, and the pages under each letter of the alphabet being sub-divided according to the vowels.

These registers are kept up to-date, the entries being made from each issue of the London Gazette as soon as possible after its receipt. Thus from the Gazette published on Tuesday evening the receiving orders would be entered on Wednesday morning, and the remaining notices—adjudication, discharge, dividends, etc.—by the following Friday. Each entry is carefully checked.

Lexicographical indexes are prepared at the end of each period of five years. Four of these indexes, covering the period 1884–1903, inclusive, are now in use. In these indexes the debtors' names are entered in strict alphabetical order, and sufficient particulars of address and description are given to identify the debtor, together with a reference to the volume and folio of the search register in which the particulars of the bankruptcy are to be found. The names of all the partners of a firm, the firm names, and any aliases of debtors, are entered in their proper place in the index.

The preparation of each index occupies a year, so a searcher who, while it was being prepared, wished to ascertain whether a certain person had been adjudged bankrupt under the Act of 1883, might have to search the prior indexes and the twelve registers compiled since the previous index, viz., six High Court and six County Court registers.

MINUTES OF A MEETING OF WHOLESALE DRAPERS AND WAREHOUSEMEN, HELD AT No. 145, CHEAPSIDE, LONDON, ON NOVEMBER 30TH, 1906, FOR THE PURPOSE OF CONSIDERING SOME OF THE QUESTIONS SUBMITTED TO A COMMITTEE APPOINTED BY THE BOARD OF TRADE TO ENQUIRE INTO AND REPORT UPON THE OPERATION OF THE BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Mr. S. HOPE MORLEY in the Chair.

Notices convening the Meeting had been sent to the leading houses in the trade, and the meeting was numerously attended. Amongst those present were representatives of the following houses:—

And others.

It was resolved:—

1. "That in the opinion of this meeting it is desirable that in every bankruptcy the question of the bankrupt's discharge should be considered by the Court and an order made with respect thereto, whether the bankrupt makes application for his discharge or not, and that in considering the question the Court should have regard to the views of the creditors expressed at a general meeting to be called by the trustee, at which the official receiver's report to the Court on the bankrupt's conduct shall be submitted to the creditors.

2. "That in the opinion of this meeting the provisions of the laws relating to the discharge of bankrupts should be made more stringent so as to check and punish any improper and reckless trading and neglect by debtors with fraudulent intent to keep proper books and accounts. In the opinion of this meeting the suspension of a bankrupt's discharge is in many cases an inadequate punishment for the offences above mentioned. This meeting is of opinion that it should be in the discretion of the Court to inflict a penalty of a character likely to act as a deterrent to traders and that this has not been the effect of existing penalties.

3. "That in the opinion of this meeting no realisation of the property of a bankrupt should be made prior to the appointment of a trustee except with the approval of a majority in value and number of the creditors.

4. "This meeting is of opinion that married women carrying on trade, whether trading separately from their husbands or not, should be subject to the bankruptcy laws.

5. "This meeting is of opinion that the existing right of creditors to make voluntary arrangements and compositions with insolvent debtors under the provisions of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, is convenient and valuable to the trading community and does not require amendment nor official control.

"That voluntary arrangements offer greater inducements to debtors to come before their creditors with a larger amount of assets in proportion to their liabilities than is the case in bankruptcy, and the immediate control obtained under such arrangements avoids the loss which frequently arises during the currency of bankruptcy proceedings prior to a receiving order.

"That voluntary arrangements under the provisions of the existing Statute have worked satisfactorily and economically and to the advantage of the trading community and that this trade would deprecate any alteration in the Law which would put the terms and conditions of arrangements or compositions or the assets of debtors' estates under official control.

"That the foregoing resolutions be printed and copies forwarded to the Board of Trade, to each member of the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Committee and the London Chamber of Commerce."

MEMORANDUM BY THE COMMITTEE OF THE STOCK EXCHANGE TO BE SUBMITTED TO THE BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENT COMMITTEE ON JULY 3RD, 1907.

1. We, the Committee of the Stock Exchange, wish to draw the attention of the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Committee to the effect of recent decisions under Section 43 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, particularly as affecting the creditors of members of the Stock Exchange who have been declared defaulters, and also as affecting the whole business community of the country.

2. It appears to us that Section 43 was drawn with the object of protecting the creditors of a bankrupt: and we are therefore desirous of calling the Committee's attention to some recent decisions, the result of certain of which is that the creditors of a person who has committed "an Act of Bankruptcy" but is not made a bankrupt within three months, are damnified and not benefited.

3. We ask the Committee specially to consider the case of Ponsford Baker & Richardson v. the Union of London and Smith's Bank (1906, 2 Ch., p. 444).

4. The facts in that case were that Ponsford Baker & Co. were members of the Stock Exchange. They had a loan on securities with the Union of London and Smith's Bank with an ample margin. They were declared defaulters. The defaulters and the official assignee of the Stock Exchange attended at the Union of London and Smith's Bank and tendered the amount of the loan and interest, and requested the bank to hand over the securities lodged against the loan. The bank refused to part with any securities in their hands, alleging that declaration on the Stock Exchange was an Act of Bankruptcy, and that, therefore under Section 43 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 they were not able to deliver any of these securities to the defaulters or the official assignee until the expiration of three months from the date of the Act of Bankruptcy, of which they had had notice. Ponsford Baker & Co. and the official assignee thereupon moved before Buckley J. for an order, that the securities in the hands of the bank should be handed over on payment of the loan and interest. Buckley J. ordered the bank to deliver the securities on payment of the loan and interest.

5. The Union of London and Smith's Bank thereupon asked Buckley J. for a stay of execution. This he refused. The bank immediately applied to the Court of Appeal and were also there refused a stay. The bank then delivered the securities to the official assignee and they were immediately sold by him.

6. The Union of London and Smith's Bank appealed sucessfully. The Committee will note that the appeal case was not heard until after three months from this "Act of Bankruptcy."

7. If these securities had been retained until the trial of the appeal, they would have been worth some £2,000 less than they realised when sold. Thus the creditors of the person, who had committed an Act of Bankruptcy, would have received considerably less than they did.

8. The decision of the Court of Appeal, that declaration on the Stock Exchange is an Act of Bankruptcy within the meaning of Section 43, presses very hardly on the creditors of a defaulter on the Stock Exchange. All transactions entered into on the Stock Exchange are for a cash settlement on a definite date. Hitherto when a member has been declared a defaulter, the official assignee has immediately collected all the available assets and distributed them as soon as possible, usually paying a dividend within a few days. Now the banks refuse to release any of the defaulter's monies or securities for three months from the date of declaration. The defaulter may be, and generally is, perfectly solvent apart from his Stock Exchange engagements, and his creditors in the Stock Exchange may have no desire to make him a bankrupt, but they are debarred from receiving monies due to them for three months.

In times of commercial panic it is easily conceivable that this delay might cause the default of many members of the Stock Exchange and of the outside community.

As a fact, in cases which have arisen since this decision in August last a sum of £35,000, which otherwise would have been distributed within a few days, has had to be retained.

9. In another recent case, a firm of brokers had received some £6,500 from clients with which to pay for securities purchased by these brokers for these clients. This £6,500 the defaulters paid into their bank in the ordinary course of their business. A large amount of the stocks and shares which these brokers had purchased for their clients had been delivered to them, and the brokers, believing themselves solvent, had given their cheques for the amounts due as against delivery of the stocks or shares, but later on the same day, finding that certain other clients could not meet their engagements to the extent of some £8,600, the brokers had to "declare" themselves defaulters. As a result of their being "declared" their bankers refused to honour the cheques which they had drawn and handed away for these stocks and shares. The result of this is that, although the bank was otherwise fully secured, the clients' money must remain in the brokers' bank for three months. The client is thereby precluded from receiving the stocks or shares bought (unless he pays a second time), or from having his money returned, for three months. This might place him in a very difficult position and even result in his bankruptcy.

10. This position is particularly hard upon the "cestui que trust," whose trustees have invested money through a broker who is declared a defaulter. the investments or monies with which to pay for the investments being locked up for three months.

11. The practical result of the decision of the Court of Appeal would seem to be that no one having committed an "Act of Bankruptcy," of which a debtor to him has had notice or anyone claiming through him, e.g., a trustee under a deed of assignment, can collect any assets for three months; for neither the person who has committed the Act of Bankruptcy nor anyone claiming through him can give a valid receipt—See Davies v. Petrie (1906, 2 K. B. 786) where a debtor having paid the trustee under a deed of assignment subsequently had to pay a second time to the trustee in bankruptcy.

12. A similar difficulty might arise in cases altogether outside the Stock Exchange: for example, if a wholesale fruit dealer had purchased fresh fruit from abroad, and while the fruit was "in transitu" had committed an Act of Bankruptcy of which the carriers had notice. It is submitted that under these circumstances the carriers would not be in a position to deliver to anyone, and the fruit would rot and become valueless, thus working great hardship on the consignee if bankruptcy did not ensue, and on the creditors if it did, and further the consignee's estate might become liable for considerable damages in bankruptcy.

Again, by the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, Section 1, seizure and sale by the sheriff or seizure by the sheriff and holding goods for twenty-one days constitutes an Act of Bankruptcy. On the debtor's bankers becoming aware of such seizure and sale or seizure and holding for twenty-one days, as the case may be, the debtor would not be able to draw a cheque to pay out the execution or in any way to raise funds for that purpose.

13. We would specially mention the hardship in some cases arising to the members of the Stock Exchange and the mercantile world at large by the fact that any Act of Bankruptcy, as the law at present stands, relates back to the Act of Bankruptcy, so as to invalidate intermediate dealings with any persons having notice of Act of Bankruptcy, although done in the ordinary course of business.

14. The remedy we submit is that all transactions of a bona fide nature and carried out in the ordinary course of business should be protected, even although the parties have notice of an Act of Bankruptcy.

Chairman.

MEMORANDUM AS TO IRISH BANKRUPTCY LAW AND PRACTICE, BY Mr. W. H. MONCK, CHIEF REGISTRAR IN BANKRUPTCY IN IRELAND.

As to the prevention of commercial misconduct by debtors who become insolvent :—

1. The Irish Debtors' Act, 1872, contains almost exactly the same exceptions to the abolition of imprisonment for debt as the English Debtors' Act of 1869. Imprisonment for debt under these exceptions is, however, rarely resorted to in Ireland, the total number of committals in the year never amounting to 100. Apart from these exceptions, the Courts which possess jurisdiction over insolvent debtors are the King's Bench Division in Bankruptcy and the two local Bankruptcy Courts at Belfast and Cork respectively. The following remarks chiefly apply to the King's Bench Division in Bankruptcy, of which the writer is Chief Registrar. There is a power of transmitting bankruptcies to the County Courts to be conducted there, but it is rarely, if ever, acted on.

2. There are two distinct proceedings in Ireland which it is necessary to distinguish ; first, bankruptcy which may follow on a petition filed either by a creditor or by the debtor himself, and, secondly, arrangement on a petition filed by the debtor. Certain peculiarities in the Irish Law sometimes make it more advantageous for a debtor who means to offer a composition to have himself adjudicated bankrupt than to file an arrangement petition. An adjudication in bankruptcy can only be obtained by a debtor on evidence that he has £50 assets. There is no such restriction on granting protection to an arranging debtor, but protection may be refused if from the affidavit of assets the Court is of opinion that the creditors would derive no benefit from the proceedings. The adjudication in bankruptcy on a creditor's petition (his debt must amount to £40) is made ex parte, but the alleged bankrupt has three days (which may be increased to seven) to show cause against the adjudication from the time that notice of it is served on him. On the adjudication being made, the messenger (or assistant messenger) of the Court is sent with a seizure warrant to seize all the moveable chattels, of which he is to take a complete inventory and place them in safe keeping before he leaves. The case is at once assigned to one of the two official assignees, to whom the messenger hands his inventory together with any books, etc., which he has taken possession of, and the official assignee thus nominated then becomes responsible for the safe keeping and realisation of the goods and of the estate generally. Though legally vested in the two official assignees and the creditors' assignee (when appointed) jointly, the official assignee nominated in the matter realises the estate and receives the proceeds. Should cause be shown against the adjudication and allowed by the Court, the bankruptcy is annulled, and it is not gazetted or published until the time for showing cause has expired. When annulled the official assignee withdraws from possession. The bankrupt, however, often applies for liberty to carry on his trading pending an offer of composition. In this case realisation is stayed pending the offer of composition, the bankrupt procuring security that the property will be forthcoming or paid for ; and the official assignee not giving up possession until the security is perfected. In arrangements no similar steps are taken for seizing and securing the debtor's goods, but he is forbidden to part with them otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade or business, and is bound to furnish to the official assignee every week an account of his receipts and disbursements with the vouchers for the latter ; and the Court may at any time make an order that the estate be possessed and received by the official assignee. If the arranging debtor fails to carry his offer of composition by the requisite majority of votes, he is adjudicated bankrupt and the messenger goes down and seizes his goods in the usual way ; and for certain other defaults his petition can be dismissed, which is an act of bankruptcy on which any creditor to the requisite amount can adjudicate him. It is to be observed, however, that there are fewer acts of bankruptcy recognised by the Irish Statutes than by the English, and the process by debtor's summons is still in use instead of the bankruptcy notice. The act of bankruptcy created by non-compliance with a debtor's summons can be made use of by the summoning creditor only, and he cannot obtain an adjudication on it unless he can prove a debt of £40. It is submitted that in this respect the Irish Law should be assimilated to the English.

As to inquiring with regard to the commercial misconduct or otherwise of the insolvent debtor, on the expiration of the time for showing cause against adjudication, two public sittings are appointed for the examination of the bankrupt before the Court, and a summons is served on him requiring his attendance at these sittings, and he is also required to file a statement of affairs before the first of these sittings. These rules are not strictly enforced, but the bankrupt and any persons who had dealings with him or are supposed to be able to give information on the subject, can be summoned at any time before the Court to give evidence. Charges of commercial misconduct are usually investigated at examinations of this kind, and where no suggestion of the kind is made, the bankrupt, although residing in Ireland, sometimes files no statement of affairs and passes no examination. If, however, a bankrupt seeks to obtain his certificate (the equivalent of an English discharge) the question of commercial misconduct or otherwise is gone into, as will be noticed under another head. In arrangements two private sittings are fixed before the Court, which the debtor is bound to attend and present himself for examination, and this requirement is usually insisted on. The sittings are meetings of creditors to consider his offer of composition, and his examination is usually left to the creditors, the official assignee not taking any part therein and not being required to make any report as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the offer of composition. The resolution of the creditors at these meetings, though carried by the requisite majority of the creditors, requires the approval of the Court to become binding, and in case of grave commercial misconduct appearing on the evidence given, the Court would, as a rule, refuse to confirm the resolution, with the result that the debtor would be adjudicated bankrupt. In like manner in a composition after bankruptcy the resolution of the creditors accepting it requires confirmation by the Court, and in cases where grave commercial misconduct was proved, the Court would probably refuse to confirm the resolution and direct the bankruptcy to proceed in the ordinary course.

When the messenger goes down to execute the seizure warrant, he obtains as much information as he can with relation to the assets, liabilities and dealings of the bankrupt with his estate and reports the information thus obtained to the official assignee.

(3.) Such acts of commercial misconduct are not punishable by imprisonment in Ireland. The only punishments inflicted are the refusal to grant a bankrupt his certificate (which certificate is equivalent to the English discharge), the refusal to sanction a composition which the creditors were willing to accept, and the shortening of the bankrupt's allowance out of the estate—all which punishments are discretionary with the Court.

(4.) The Bankruptcy Courts have power to imprison any person for offences of the nature of contempt of Court. When the bankrupt or debtor has committed a criminal offence he is tried for it in a criminal Court. Evidence with relation to the offence may be given before the Bankruptcy Judge of the King's Bench Division, who may direct further proceedings to be taken.

With regard to inquiries into the commercial conduct of bankrupts or arranging debtors it may be pointed out that they cost money, which usually comes directly or indirectly out of the pockets of his creditors, and that the prosecution of commercial misconduct being a matter of public interest, from which the creditors on the estate derive no special benefit, it is suggested that the public should bear the expense of all inquiries on the subject which appear to the Court to have been necessary and proper.

Coming to the second head the practice in Ireland as regards the granting of a certificate to a bankrupt (equivalent to a discharge) is, I think, somewhat more stringent than in England unless a dividend of 10s. in the £ or upwards has been paid. The bankrupt must file his statement of affairs and pass his final examination, and then in addition to obtaining a report from the official assignee he has to serve notice of his application for certificate on all his creditors. These proceedings being troublesome and involving some expense, a large number of bankrupts never apply for their certificates; and the condition of the uncertificated bankrupt in Ireland is not so bad as that of the undischarged bankrupt in England, not merely in practice, but to a certain extent in law, for it is not a crime for an uncertificated bankrupt to obtain goods on credit without revealing the fact. It thus happens that in many small cases there is never any inquiry as to whether there has or has not been commercial misconduct, the bankrupt never obtaining his certificate and merely running the risk of having his after-acquired property captured, which sometimes occurs. Sometimes if he gets into better circumstances he offers a small composition to his creditors in addition to what they have received out of his estate, in which case, if the composition is accepted, his bankruptcy will be annulled on proving payment of the composition (together with preferential debts), and his after-acquired property is safe. With regard to an arranging debtor the Court will (in all ordinary cases) restrain a creditor from suing him while under protection, and he is entitled to a certificate which frees him from his debts, on a report from the Chief Registrar that the resolution of the creditors has been fully carried out by him. His application for certificate can be made ex parte while the certificate of a bankrupt is only granted on a motion of which all the creditors receive notice as already stated. No report from the official assignee or other person as to the debtor's commercial conduct is necessary for a certificate in an arrangement matter. If a bankrupt carries a composition and pays it he does not apply for a certificate but for an annulment of the bankruptcy which is done ex parte on a report by the Chief Registrar that the composition has been fully carried out. The Chief Registrar, however, sometimes directs that the application for the arranging debtor's certificate or for the annulment of a bankruptcy shall be made on notice to certain persons mentioned in his report, or he may report that the creditors have been satisfied, with certain exceptions, in which case the Court usually requires composition for the excepted creditors to be lodged with the official assignee. The Chief Registrar, however, does not enter into questions of commercial misconduct, and his report is in a printed form. A bankruptcy is in like manner often annulled on the consent of all the creditors, or on proof that all the creditors have been paid in full, which is usually done on a report to that effect by the Chief Registrar, before whom questions of commercial morality are not entered into. But on the application of a bankrupt for his certificate, it is with such matters that the official assignee's report usually deals.

It is suggested that it should be made easier for a man who has been guilty of no misconduct to obtain his certificate (or discharge) and that this being done more stringent rules might be adopted in the case of uncertificated bankrupts after the lapse of some time to enable them to apply for their certificates.

As to the third head, the realising of the estate is mainly left in the hands of the acting official assignee, but he has many inducements to realise it as expeditiously and advantageously as possible. He has no salary and is not permitted to pursue any other occupation, so that his income is entirely derived from fees on the various estates under his charge. On receiving any money he is bound to lodge it forthwith to the credit of the proper estate in the Bank of Ireland, and the Chief Registrar is required to check his lodgments periodically by comparing his ledger with his bank pass-book. Once lodged in bank the money can only be drawn out by a cheque countersigned by the Chief Registrar or other authorised officer of the Court. The official assignee can therefore derive no profit from the money in his hands. His fees which form his income are only paid when his account is audited before the Court, when the Court at the same time disposes of the balance. In addition to this he is required to bring his accounts periodically before the Chief Registrar as long as the matter is pending, and it is the duty of the Chief Registrar to report unnecessary delay to the judge who may reduce his fees in consequence. The public sittings before the Court are sittings for proof of debts as well as for the examination of the bankrupt, but as soon as there is a prospect of a dividend a sitting for proof of debts is fixed before the Chief Registrar which is advertised, and notice given by the official assignee to all creditors whose names and addresses are known. Second notices are usually sent to those who do not reply to the first notice. An account with detailed particulars of the creditor's claim is usually accepted without any affidavit. The official assignee brings the claims sent to him before the Chief Registrar at a sitting for proof of debts, who will also hear any other claims made at the sitting. The Chief Registrar examines the claims, admits them or rejects them in whole or in part, or else reserves them for further particulars, evidence or inquiries. Even after the sitting before the Chief Registrar (which is often adjourned more than once) has closed, a creditor can enter a sitting for proof of debts on notice to the solicitor to the assignees and bring forward his claim at it. Every facility is given to genuine creditors for proving their debts, and the Chief Registrar (which title at present includes the chief clerk and the Court Registrar) is usually a person well acquainted with bankruptcy law, and it is submitted much more competent to deal with the admission of debts than a trustee usually is. It should be added, however, that under the Irish Act of 1872 the creditors may decide on having the estate wound up by a trustee, instead of by the assignees, but there have been only about ten trustee cases out of 7,000 subsequent bankruptcies in the Dublin Court.

The Statute imposes what seems to be an unnecessary delay in disposing of the estate by deferring the realisation (save in special cases) until after the appointment of the creditors' assignee. As regards moveable chattels this delay always involves expense which is often increased by adjourning the sitting to appoint a creditors' assignee. But probably the main difficulty in speedily winding up estates is the deficient powers of the Court as regards mortgaged property, the mortgagee not being in any instance compellable to come into Court and being at liberty in cases where there is no power of sale in the mortgage deed to proceed for a receiver or a sale in some other division of the High Court instead of in the King's Bench Division in Bankruptcy. Where there is a power of sale in the mortgage deed the mortgagee can sell out of Court without giving any notice to the assignees in bankruptcy and without even giving them any information after the sale is over. Unless the mortgagee agrees to have a sale in Court, the Court has no power of realising mortgaged property, and the question whether it will produce a surplus or not may still remain in doubt several years after the bankruptcy. The ordinary creditors would be much benefited by giving the Court larger powers of dealing with mortgagees and mortgaged property. The collection of debts due to a bankrupt is likewise often slow. The official assignee (unless realisation is stayed pending an offer of composition) usually applies to the debtors as soon as he has a list of them. After a second application he consults the creditors' assignee and brings the list of outstanding debts before the Chief Registrar for his directions. The Chief Registrar may direct proceedings in the county courts or summoning the debtors for examination before the Court (which can order them to pay if the debt is admitted) or place the debts in the hands of a collector (usually a solicitor) to collect at a percentage—which last course is most frequently adopted. For proceedings against debtors in the superior Courts the sanction of the Court must be obtained. But the collection of debts often takes a considerable time and it is usual to have an audit and dividend before it is completed, and a second dividend when it is believed that nothing more can be got. There are cases which cannot be wound up speedily, e.g., when the bankrupt pays an allocation out of his salary or has a life-estate or a reversionary interest not easily saleable

One part of our system, however, sometimes works badly. Much is done at all stages of our proceedings by the solicitor having carriage of the proceedings who in ordinary bankruptcies is appointed by the creditors' assignee. He is sometimes wanting in knowledge of bankruptcy law and practice, and as costs are to be paid in priority to dividends there is often considerable delay in consequence of his costs not being drawn or taxed. It is suggested that a creditors' assignee is only necessary when there is a fairly large estate (or proceedings contemplated that may result in the recovery of a considerable sum) and that the votes in favour of his appointment should be required to represent a certain proportion in number and value of the known creditors. A creditors' assignee who has a considerable stake in the matter will probably appoint a competent and attentive solicitor.

As to the next two heads :—

1. A bankrupt's after-acquired property is his own, provided that he obtains his certificate before it is acquired. Otherwise it vests in his assignees in bankruptcy provided that they claim it before he has disposed of it or charged it, the law being the same as in England. English cases are cited here and some of the Irish cases have been cited with approval in England. An individual creditor cannot sue an uncertificated bankrupt or issue execution against him (whether as regards after-acquired property or otherwise) without leave of the Court, and such proceedings are usually left to the assignees. The rights of subsequent creditors as regards after-acquired property are also the same as in England. As regards the vesting of property, whether after-acquired or not, however, there is in general a difference between English and Irish law. In Ireland the assignees may elect not to take the property without executing any written disclaimer (which disclaimer, however, they can also adopt) and, if they are not required to elect whether they will take or not, they may leave the question in abeyance as long as it suits their convenience to do so, having still the choice of electing to take or not to take. If they decide not to take, the property remains vested in the bankrupt, but if this property is a leasehold or other tenancy the Court has power on notice to the bankrupt to put the landlord in possession on an application made for such purpose. Without such order the bankrupt has the right to remain in possession until evicted in the usual way in case his rent remains unpaid.

2. The law as regards the bankruptcy of a married woman is also the same in Ireland as in England and in one case it was decided that a married woman was not entitled to proceed with an arrangement petition unless she was trading separately from her husband.

As to the last head. Trust deeds executed out of Court are not unusual in Ireland. They are acts of bankruptcy as in England and may lead to an adjudication until six months after execution instead of three months as in England ; but no assenting creditor can rely on this act of bankruptcy. The trusts of the deed could no doubt be enforced through the Chancery Division though this is seldom if ever done. The Irish Bankruptcy Courts have no jurisdiction as regards them unless the grantor is adjudicated bankrupt within six months after the execution of the deed.

The trustee in these deeds is almost always an accountant to whom the debtor has recourse when he first finds it necessary to make some proposal to his creditors, and the Irish trustee clauses being practically unworkable the accountant often urges the debtor to have the estate wound up by a trust deed instead of by the assignees in bankruptcy. The results of this class of realisations never being published I cannot state how they compare with realisations under the assignees, but the assignees suffer somewhat in reputation from the accountants leaving the worst class of cases to them, usually with a very exaggerated estimate of the assets. But in these arrangements inquiries as to commercial misconduct have no place, and for this reason among others I think it undesirable that such inquiries should be made at the cost of the bankrupt's estate, thus leaving a smaller sum for distribution among the creditors than if a trust deed had been assented to.

With regard to commercial misconduct, I may note that as regards voluntary preferences the Irish bankruptcy law renders it much more difficult to set them aside than the English, though I would suggest that neither go far enough. The English law invalidates the transaction if a preference is intended by the debtor, whereas in Ireland there must be a wrongful intent on the part of both debtor and creditor in order to invalidate it. But it is suggested that the motive or intention of the parties ought not to be the test—that if the debtor does an act, the natural consequence of which is to give a preference to a creditor who would not be entitled to any such preference in the event of bankruptcy, the debtor being at the time insolvent and becoming bankrupt within three months afterwards—the creditor in question must surrender the preferential payment unless there are some special grounds on which the Court may in its discretion permit him to retain it or some portion of it. Pressure should, I apprehend, be only recognised when it is effective pressure, not mere importunity. "Pay me or I will seize your goods or distrain them," is effective pressure when the creditor is in a position to seize or distrain. But what pressure can a creditor exercise if he is not even in a position to sue, the debt being due in respect of a bill that is still current ? Where an insolvent debtor can benefit his friends without any further injury to himself than withholding a certificate which he would probably not have applied for (or obtained) in any event, he has strong reasons for benefiting them, and his motives are often matter of inference, especially if he has absconded. Moreover, his motive may not be to benefit the preferred creditor but to benefit someone else—preferring a bank for instance, in order to benefit another person who is liable to the bank for the same debt. The natural consequences of the debtor's act and not his motive (which will almost always be open to some doubt) are what, it is apprehended, ought to be considered. Every man must be supposed to intend the natural consequences of his acts, and if the natural consequences of his act is to give one creditor an undue preference over the others, his motive should not (it is apprehended) be considered at all, save on his application for his discharge or certificate.

A few suggestions are here added :—

Should not a bankrupt's goods, as soon as possession has been taken, be considered as in custodia legis and all persons prohibited from seizing or distraining on them, leaving it to the Court to order payments in full (under certain circumstances and within certain limits) to persons who would otherwise be entitled to seize or distrain, on proof that they could not obtain payment otherwise ?

Should not the Court have power to compel all persons having mortgages, charges or liens of any kind on the bankrupt's estate (or claiming to have such) to supply all particulars reasonably required, receiving such allowance for trouble and expense (if any) as the Court shall think fit ?

Should not all mortgagees, etc., selling out of Court be bound to give the assignees or trustee notice of the proposed sale and to furnish a full account within a month after the conclusion of the sale ?

Should not bills given to the bankrupt for debts due to him and discounted by him at a bank, etc., be treated as securities on the bankrupt's estate and valued accordingly, the Court to decide in case of dispute whether any particular bill should be thus valued or not ?

(In Ireland all bills held when the proof is made must be produced at the time of paying the dividend so that if any have been taken up by other parties during the interval the debt must be reduced before the dividend is paid. If there is a second or third dividend, production is again necessary and the debt must be further reduced if the bills are not forthcoming unless it is shown that they have been lost).

It is suggested that in cases where the assets and liabilities are small and no accusations are made as to the debtor's conduct, a simpler mode of procedure might be adopted involving less costs and rendering it more easy for the bankrupt to obtain his discharge or certificate. The intervention of a solicitor might in such cases to a large extent be dispensed with, and except in special cases no trustee or creditors' assignee would be required.

It is also suggested that there should be a single Court for the realisation and distribution of insolvent estates whether belonging to living persons, dead persons or limited companies, and that in Ireland the King's Bench Division in Bankruptcy is the tribunal best suited for the purpose of realisation and distribution.

Report of the Departmental Committee on the Checking of Piece-Work Wages in Dock Labour.

To the Right Honourable Herbert J. Gladstone, M.P., Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Sir,

The Committee appointed by you to consider the best method of securing to persons employed in dock labour, who are paid by weight or measurement, means of checking the correctness of the wages they receive, have completed their enquiry and beg to present the following report.

Number of meetings held and witnesses examined.

The Committee have held 8 meetings and examined 23 witnesses, of whom 19 were called on behalf of the workmen.

In order to ascertain the views of the employers of dock labour, the Committee caused a circular to be sent to all owners of docks, wharves and quays—so far as they were known—in all about 1,000, and to some 200 stevedores, to the following effect:—

"Claims have been put before the Committee on behalf of the "workmen—

"1. That in the cases where the employer of the dock labourers "weighs the materials in or near the dock or wharf, the workmen "should have the right to appoint a checkweighman to check "that weighing; and

"2. That in all other cases the employer should be required to show "to the men or a representative of the men some certificate "which will prove to them that they are being paid on the "weights or measurements on which freight or dock dues are "paid.

"The Committee would be glad to know whether you have any objection to these claims or wish to make any representations on the subject."

Answers were received from 156 employers of dock labour at piece-work rates, and of these only 10 raised definite objections to these claims. Each of these 10 was invited to give evidence before the Committee, but only one accepted the invitation.

Employers of labour at piece-work rates.

The work of loading and unloading ships is undertaken by four classes of employers, viz.:—

(a) Shipowners or their agents.
(b) Dock companies, harbour boards and wharfingers.
(c) Stevedores, i.e., middlemen who contract to do the work for shipowners or other persons.
(d) Merchants who despatch or receive goods.

Various methods of obtaining the weights and measurements.

A large proportion of this work is done by men whose wages depend on weights or measurements; sometimes their whole wages are based on the quantities handled; sometimes a fixed daily or hourly wage is paid, and on the completion of each job a balance calculated on the quantity of work done. The weights or measurements on which piece-work wages are based are obtained in various ways. Some cargoes are weighed or measured at the point of loading or unloading; coal, for example, is usually weighed immediately before it is tipped into the vessel; iron ore usually as it passes into the adjoining works from the wharf on to which it is unloaded; and grain often either on the deck of the vessel or at the docks. But the larger proportion of cargoes are not weighed or measured at the point of loading or unloading; for the purpose, however, of making out the accounts of the merchants who are buying or selling or of settling the charges for transport, whether by ship or rail, the weights or measurements in question must be ascertained somewhere, and on these piece-work wages are, as a rule, based. If, as sometimes happens, the figures are not available at the time of the loading or unloading, piece-work wages are calculated on mere estimates.

Absence of any means of checking accuracy of piece-work wages.

The evidence given by the workmen shows that in many cases, and especially in regard to cargoes not weighed at the ship's side, they have no means of checking the accuracy of the piece-work wages paid them. On the completion of a job the weight of goods handled is only told them by the employer, and frequently they have occasion to doubt the figures given them. If they protest, some employers show them the books, invoices, returns or memoranda on which the figures are based, but others refuse, and they have no means of compelling them to do so. Under these circumstances the only course open to the workmen is to obtain independent evidence by indirect methods, and much time and trouble is spent in the endeavour. At times they have bought copies of the Custom House entries; at others they have obtained the figures from some employee of the shipper, consignee, or railway company. In such ways they have occasionally been able to prove their case, and the employer has then admitted their claim and paid them further sums, but they assert that such adjustments have only been made on the threat of legal proceedings, and that more than once legal proceedings have actually had to be taken. In the majority of instances, on the other hand, they have failed to get any evidence in support of their contention and have been forced to accept what they considered to be short payments.

Frequency of disputes as to amount of piece-work wages paid.

Trade Union officials have informed us that they receive complaints on this subject every week, and that with certain firms disputes as to weights or measurements occur almost every time a job is completed. Strikes have often in consequence been threatened and have sometimes taken place. It was stated by Mr. Sexton that a dispute over tonnage with a particular firm in Belfast was the immediate occasion of the great dock strike last year.

Complaints are directed chiefly against stevedores in a small way of business. Some of these, it is said, are men of little substance; they compete with each other for contracts and sometimes cut prices so low that it would be impossible, so the workmen allege, for them to make a profit, if they were to pay the full amount of wages due.

"Victimization."

The Committee have also been told that workmen who have questioned their employers' figures have, in consequence, lost their work and that such "victimization" of dock labourers is very easy to carry into effect. These labourers are only engaged from day to day for a particular job, and if an employer or his foreman has any objection to a particular man, it is not a question of dismissal but merely one of ceasing to "call him on" when the workmen are being engaged.

Possibility of fraud on the part of employer.

Specific charges were also made against employers of intentionally defrauding their workmen, and often of considerable sums. Some of these may be due to misapprehension, and some were found to be without foundation, but the Committee have not thought it necessary to undertake the lengthy enquiry requisite to test their accuracy in all cases; they are satisfied that whether frauds have actually taken place or not, an unscrupulous employer could always find an opportunity of perpetrating one, and, apart from any question of fraud, any system under which the workmen have no means of checking the weights and measurements on which their wages depend is, in the opinion of the Committee, unsatisfactory.

In view of the general agreement of the Committee on this point, the representatives of the workmen stated that though able to call a larger number of witnesses and give fuller and more direct evidence as to workmen not receiving the wages due to them, they considered it unnecessary to prolong the enquiry by so doing.

The recommendations of the Committee fall under two heads: I. Cases where goods are weighed, and II. Cases where they are not weighed.

I.—Cases where Goods are weighed.

Where goods are weighed at the ship-side, complaints are not so serious, as the weighman is often one of the workmen themselves and usually informs them of the figures. But this information could at any time be refused; it is not a matter of right, but one merely of custom or favour. Cases have also been mentioned in which there has been reason to doubt the weighman's figures. Further, in certain kinds of work it is to the interest of the workmen to know more than the mere total quantities of the goods. We are told, for example, that for the unloading of iron ore there are often two rates of wages, one when the cargo can be worked from the bottom of the ship and another when it is necessary to "break" or dig down to the centre of the cargo. The trucks containing ore which it is necessary to "break down" are specially marked and the weighman is supposed to keep an account of them, in order that the workmen may receive a higher rate of wages for working them. The workmen complain that the weighman often neglects to note these specially marked trucks and that consequently they are only paid for them at the lower rate.

The workmen ask in these cases to be allowed, if they so wish, to appoint a checkweighman at their own expense. A few objections to this claim have been raised on the grounds (1) that a checkweighman is unnecessary, and (2) that he would impede the work.

The Committee, however, feel, as regards (1), that, as they have to pay for him, the workmen are not likely to demand a checkweighman when he is not required, and as regards (2), that the employer can be protected by provisions similar to those in the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887.

Recommendations of Committee.

They accordingly recommend that where dock labourers are paid at piece-work rates and the goods they handle are weighed or measured by their employer at or near the place where the work is done, they should have the right to appoint a checkweighman at their own expense. This checkweighman should have similar rights and be under similar restrictions to those prescribed by the Coal Mines Regulation Acts for checkweighmen at mines.

As there are cases where goods are weighed, but there are not sufficient workmen to employ a checkweighman, the Committee consider that the workmen should have the option either of appointing a checkweighman or of adopting the system which we now proceed to recommend for cases where goods are not weighed.

II.—Cases where Goods are not weighed.

No weights or measurements to be required which are not made out to-day.

Where the goods are not weighed by the employer of the workmen at or near the place where they are handled, the question how to give the workmen a check on the accuracy of their wages is somewhat complicated. It has throughout the enquiry been accepted as a principle, both by employers and workmen, that there is no necessity to insist on any goods which are neither weighed nor measured to-day being in the future either weighed or measured for the sole purpose of calculating wages. The representatives of the employers have pointed out that the institution of such weighings could not fail to disorganise trade both by the expense and the delay involved, and have urged that it would be unreasonable to ask them to weigh goods with a view to the payment of wages which they do not weigh for the purpose of making up their own accounts. The representatives of the men have accepted this argument; they admit that no weights or measurements are essential to them on which the employers do not equally depend,—the shipowners and their agents in order to adjust charges for freight, the dock companies to calculate their dues, the stevedores to arrange their contracts, and the merchants to make out their invoices. The workmen therefore say that the evidence of weights or measurements which is sufficient for their employers is sufficient for them, and that they will be satisfied with proof that they are paid on this basis.

Proposal of shipowners that merchants should be required to give proof of the accuracy of the weights or measurements declared by them.

It has, however, been pointed out by Mr. Gordon, Mr. Mead, and Mr. Scrutton that the shipowners have to rely on the merchants' statements of weights and measurements, and that frequently these are not accurate. They therefore suggested that for the purpose of enabling the workmen to obtain correct information as to the amount of goods handled, the employers should be empowered to obtain from the merchant proof of the accuracy of the figures which he supplies to them for the purpose of adjusting charges for freight.

The argument which they put forward was to the following effect: The workmen, stevedores, and shipowners are, so to speak, all parties to the joint venture of carrying goods from the shipper to the consignee, but, inasmuch as it is not the custom either to weigh or measure such goods for the purpose of shipping, they have no independent means of obtaining the true weights. The merchants, on the other hand, who buy or sell, are obliged to weigh or measure the goods in which they deal in order to make up their accounts, and at the present time the shipowners accept their figures. Since, however, there is a strong presumption that such figures are often unreliable, the only method of obtaining true weights would be to lay the merchants under an obligation to furnish reasonable proof of their accuracy. If the consignee, for example, is responsible for freight, he should be compelled, on request, to produce to the shipowner the invoice or a certified copy of the invoice on which he is paying for the goods. The shipowner will then know exactly what has been carried in the ship and can give a certificate of the quantity to the stevedore and the stevedore can show it to the workmen.

It was pointed out that this information ought to be acquired in the ordinary way of business, but to this objection the shipowners reply that they cannot independently break through the custom of the trade. Unless, therefore, they maintain, their suggestion is adopted, there is no means of enabling workmen to obtain an accurate account of the goods they handle. Without it legislation would, they say, only make the labourers' position worse than it is at present by giving legal sanction to a bad system. It would be possible, they admit, by granting a check only against the immediate employer of the labourers to prevent fraud on his part, but such a check would not ensure wages being paid for full weight. If therefore there is to be no check on the merchant's figures, they consider that legislation can be of very little use.

Opinion of the Committee on the shipowners' proposal.

The Committee have been considerably impressed by these arguments, and recognise that the shipowners' proposal, if carried into effect, would prove to be an ideal solution of the problem. It is possible, moreover, that any legislation which does not go so far as this, will fail to solve all the difficulties, but the majority of the Committee have come to the conclusion, that the proposal is outside the limits of their reference. The Committee has been constituted to deal with the relations between employers and their workmen, but the proposal of the shipowners goes beyond this and affects the ordinary business relations between two classes of traders.

Further, it is open to the following objections:—

(a) It involves imposing an obligation on a merchant to provide proof of weight for the sake of workmen whom he does not directly employ.

(b) The merchant might very reasonably contend that any shipowner who does not accept his statement is at liberty either to weigh the goods himself or refuse to carry them. Charges for freight stand on just the same footing as any other business transactions and should be settled by ordinary business methods.

(c) Any enactment on the subject could not affect foreign merchants, who may in some cases be the persons paying freight.

To sum up, legislation that goes beyond the relations between employer and workman would raise a number of questions which could not properly be dealt with in a Bill for the protection of workmen, and to recommend it would, in the opinion of the majority of the Committee, be beyond their province and impracticable.

The Committee accordingly have decided to take the information which can be obtained in the ordinary way of business by the employer as the basis for payment of wages, and have confined their recommendations to the best method of enabling the workmen to satisfy themselves that, on this basis, they are receiving full payment for the quantities handled by them.

Recommendations of the Committee.

For this purpose they are of opinion that legislation to the following effect would be sufficient :—

1. The employer should be required to furnish to the men a certificate of the quantities of goods handled by them. This certificate should state the true quantities handled by the men so far as the employer can ascertain. It should be obligatory to provide this certificate in all cases, whether asked for by the workmen or not, and wilfully to furnish a false certificate should be made a misdemeanour.
2. If in any case this certificate is questioned by the workmen, the employer should be required to furnish to a representative of the workmen reasonable evidence of its accuracy. The nature of that evidence cannot be exactly defined, as it must vary with the different methods of doing business. Usually, however, it could be given by proving to the representative that the quantities given in the certificate are the quantities for which the employer is himself being paid. There will, in almost every instance, be in his possession some books or documents showing the quantities which he has received from or sold to the person with whom he is doing business, and these books or documents should, on request, be shown to the representative.

   In the case of stevedores employed by shipowners, dock companies or other persons, we are told that in many cases there would be at present no method of verifying the certificate. The stevedore may be an illiterate man ; his contracts are often settled by word of mouth, and at present no documentary evidence of the quantities on which he is paid is forthcoming.

   The Committee, therefore, think it should be obligatory on a stevedore to substantiate his certificate, if disputed by the workmen, by producing a statement of the quantities on which he is paid, certified by the shipowner or dock company or other person employing him.

Amplification of the Committee's recommendations.

These constitute the main recommendations of the Committee, but it is necessary to amplify them on the following points :—

(a) The exact scope of the certificate, and the method of its publication.
(b) The qualification, &c., of the workmen's representative.
(c) The definition of the bodies of men qualified to elect a representative.

(a) The certificate. Its scope.

(a) The exact Scope of the Certificate and the Method of its Publication.

The certificate to be given by the employer must show the total quantity of the goods handled at piece-work rates, but, inasmuch as his accounts are often based only on the total amount of the cargo, it cannot in cases where goods are not weighed in or out of the ship, be made an obligation on his part to show the exact proportions of that total handled by each of the gangs working in separate holds. Frequently he has no knowledge of the amount each hold contains, and in such instances it is at present the practice to apportion the wages among the different gangs, either by estimating the capacity of the hold or by tallying the number of bags, barrows, trucks, &c. coming from each hold. The workmen have no objection to these methods of apportionment where they are in use, and their representatives on the Committee say that they will be satisfied by proof of the total output of the vessel.

Similar considerations apply to the comparatively rare occasions when the unloading of a particular vessel is not completed by the same set of men. In respect of such, it is customary at the present time, if goods are not weighed or measured, to adopt some rough method of estimating the proportion done by each set, and the workmen are content with the system. They believe that their interests will be sufficiently safeguarded if they can obtain satisfactory information as to the total contents of a vessel.

Method of its publication.

In the publication of the certificate it is not necessary to follow the precedent of the "Particulars" section of the Factory Act and require a written statement to be given to each workman. This would involve needless clerical labour, and it will be sufficient if one certificate is either given to one man of the gang or posted in some place where all the workmen can see it.

Time of its publication.

With respect to the time of publication, it will not always be possible for the employer to furnish the certificate immediately after the work has been completed. In many instances, as for example in handling timber, he does not receive the information necessary for the settling of his accounts until some time later. When the vessel arrives the quantity of the timber is not accurately known; the bills of lading only give a rough estimate of the amount, and even this may be useless, by reason of the loss of deck cargo on the voyage. It is not, therefore, until the timber reaches the merchant and has been stacked and measured by him that the exact figure is obtained, and this may not take place until as much as two months after the date of unloading. In such instances it is at present the custom to pay the men on a mere estimate of the quantity, and, though sometimes, it is asserted, an adjustment is subsequently made, this is not done as a general rule. More often the estimate is regarded as final and the practice causes much dissatisfaction; the employers maintain that they constantly find they have overpaid the workmen, while the workmen are confident that they are as constantly underpaid. If it were made compulsory for the employer to produce a certificate, as recommended above, all doubt on the subject would be removed; the final adjustment, it is true, could not be made until the certificate had been issued, but the workmen's representatives on the Committee state that there would be no objection to the labourers receiving wages on account and waiting some little time for the balance due to them.

(b) Workmen's representative.

(b) The Qualification, &c., of the Workmen's Representative.

In the selection and appointment of the representative empowered to verify the certificate in case of dispute, the workmen desire to have a free hand, but certain of the employers have urged that he should always be one of the men actually employed. While quite willing to give facilities for checking weights and measurements, they are opposed to admitting to their premises any one who is not in their employment, and showing him their books and documents. There is no doubt that in many instances any necessary verification could be most conveniently undertaken by one of the actual workmen, for example, by the head man of the gang, but the workmen's representatives on the Committee maintain that no legislation will secure protection for the labourers which does not enable them to appoint, if they wish, some one to act on their behalf who is not one of those employed. They argue that the employer, whose certificates it will be most necessary to test, is precisely the one from whom a workman could not ask for proof without endangering his position; if an employer is capable of giving a false certificate, he is equally capable of ceasing to employ the man who questions it.

The facilities afforded for such "victimization" in connection with dock labour have already been explained, and in view of the ease with which an employer can, if he wishes, mark his displeasure by merely refusing to re-engage any particular hand, the Committee feel that the workmen's argument carries considerable weight.

Further, the Trade Union officials on the Committee state that in many instances employers prefer to deal with officials representing the workmen rather than with the workmen themselves. The latter are sometimes apt to be unreasonable and to cause disturbance in the employer's office when demanding what they believe to be their rights, and such difficulties are less liable to occur with those who have more training in affairs.

This view is supported by Mr. Harrington, who states that he is specially instructed by the London Master Stevedores' Association, who handle 60 per cent. of the total tonnage of London, to say that the Master Stevedores would prefer to deal with "outside" representatives of the workmen. At present they settle all disputes as to weights or measurements through the mediation of a Trade Union official and they desire to continue the practice.

If again we look to precedents, those of the checkweighing provisions in the Coal Mines Regulation Act, and of the recommendations unanimously made by the Departmental Committees on checkweighing in the iron and steel industry, the chalk and cement industry and the lime and limestone industry, all are in favour of allowing the workmen an unrestricted option in choosing their representative.

Finally, there is nothing in the functions of the representative to make it undesirable that the workmen should have a free hand in his selection. His powers under the recommendation of the Committee would be quite specific and strictly limited. He would be authorised merely to inspect the employer's books or documents on which the statement of quantities, as shown in the certificate, is based. He would not be in a position to make representations on any subject to the employer, and provision should be inserted in any legislation on the subject to render him liable to summary punishment for any abuse of his position and to disqualify any person convicted of such abuse from again acting as a workmen's representative.

The Committee accordingly recommend that it should be left to the discretion of the workmen employed to appoint as their representative either one of themselves or anyone else they may select.

The appointment will not necessarily be a permanent one. Dock labour is, except as regards certain classes of men who are permanently employed by dock and harbour authorities, shifting labour, and the men employed at one dock or quay to-day may be elsewhere to-morrow. The representative will act on behalf of workmen working at a particular job for the purpose of seeing that they are paid full wages for that job. He should be chosen by the majority of the men employed at that job, and if his position is challenged by the employer, he should be required to show reasonable proof that he has been duly appointed.

(c) Definition of the Bodies of Men qualified to elect a Representative.

(c) Bodies of workmen qualified to elect representatives.

Except as regards men permanently employed by dock and harbour authorities as mentioned above, the workmen employed in dock labour do not form a definite set, such as the miners employed at a particular mine or men at a particular steel works. It is therefore essential in the case of dock labour to define what bodies of workmen are qualified to elect a representative. As the duty of such representative is to verify the certificate, the Committee are of opinion that the body of workmen empowered to appoint him should consist of all those in the employment of the person issuing the certificate who are themselves interested in it.

It might be considered that if there are, say, four gangs of labourers working four holds of a vessel, and three of them are satisfied while the fourth is not, the dissatisfied gang ought to have the power to appoint a representative on its own account. Since, however, a number of small gangs may be employed by one employer, the Committee do not think it is advisable to recommend the gang as the unit for making such an appointment. In practice, moreover, no difficulty is likely to arise. If any single gang were dissatisfied, they could at any time send one of their number—say the ganger—to ask to see the figures; to this the employer would in all probability consent, since his refusal could but tend to induce all the gangs to combine and together elect their representative.

So far as the Committee can learn, these recommendations will be applicable to all the varied conditions under which dock labour is carried on, except on certain rare occasions where the accounts of the employer are not based on the same weights and measurements as the workmen's wages. We have heard, for example, of one in which the employer was paid for freight by dead weight and the workmen by measurement weights. Or, again, freight may be paid on nett weights, i.e., the weights of the goods minus the weights of cases, &c., and the workmen are paid on actual weights. Such instances, however, must be so few that the Committee think that they can be provided for by special contract and that legislation to meet them is unnecessary.

We desire, in conclusion, to express to Mr. Alexander Maxwell our high appreciation of the services which he has so ably rendered as secretary to this enquiry.

We have the honour to be,

Minority Reports.

To the Right Honourable HERBERT J. GLADSTONE, M.P., Secretary of State for the Home Department.

SIR,

THE undersigned Members of the above Departmental Committee being unable to agree in its entirety with the Report of the majority of the Members of such Committee, report as follows:—

1. No satisfactory means can be arrived at whereby the workmen can obtain an accurate account of the quantities they handle unless and until, by legislation or otherwise, some check can be devised whereby the accuracy of the merchants' weights and quantities can be tested.

   It would be out of the question and impracticable, as the law at present stands, for shipowners to take the risk and the expense of delay attending an experimental examination of the goods he has to load or discharge.

   The complaint which, in our opinion, has been proved to be in some cases justified, is one with which shipowners and other employers of labour are not in a position to deal as the matter stands.

   The terms of the reference necessitate this point being brought to the attention of the Right Honourable the Home Secretary.

2. The charges were in such vague terms as rendered it impossible to satisfactorily check the evidence of the witnesses, but the possibility of fraud undoubtedly exists. The evidence made it plain that no such fraud existed in connexion with substantial undertakings, such as those of the Cardiff and London Dock Companies and shipowners generally.

   Majority Report, p. 2. Possibility of fraud on the part of the Employers.

3. We agree that the employer should give and publish a certificate, and when the employer is neither a shipowner nor a dock or railway company the workmen should be empowered to demand from the employer a certificate from some independent person connected with the transaction, and such certificate should be exhibited and be binding. We respectfully call the Home Secretary's attention to the earlier part of our Minority Report, in which we have endeavoured to express the reasons why it is impossible, in the present state of the law, to go beyond provisions such as we indicate.

   Majority Report, p. 5. Recommendations of the Committee, 1 and 2.

Subject to the above, the undersigned agree with the terms of the Report.

As witness our hands this sixth day of June, One thousand nine hundred and eight.

(Signed) C. W. GORDON.
J. C. MEAD.
J. HERBERT SCRUTTON.

To the Right Honourable HERBERT J. GLADSTONE, M.P., Secretary of State for the Home Department.

SIR,

I AGREE generally with the remarks of the Shipowners, Members of the Committee, and am of opinion that no arrangement will be completely satisfactory that does not give the employer the means of verifying the accuracy of the merchant's weights and quantities.

With reference to the evidence produced to the Committee, I am bound to remark that it was not of a character that influenced me in the direction of acceding to the men's demands for supervision of the accounts. My feeling is, however, that quite apart from any possible incorrectness of piece work accounts, whether or not such incorrectness were brought about by fraud, as some of the witnesses alleged, it is quite proper that men employed on piece work should have the right of checking the accounts. I did not therefore think it necessary to call for substantiation of the evidence given. If an alteration of the existing law in this respect were necessary only because of wrong doing on the part of employers, then it would certainly have been proper to invite the explanations of the employers against whom the serious allegations were made, and whose names have been omitted in recording the evidence of the witnesses.

In my view there has been no evidence whatever to justify the interposition of an outsider in examining piece work accounts. It would be highly objectionable to employers that their records should be open to inspection by men not in their employ, and whose qualifications would not necessarily be greater, and in many cases would be inferior, to those of the men actually engaged in the work and conversant with all the details. The workmen's representatives on the Committee are apprehensive that certain employers would cease to employ men who should venture to depute one of their co-workers to examine the accounts, but such employers would not be likely to more favourably regard men who appointed an outsider to undertake that duty.

To guard against any such action on the part of an employer it should be made the duty of the employer himself, at the commencement of any piece work labour, to call upon the men employed, and the men so employed should be required, to nominate one of their number to check the piece work account.

No objection could, however, be raised to an examination of an employer's accounts by an accountant appointed by the men, in any case in which they desire a better understanding of the matter than could be gathered from an inspection by one of their number, and it would be reasonable that where such an inspection should disclose an error to the injury of the labourers, the expense should be borne by the employer.

While recognising the ability and fairness of the labour representatives who were on the Committee, I think it well to point out that some of those gentlemen are strongly against piece work labour being employed in dock and ship work, and I think it is my duty to say that in my view the permission to men of no qualifications and not employed on the work, to inspect the piece work accounts, would in a great number of cases lead to the abandonment of piece work labour and so advance the objects which such members of the Committee greatly desire to bring about.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

(Signed) THOS. HARDY.

Mr. JAMES BARCLAY called and examined.

Mr. J. Barclay.

24 Jan. 1908.

1. (Chairman.) What is your official position?—I am secretary of the Dock Labourers' Branch in Aberdeen just now.

2. How long have you held that position?—For over 10 years.

3. How many men in your district are members of the union?—About 500.

4. What proportion of these men are employed in docks, wharves, or riverside labour?—They are mostly all employed in the docks.

5. Can you tell us what proportion of the work done by these men is done at tonnage rates?—I expect that there would be about 400 of them.

6. About 400 out of 500?—Yes.

7. Have you heard complaints that men paid by tonnage rates do not receive the amount due to them?—Yes, I have heard complaints for years.

8. How many complaints do you receive in a year on an average?—I could not say that, Sir, but we have complaints nearly every day when there is a steamer out, more or less.

9. Have you investigated those complaints?—Yes.

10. Did you find that they were justified?—Yes.

11. Will you please tell the Committee the circumstances of one or two cases where you found a genuine grievance?—The first case that I had to deal with was about 1900 in connection with a firm of coal merchants. We had trouble practically with that firm every steamer. The men complained that they were short paid. I always managed to get the money squeezed out of them till one steamer.

12. What was the actual loss you say the men incurred?—On one steamer alone the loss of money to the men was about 1*l.* 11*s.*, or thereabouts.

13. How many tons?—40 tons for the one boat.

14. How often did that occur?—That practically finished that firm.

15. How many steamers a week did the firm run?—We sometimes had two and sometimes three steamers a week.

16. Did you find that there was a deficiency each time?—Yes, mostly—more or less.

17. Has that continued to the present day?—No; they are getting on all right now.

18. When did they stop?—Just after that. The son, who was the manager at that date, and the foreman were both taken to prison.

19. Did the men take action?—No, we could not take action. I was going to, but we got them to pay up.

20. What were they prosecuted for?—Practically for cheating the coaling trawlers and they were cheating our men too. It was a swindle all round.

21. (Mr. Anderson.) They were cheating everybody?—Yes.

22. (Chairman.) How many years ago was that settled?—About seven or eight years ago.

23. Have you any other cases to tell us about?—Yes. Another company started about 1900. They principally coaled their own trawlers. Before they got any steamers built they had chartered steamers where they could pick them up, small or large. Then they got a steamer built for themselves supposed to carry over a thousand tons. The men thought that they were not being properly paid. There were no harbour meters to weigh the coal. Most of the firms in Aberdeen when they weigh the coal employ the harbour meters, but this firm employed their own meters, old men, and drove the coal to their own steel yard and weighed it there. When the men went for the money they had to take what they could get from the cashier. Sometimes they were paid a certain sum less, and the next boat it might be a good few shillings down. There were always complaints. I told the men to keep the weights—a man on each hatch. By what a man is paid we calculate the tons. I got pressure to bear through one of the Harbour Board. He got me to go down there, and they looked up the books and compared the figures for a month. We found at that time that it was a good bit short.

24. How much?—30 or 40 tons for the month. We sent a deputation to the members of the firm and explained this, and told them that they would have to stop it. The chairman said at that time, seeing that they had the new steamer, that they had not been sending on properly the bills of lading from the other end. They were only sending once a week instead of every steamer, but he would see that the thing was made all right. This went on for a certain time.

25. How long?—I could not say if it was 12 months or what, but the men began to complain again that they were short paid. Then they got the harbour meters and weighed the steamer out once, but she was not full, she was short. Then after that, the firm said to the men, "This is all the steamer carries." It was very nearly 100 tons short when she was weighed out. This went on for several years and we could get no redress. About 12 months ago they took the linings out of the steamer and made some alterations in No. 4 hold as regards the tank, so that the steamer would carry more coal. That was done, but we found that the men were getting less money. I started and got the system of appointing a man in each hatch to give me the amount paid, and we calculated that into tons. I have a statement here.

26. What do you consider was the loss the men made in the last 12 months?—I am coming to that. That is a statement that I kept for five weeks, 16 cargoes (handing the same to the Committee).

27. Would you give us some simple figures of loss which you consider the men suffered in any given period?—We found 8,662 tons loss. That was for three years back.

28. (Mr. Anderson.) At what rate per ton?—10¼. We could not go further back than three years.

29. One firm?—One firm.

30. (Chairman.) Was that admitted by the firm?—Yes, I have a letter here admitting it. We were going to take them into court, but they paid up everything and saved us from taking them into court.

31. You threatened to prosecute, and they paid up?—Yes.

32. When did they pay up?—In December, a little before Christmas.

33. 1907?—Yes.

34. Have you had any complaints since?—No, not since.

35. Have you anything else to say?—We have other firms on a smaller scale. Another firm works on the same system as the company I referred to just now. The only way we can get the weight is practically through the Custom House. We cannot get them through our own Dock Board. This goes up to 14 or 20 tons. There are four members of the company of which I speak who are members of the Dock Board.

36. Are there any other cargoes besides coal?—Yes, esparto grass, phosphate rock, and copper ore. That is all done by stevedore work. For instance, we have 1,500 tons to discharge, but the steamer might have 1,600 or 1,800. The man has no way of getting the weight, but has to take what the stevedore says.

37. Are the men to your knowledge anxious to have a legal right to check these weights?—Certainly, and they have been for years.

38. With regard to loading ships, have you anything to say?—No. It is mostly discharging. Aberdeen is the port for the north of Scotland for distributing the coal going away north by railway waggons.

39. Do you think that it would be difficult for the employer to furnish at any time evidence of the amount of cargo unloaded?—I do not think so. He must know the correct weight of the tally before he can make it up to pay the men what he does. He gets the actual weight that the steamer has in her. That comes along with the steamer.

40. Is there anything else you would like to tell the Committee?—No; I think that is about all.

41. (Mr. Sexton.) What are the average earnings of men working by tonnage at Aberdeen?—There are different rates. There are fillers, carriers, lifters and winchmen.

42. Never mind the sections, strike an average?—25*s.*

43. A week?—Yes, taking it all over, that would be the average.

44. For a full week's work?—Yes.

45. Working night and day, overtime as well?—Yes, whatever time they have to work.

46. There is no recognised or established system of ascertaining the weight. You cannot get it unless you can compel it?—No.

47. Have you ever asked for the production of documents?—Yes.

48. How many times a week?—I could not say how many times a week, but I have asked the employer, and several times the harbour office.

49. What has been the reply?—They hold that the bills of lading are their own private property and will not give them.

50. Can you give us a case where you have gone to the Custom House and procured the necessary document?—Yes.

51. What had you to pay for it?—5*s.* for each cargo.

52. They refuse to give it without payment?—Yes.

53. Have you any reason to believe that you got the correct statement there?—Yes, through the Custom House.

54. Do you know of any case where men who have asked for the information with respect to the tonnage have been victimised?—I could not exactly say victimised, but it is like this: if there is one man in a squad or a gang sticking up for his rights and demanding his money he is not victimised; but when the next steamer comes he is told that there is no job for him. There is generally one man in the gang who sticks up.

55. I want to know a particular case where any man, through taking action on account of short tonnage, has been left off as you say?—That is the only explanation I can give. They will not exactly say, "You will not get a job"—but you do not.

56. Have strikes ever occurred through the refusal of the employer to pay the right weight?—No, there have been no strikes.

57. With regard to the employer you mentioned first, have you on more than one occasion compelled him to pay that shortage?—Yes.

58. In 1897 or 1898 did I go with you to this man's offices demanding the money?—Yes.

59. Was that one of the occasions you had in your mind?—Yes, that was one that I had in my mind.

60. Were some proceedings taken against him?—We threatened him often. He had letters from our agent, but he always paid up. We could not get him before the sheriff.

61. How many cases had you with that man?—I could not say the exact number we had. It was more or less every week for a couple of years.

62. And this man traded not only in Aberdeen, but in Dundee?—Yes. His head place was there. It was a branch in Aberdeen, his son acting as manager.

63. You have not had direct complaints from Dundee?—No.

64. But you knew of the thing happening there?—Yes.

65. Is it the custom in Aberdeen when the ship has finished that the piecework money is paid or was paid to one man?—Yes.

66. The one man went to the public-house, or some other place, and doled it out to the men working with him?—Yes.

67. Does that prevail now?—I believe that in one or two firms it does.

68. So that the men have practically to take what this man gives them?—Yes.

69. Do you know that the Plimsoll mark has been raised by recent legislation?—I am not aware of that.

70. Is it the fact, or is it not, that the men are told that the tonnage is paid on the draught of the vessel?—No.

71. (Mr. Larkin.) Do you know of any vessel since July 1905 whose tonnage has increased though her load-line has been actually raised. Do you know any stevedore that has paid on a higher tonnage since that legislation?—No.

72. (Mr. Sexton.) On the evidence put in showing the difference between the tonnage in one ship and another, the total amount paid over by the firm to these men, where there was admittedly shortage, is 293*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*?—Yes.

73. Is that correct?—Yes.

74. Was that paid over by the firm after proceedings had been taken by our branch?—Yes.

75. (Mr. Anderson.) You are now referring to the second case you mentioned?—Yes.

76. (Mr. Larkin.) If a shipowner chartered a boat for the coal company, would the coal company accept the shipowner's statement that she carried so many tons of coal?—I do not know that they would.

77. Do you not think that they would see that they had legal means of ascertaining the quantity?—Yes.

78. If you saw the freight bill that was actually paid would not you be satisfied?—We get it through the Custom House and compare with their bills.

79. Have you to your knowledge ever found that the bills of lading have been falsified; that is to say, that spurious bills of lading have been submitted to the men, while the real bill of lading has been kept in the office?—I only knew that once. In Aberdeen they will not let the men see them at all. They count them as their own property.

80. Do you know one such case?—Yes, once I was shown a bogus bill of lading. When I got the men's money the firm said that it was sent on in mistake, and then they sent it on to Aberdeen.

81. (Mr. Sexton.) What remedy do you suggest to the Committee?—We think that the best policy, if Parliament would take it up and pass it, would be a sort of Act to help us in this matter. As the employers have the bills and the full tonnage beside them, they ought to make up a sort of billet, so that the amount that the men work on each hatch could be posted up. When the men went for the money they would see the amount of tons they had worked. We think it should be something the same as in the textile factories.

82. (Mr. Larkin.) Would you follow that up by this: once a month the official representative of the men should go to the office and be allowed to see the documents?—Yes, I do not know that they would allow it. It would be a stiffer job.

83. (Mr. Sexton.) The men want some security that they are being paid for what they work?—Yes, that is what they ask for. At this time they have none. They have to take whatever the cashier pays.

84. (Mr. Larkin.) Do you find as a rule that the stevedore is at fault, and not the company?—Many times the stevedore is.

85. The middle man?—Yes.

86. In nearly all cases you find this going on where there is a contractor or middle man?—Yes; I believe it was through the manager of this firm that this was going on.

87. (Mr. Sexton.) Have you any cases where a cooper has paid short?—No.

88. You have known the contractor in Aberdeen to take a contract at a lower price than the men could do it at themselves if they were without a contractor?—Yes.

89. Let me put it in this way. We have the fact that the men themselves offered to do the work for the Gas Company or the Municipality in Aberdeen at a certain rate, which, having been gone into by the Committee, was found to be the lowest possible figure it could be done at without the intervention of a contractor?—Yes.

90. The stevedore stepped in and took it at a less rate than that, and employed men who had never been employed on the work before?—Yes, and he was found out too — cheating the men sometimes as much as 20 tons on the gas coal per boat.

91. (Chairman.) Deliberately cheating them or, was it a clerical error?—It was proved that he was filching.

92. (Mr. Larkin.) The coal was weighed over a machine?—Yes.

93. And he was paid on that weight?—Yes.

94. And he paid the men short?—Yes. He kept some back for himself.

95. (Mr. Sexton.) That was proved to the satisfaction of the Gas Committee of the Aberdeen Corporation?—Yes. He has lost that contract now. There is another stevedore working now since that day.

96. (Mr. Anderson.) With reference to these three different cargoes that you have mentioned, esparto grass, phosphate rock, and copper ore, are they discharged on to the quays, or are they discharged overside?—The esparto grass is sometimes weighed. It goes into the country to the paper mills.

97. Is that before it is landed?—It is landed on to the quay.

98. Is it weighed on the ship's deck or on the quay?—On the quay.

99. Before it leaves the quay side?—Yes, some firms have it weighed every time and the harbour meters weigh it for them.

100. In those cases you have the correct weight given to you?—The men get the weight by favour from the meters.

101. But there is no obligation to supply the weight?—No.

102. Would it not obviate the trouble if in all cases where the cargo was weighed at the ship's side or on the deck the weights were compulsorily supplied to the men?—Yes, it would be a great help to them.

103. Does that apply to phosphate rock and copper ore?—That is different. It is carted away right into their own stores and sent to companies. It is weighed on the company's steel-yard. There might be harbour meters employed, or there might not. The men working on the ship cannot get the tonnage. It may be driven a mile from the ship to the works.

104. Have you any cases where this is discharged into small coasters and taken round to another port?—No.

105. It is all for firms in the vicinity of Aberdeen?—No.

106. Is it weighed on the ship at all?—No.

107. It is weighed at their works?—It is weighed at their works. It is put into barrels.

108. There would be no difficulty in the weights being supplied if it was made compulsory?—No.

109. Would it be an extraordinary thing to ask for? It would not inconvenience the owners of the freight or the master stevedore to supply those particulars to the men or their representative?—No, not a bit.

110. With regard to the bills of lading, have you ever at any time had any experience or knowledge of the bills of lading themselves, although they were the true bills of lading, not being correct?—Only that one time I mentioned to you, in the case of that one firm.

111. That was a false bill of lading?—Yes.

112. I am not referring to that; but with regard to copper ore or phosphate rock. You see sometimes about, say, 2,000 tons put down in a Customs entry. You find when it is weighed there is 150 or 200 tons more in the ship?—Yes.

113. So that in all cases the bills of lading would not be a satisfactory guarantee that the men were receiving the actual tonnage they had discharged from the ship?—No.

114. All these objections would be met if the correct weights were supplied, within a certain time after the discharge of the vessel, to someone authorised by the men to receive the particulars?—Yes. In Aberdeen the men have no way at all of getting their tonnage weighed. That is our simple case.

115. (Mr. Sexton.) Have you ever heard of any cases where a ship goes under a colliery tip in the collieries and when the ship goes under the tip, the water in the bilges is allowed to accumulate as much as a foot and a half, and when she is loaded the water is pumped out?—I have never heard of it.

116. I am speaking of where men are paid by the draught. That is not the method in Aberdeen?—No. They are all paid by the ton and not by the draught in Aberdeen.

117. (Mr. Gordon.) You mention "invoice tonnage" on this statement that you put in. Is that the shippers' invoice?—Yes.

118. The colliery invoice?—The colliery invoice.

Mr. J. Barclay.

24 Jan. 1908.

119. Did the company who employed your men produce the invoice to you?—They made out that statement for us.

120. But are the invoices quoted in this statement, the tonnage to the trawlers?—This is the tonnage from the pit. This is the tonnage paid to the men. This is the tonnage under-paid (pointing to the statement).

121. Is this invoice tonnage what the owner of the colliery in Durham or Northumberland sent to Aberdeen?—Yes.

122. That is based on colliery weights?—Yes, I expect so.

123. As you know, sometimes collieries are 40 or 50 miles from the shipping place. Do you make no allowance between the colliery and the discharge of the cargo in Aberdeen for loss in weight for handling the coal?—No, there would be nothing in that.

124. May I tell you as a practical man, a shipowner, that there is a loss, and we suffer that loss? I have checked it personally, so I know exactly. This two per cent. seems a little excessive on the quantity. I can only say you are extremely fortunate because the ships never discharge the full quantity as from the colliery. I want it to be perfectly clear: Is this the weight of the cargo weighed out at Aberdeen, or is it the weight of the coal that is put into the trucks in Durham or Northumberland?—It is the weight of the coal at the pits; and when weighed out here over their own steelyard the steamer turned out more tons of coal than that.

125. A shipowner would not get what you call here "invoice tonnage." Sometimes we are fortunate enough to get bill of lading weights which may or may not be correct. You have been distinctly fortunate to get it, because the shipowner does not as a rule get it. What your men want is to be paid on what the shipowner receives his freight on?—Our men ask to be paid for the work they actually do.

126. I take it that what you want is the same tonnage as the shipowner?—That is all.

127. (Mr. Gordon.) You told us of cases where you had had trouble and succeeded in recovering what you considered you were short of. Have you any cases where you have not succeeded in recovering what you thought you were short?—No.

128. Your existing powers have enabled you to bring these gentlemen, who have been apparently doing what they ought not to, to book?—Yes.

129. (Mr. Wignall.) It has caused a lot of worry and bother?—Yes.

130. That is what you want to avoid?—Yes. We can never get it except through the Custom House.

131. (Mr. Gordon.) Where do the Custom House get their figures from?—In the same way, and they are short too. I have a statement here.

132. The Custom House merely get a statement from the owners?—Yes. I do not know if they are going to take steps or not. On the 300 tons we were short, we find that the Custom House is likewise short of 260 tons.

133. You have under column 5, "Tonnage from the Collieries." Where did you get that information from?—From the collieries. It is stated there in column 1 or 2 where each ship was loaded.

134. That is not the actual tonnage discharged, but the tonnage shipped?—Yes. This is the tonnage from the collieries.

135. Has this quantity been admitted by anybody as the quantity that was discharged from those ships?—The company at Aberdeen admit that our men were 300 tons and 17 tons more short.

136. Do they weigh this coal when they take it in?—Over their own steelyard.

137. (Mr. Anderson.) That is when it is being discharged?—Yes.

138. (Mr. Gordon.) If they put it over their own scale, it is curious that you have not the weight shown by their own scale?—We took proceedings first. The five weeks was a test case.

139. Did the proceedings come to anything, or did you settle it without going into court?—We settled it without going into court; but we had to take those proceedings first. A tally was kept for five weeks. That was 16 cargoes. I went on to the Custom House and they sent a man, as far as I know, to the different pits. It is admitted that that short weight is correct, and more than that.

140. (Mr. Wignall.) They paid the money?—Yes.

141. And they admitted that it was more than you thought?—Yes.

142. Rather than go into court they paid the amount?—Yes.

143. (Mr. Anderson.) Which they would not have done if you had not been correct?—No.

144. (Mr. Mead.) I take it you would be prepared to produce the weight notes to substantiate your case if it was taken into court?—The point we were driving at was to take the firm into court to produce their books. We only had the five weeks to start with.

145. You have no evidence to show the actual weight that was put out by these steamers at Aberdeen?—Yes, the man who weighed the coal on their own steelyards.

146. It may be that the men have not been paid on the correct weight. In ultimately settling up the consignees of the cargoes paid on even a higher weight than they are debited with by the colliery owners, and a very great point is made of that. Why did they pay on that increased weight?—The men, perhaps, did not give the exact tally.

147. (Mr. Larkin.) The firm themselves admitted that it was 317 tons. Did your men reckon up 300 tons?—Yes.

148. And the firm admitted 317 tons?—Yes. Our men might not have been correct.

149. (Mr. Mead.) How do you arrive at the weights that you said that the vessels turned out?—We have only the statement got through the Custom House.

150. How was that statement arrived at?—The Custom House got that statement.

151. I take it that this coal is coastwise?—Yes.

152. Then what interest have the Custom House in that coal?—I do not know.

153. Where did those men get the weight from?—They got no weight. They knew the weight by the money they were paid.

154. By estimating what the ship had?—No. There are four hatches on the steamer. One man goes and draws the money for each hatch. Perhaps there are six. They divide the money among them, and it is only then that they know the actual amount that they are paid for.

155. Will you tell me where the four men get their information from to make this statement?—They get no information; they go by the money they get.

156. (Mr. Larkin.) What was your evidence when you went before the sheriff?—We never went before the sheriff.

157. (Mr. Mead.) On what were you going to base your case that you had not been paid on the work that you had actually done. What was your evidence that you were going to produce in court?—We had this evidence that we got from the pit. That was all the evidence that we had to go by.

158. (Mr. Sexton.) And did you not get the evidence of one man of the exact weights, that he knew were discharged?—Yes, the man that was at their own steelyards weighing the cargoes was there for three years. The way in which he knew this was that he saw the bill that the men were paid on for the full cargo of the steamer, and after weighing the whole steamer out, he had a statement of the tonnage.

159. It was passed over the steelyard by him?—Yes, and then he saw by the bill that the men were sometimes 40 or 45 tons short.

160. (Mr. Larkin.) Supposing I was working on a ship and I was not satisfied with what I was getting paid, and I went before a magistrate in England,

Ireland, or Scotland, and sued for a balance of wages due, would not the shipowner or the consignee be bound to appear in court and produce his bills of lading and way bills to contradict my case?—Yes. I think the sheriff would compel them to do that.

161. (Mr. Hardy.) I understand that in this particular case the men made out somehow or other that they were short paid to the extent of 300 tons?—Yes.

162. You cannot say how they arrived at that, but they must have arrived at it by some method of calculation?—Yes, when they were paid their money.

163. And they made a demand for 300 tons?—Yes.

164. Whereupon the employer said: "We have really made a mistake of 317 tons?"—No, not at that time. It was when we were going to press him on the three years that he made that statement.

165. It does not look as if there was any attempt at cheating in that case where the coal owner, or coal receiver, voluntarily offered to pay more than the men's demand?—No. They were cheating all along.

166. You have mentioned several cases of this kind of thing at Aberdeen. Have you any reason to think that there are similar cases which you have not been able to find out?—Yes, I believe there are.

167. The employers in one case, I understand, delivered a statement showing that they owed 293*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*?—Yes.

168. You were satisfied with that statement?—Yes.

169. Have you any reason to think that that was wrong?—There is one point there that the men were not altogether satisfied on, and that is that they had no overtime in that three years. That was not disputed. There is nothing allowed to the men for starting the steamer off at one or two o'clock in the morning.

170. The statement was prepared by the employers who were interested in the figures?—Yes, prepared by them.

171. Would the men be satisfied, generally speaking, with a statement from those who have to pay the wages?—They had nothing to do but just to accept it. They could not help themselves.

172. I should like to know whether you think it would be practicable that where the weighing is done, as in the case of phosphate rock and copper ore, not at the ships side at all, but at the works of the receivers, there should be a law to compel those receivers who have nothing whatever to do with the labour of discharging the ship, to disclose the weights of the cargo. Is that the suggestion?—Unless there were any other means of weighing it before it went there. The phosphate is never weighed from the time it leaves the hold of the ship till it gets to the steelyard of the receiver.

173. Do you suggest that cargo which would not otherwise be weighed on the ship, should be merely weighed for the purpose of ascertaining the wages of the men?—I think it is only fair. I think a man is entitled to be paid for what he works for.

174. But my question was, do you suggest that cargo which would not otherwise be weighed on the ship should be merely weighed for the purpose of ascertaining the wages of the men?—Yes, if the men were working by the ton.

175. You think that there should be that delay?—Yes.

176. Is it not possible with phosphate rock and copper ore and esparto grass, which is in barrels, I take it, for men to form a very close estimate of the weight without actual weighing?—No, they could not. You will not get two cargoes of bales running near the same weight with grass.

177. But you say it is sometimes weighed on the quay?—Yes, certain firms require that.

178. Therefore those weights are accessible?—The men get them as a sort of favour from the harbour meter. They are not bound to give them unless they like.

179. Now, would you be satisfied with the weights from the Custom House?—We cannot say if they are genuine or not. We have to accept what proof we have got.

180. Would you be satisfied with it?—If you have always to go to the Custom House it means a lot of bother and a lot of expense.

181. Parliament can do anything. Assuming that the Custom House were open to the men free for this purpose (anybody can look at the Bill of Entries, and so on, by paying a nominal fee), and supposing that were waived in the case of labourers interested in the cargo, would you be satisfied with that?—As far as the feeling among our men goes, they suggest that they have a billet posted up, as I said previously.

182. You suggest that the shipowner, or stevedore, or person interested in paying the wages should post up on the mast of the ship or on each hatch——?—Or at the pay-box, where the men go for their money.

183. Yes—what the cargo is made out to be. How would that help you?—He would know, I suppose.

184. Quite so—he would know; but what protection would you suggest for false accounts being put up?—If he did that he should be dealt with.

185. There is already a penalty for false particulars given to the Custom House. When you have ascertained the correct particulars you check your entry at the Custom House, and there is a penalty if you do not get the correct particulars. If a penalty would satisfy you there is a penalty already?—Yes.

186. Now, that first case you mentioned seems to be rather a bad case; 120 tons were supposed to be loaded into a trawler, whereas only 90 tons were actually loaded?—

187. Is the grievance that, whereas only 90 tons were put into the trawler and 120 tons charged for the men were paid for less than 120?—Yes.

188. Is that the grievance then—that they did not participate in the plunder?—No.

189. Ninety tons were put into the trawler, as I understand, and 120 charged for. Is it the grievance that the men were paid on less than 120?—That was only a suggestion. I could not follow that up with figures and check it.

190. Perhaps you do not know whether the men were paid on less than the 90 or less than 120?—No.

191. (Mr. Scrutton.) Would it be sufficient in Aberdeen, if in cases of bale goods the merchant who received the bale goods showed to you an invoice showing what he was paying for. Would that be sufficient evidence to your mind?—Really, I could not say right offhand.

192. (Mr. Hardy.) I gather that in some cases contractors have taken work at a lower rate per ton than the rates which the men themselves knew they were to receive?—Yes.

193. And the men knew the rate at which the contractor was to be paid?—Yes.

194. I do not say that it would justify the contractor in cheating them, but how did they expect to be paid a higher rate than the man himself was receiving?—Well, you see, the stevedore who got the men out and got the work, took on this contract and then, getting less money, he deducted so much off the men's tonnage. That would be, I suppose, to make up his own deficiency.

195. The dock companies in London have certain piecework conditions and arrangments with their men, and amongst others there are these: that "All labourers, "including crane men employed on a job, are to be "paid at the piecework rates which are set down in the "agreement, and each man is to receive the amount "due to him direct from the company's officers at the "end of the job. Accounts are to be prepared by the "company's officers showing (1) the amount payable "under this agreement; (2) its distribution: (a) the "amount advanced; (b) the allowances for special "duties; (c) the balance paid to each man. Such "accounts to be open at any reasonable time for "the inspection of the men associated in the work." Would those be conditions that you would consider satisfactory?—There is not a word about the bills of lading or the tonnage being shown.

Mr. J. Barclay.

24 Jan. 1908.

196. Those bills of lading are not in the hands of the dock company, nor are they in the hands of the stevedores, so how do you expect to get the bills of lading? This is the kind of document which a dock company would get on the discharge of a ship. This is a copy of the manifest, and it is also a plan of the stowage of the ship (handing the same to the Witness). Would that help the men at all?—I could not say with regard to that.

197. You will allow that a dock company or an employer of labour cannot show the men anything that the company or the employer has not got?—Yes.

198. If I tell you that that is the kind of thing that they have, would that help the men at all if it were open to their inspection?—I could not decide right off. It needs some study.

199. Can you tell me any document that is in the possession of an employer that you would like to see?—I suppose that there is nothing but the bill of lading.

200. You do not suggest that that is in the hands of the stevedores, do you?—No, not in the hands of the stevedores.

201. Where is it?—I suppose the captain of the steamer would have that. He generally brings the bill of lading.

202. Do you propose then that the captain of the steamer should show the men the bills of lading?—No, I do not mean that at all. Say a ship is coming in with phosphate, the captain would have a bill of lading that he could hand over to the broker, or someone like that. I do not know. I only suggest that, but I could not pass a definite opinion.

203. You are here to show us a way out of this trouble. Nobody sitting here would do anything to support wrongdoing to the men. We want to arrive at some way of securing their wages fully, and also of satisfying them that they are being paid in full. I want to know how that can be brought about. What documents do you suggest should be shown?—I could not say what documents come about the actual tonnage in steamers for the broker and so forth. We say that the men should be shown the billet, with the amount of tons.

204. It is quite conceivable that Parliament should say that the captain of every ship shall show the men at work discharging the ship the bills of lading. The captain has the bill of lading, no doubt?—Yes.

205. Is that what you want?—Something to that effect to give us an idea of the tonnage.

206. (Mr. Sexton.) Mr. Hardy asked you what method you would recommend in cases where, for the convenience of the employer, the cargo is not weighed. In cases like that would it not be sufficient that either the colliery weight or the ultimate weight should be shown to you; that you should have a certificate from the place where the stuff went—the weight at its destination; would that satisfy you?—Yes.

207. (Mr. Bellhouse.) Your whole complaint has been about coal. Have you any complaints to make about other cargoes besides coal?—There are not so many complaints because the men can make no complaints, because, as I say, with regard to the esparto grass or phosphate they have to take the money that the stevedore offers them. If they clear out a steamer carrying, say, copper ore, the stevedore may say that the steamer carries only 1,500. But it might be 1,600 or 1,700.

208. Then you have complaints, I understand, about copper ore and other things as well?—Yes.

209. But it is mere assumption that the men have been underpaid. You have no evidence that you can bring forward?—You see we cannot get at these cargoes; we have no means of getting at them.

210. Is there any piecework payment by measurement in Aberdeen, or is it all by tons?—It is all by tons—either by the day, hour, or tonnage. There is no measurement work in Aberdeen.

211. (Mr. Larkin.) Timber is paid by measurement?—No; that is by the hour.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. W. Gorman.

Mr. William Gorman, called and examined.

212. (Chairman.) What is your position?—I am District Secretary of the Dockers' Union in the Bristol district.

213. How long have you held that position?—Seventeen years.

214. How many men in your district are members of the Union?—About 1,600.

215. What proportion of those men are paid on tonnage rates?—About two-thirds.

216. Have you heard complaints that the men paid tonnage rates do not receive the amount due to them?—I cannot say that they say that they are being robbed, but they do express disatisfaction; they have thought they have earned more.

217. On an average how many complaints do you receive a year?—Very nearly every steamboat that is discharged on that system.

218. Do you investigate these complaints?—No, I have no opportunity.

219. Then you cannot say whether they are justified?—No.

220. Can you tell us any of the grievances that you have heard?—That the men expected to get paid several shillings more according to the amount of work.

221. Are the men, to your knowledge, anxious to have some legal right to check their weights?—Yes.

222. What cargoes are discharged at Bristol?—Principally grain. With regard to that we have no complaints, because the man who weighs the grain is one of the gang, and they are all paid on the weights of that man.

223. Do I understand that the principal product loaded and unloaded in Bristol is grain?—Yes.

224. And of that you have no complaint to make?—No.

225. The complaints, I may take it, are very small at Bristol?—Yes. The ores and things are not in great quantities as in some parts.

226. What cargoes have you complaints about?—Copper ore and phosphate rock.

227. What are the complaints in respect of those cargoes?—That the men, according to their own opinion, do not get paid the wages that they should be paid according to their estimate.

228. Would they be satisfied, if they were allowed to see the manifest of the ship?—Yes, I think so. They would be satisfied if I could see it on their behalf.

229. (Mr. Sexton.) Have you known of any case where documents have been asked for by the men, or their representatives, and have been refused?—Yes.

230. In how many cases?—In nearly every case where the men have complained and I have investigated I have got no satisfaction.

231. Do you yourself ask for the production of the documents?—Yes.

232. What has been the reply?—"It is no business of yours."

233. (Mr. Wignall.) The men are dissatisfied with the present conditions?—Yes.

234. And there have been, as Mr. Sexton put to you, innumerable complaints?—Yes, with the exception of the grain, in which case there is no complaint.

235. There you have a method adopted of checking the weight which gives satisfaction?—Yes.

236. And outside of that there is general dissatisfaction?—Outside of that there is general dissatisfaction.

The men are paid what the employer feels disposed to pay. There is no method of getting at the weight. The shipowner does not do the work at all; in our case it is a middle man, and he sub-lets, and oftentimes we surmise that the men are not being paid for the work they do from the price that he undertakes to do the work at.

237. When the men are dissatisfied you apply for proofs, you frequently, or always, get refusals from the contractor, and you have no assistance from any other people?—None at all.

238. You are always refused any assistance or any documentary evidence?—Yes. We have got so tired that we do not go now. We have got sick of it.

239. (Mr. Orbell.) When you say that you have no chance of investigating the grievances, what do you mean? Do you mean to say that it is no good trying to investigate because they refuse you any access to documents?—We have no law giving us a right to go to a shipowner and say, "Show us the bill of lading." The men are dissatisfied. They have nothing to corroborate what they are paid on. Even if they are paid right, they do not know whether they are or not.

240. Have you any cases where a man has made a stand by going to the office, or to the foreman, with the result that he has not been taken on?—We never get any remedy, they will not give it.

241. Do you know of cases where a man has been left out of employment, and, as far as you know and he knows, it has been because he has demanded his right?—Through the labour market being in such a state it is very rare that a man demands his right. He is afraid of being supplanted.

242. The complaint is in regard to everything but grain?—On any ton work. Where the men are paid by the ton it would be satisfactory to me, and to the men concerned, if the bill of lading was comeatable by anyone interested in the men engaged. If he said; "I want to see the bill of lading to satisfy myself "that the men are being paid the right tonnage," then the complaint would fall through; but we have not that. The men are working, as it were, blindfolded. They are paid just what the employers like. We have no data to go on. I do not say that all the employers are unscrupulous but there are very unscrupulous employers—middle men, and so on. They all get a bit out of it.

243. You said that in dealing with grain one of the gang was weighmaster?—Yes.

244. And, therefore, you are satisfied that in that case you got something near the correct weight?—Yes.

245. That applies to grain only, and to no other cargo?—No. The receiver gets the same amount as our men are paid for. Some ore is taken from the ships without being weighed. It is taken to the employer's yard and there weighed, but we never get to know why that is done.

246. Have you any cases in your experience where you have had to sue an employer for the recovery of wages paid short?—Not in the matter of tonnage; we could not sue because we have not known the tonnage.

247. Have you any timber men under your control?—All the timber work is day work.

248. Not paid by the standard?—No

249. (Mr. Anderson.) With regard to this copper ore and phosphate rock, is it at any time weighed on board the ship or near the ship when it is being discharged?—I have never known a whole cargo weighed. Probably there is more than one consignee. A small portion may be taken out. The remainder would go in bulk to the other consignee.

250. How far does that go?—Up the River Avon, up to the chemical works.

251. It is generally weighed at the wharf of the consignee, is it not?—Yes.

252. The correct weights could be supplied without much difficulty, then?—They could be supplied without much extra cost if we had the legal right to demand them.

253. There would be no serious inconvenience to the consignee in your requiring the supply of correct weights by the shipowner or the stevedore?—No there would be no difficulty whatever.

254. When you said the production of the manifest would be satisfactory did you mean that statement to apply to bulk cases or general cargoes?—In all cases where the men are paid by the ton.

255. You include bulk cargoes?—Yes. We should be satisfied if we were paid on the ship's freight. The shipowner sees that he does not carry freight for nothing. What is good enough for him is good enough for us.

256. Do you know that you cannot always depend on the manifest?—I know there are discrepancies.

257. You cannot depend on it as being a correct record of the quantity in the ship?—The manifest and the bill of lading are different things.

258. Do you know that the Customs' entry will tell you it is about so-and-so. In cases where it is not weighed in at the Spanish mines or the South African shipping ports, and so on, it is estimated roughly. Have you ever known a discrepancy between the estimated weight and the actual output?—No. We have never had an opportunity of checking it, but I am of opinion that a shipowner will not bring a lot of freight for nothing.

259. No. Do not you worry about the shipowner. He gets his freight. He looks after himself; but we are talking about the men who discharge or load the cargo, Now, just now you said that men did not care to make themselves obnoxious at times by asking for particulars, and, owing to the state of the labour market, it would not be very nice for any man, or any number of men, after having discharged a ship to have to go to ask for access to the necessary documents to prove what they had actually done?—If they went and made a demand, they need not look for any work at that place again. They do not tell them, but they look over their heads next time.

260. Even though it was the law that the employers should allow inspection of the documents?—In that case I should examine the document on behalf of the men and so prevent any ill effect to them.

261. Do not you think that the details should be supplied compulsorily without having to be asked for?—Yes.

262. And that applies where they are accessible to everybody interested, or the representative of the men?—Yes.

263. (Mr Lloyd Morgan.) You say that this grievance has been in existence for a long time. Has your union ever done anything to get the grievance righted by legislation?—I think we have done a good deal towards that.

264. In what way?—It has not been very effective. We always report on such things to our central office.

265. Has there been any deputation to the Home Secretary, or anything of the kind?—Not that I am aware of.

266. (Mr. Sexton.) Are you not aware that both your union and ours have co-operated in the matter of bringing this before the Home Secretary?—Not on this particular point; I am not aware of it.

267. Let me refresh your memory. Do you remember the time when the late Mr. Ritchie was Home Secretary? Do not you remember being up in London when you and I, and others placed the matter before Mr. Ritchie and got a reply from him to the effect that if we could prove any case of downright deduction he would investigate it?—I have not a recollection of the deputation.

268. Do you remember the Amendment of the Factories Acts which brought docks, wharves, and quays within its provisions?—Yes.

Mr. W. Gorman.

24 Jan. 1908.

269. Did you follow the passage of that through the House?—Yes.

270. Do not you remember that there we applied for the extension of the particulars clause to this very question we are discussing?—That may be.

271. And we were defeated in Committee by a small majority?—I was on the Committee for Docks Regulation, but I was not on that Committee, and it has slipped my memory.

The witness withdrew.

[Adjourned for a short time.]

Mr. T. B. Davies.

Mr. Tom Brett Davies called and examined.

272. (Chairman.) What is your position in your union?—I am the District Secretary of the Dockers' Union for the North-east Coast.

273. How long have you held that position?—15 years.

274. How many men in your district are members of the union?—Practically the whole of the men employed in that particular branch of industry, dock and river work. We have no non-unionists to speak of.

275. What is the number of men?—Approximately 1,250.

276. Can you estimate what proportion of the work done by these men is done at tonnage rates?—Yes; roughly speaking, three-fourths as near as I can gauge it.

277. Have you heard complaints that the men paid tonnage rates do not receive the amount due to them?—Yes, from time to time I have had complaints.

278. How many complaints do you receive in a year on an average?—It is impossible to give any specific number, but, as I have mentioned, quite three-fourths of the work done is done at tonnage rates. I may explain that the whole of the work that is done on the river apart from the dock is done at tonnage rates, both import and export, and there is a general state of dissatisfaction prevailing on the part of the men.

279. How many complaints have you had, do you think, in the last 12 months?—20 to 30 perhaps.

280. Have you brought any of these complaints to the notice of the employers?—Yes, I have occasionally.

281. With what results?—The employers simply say: "We weigh the stuff, and you will have to take our word for it."

282. Who are the employers of your men?—A very large number. There are on the Tees, which I am more particularly concerned with, from the entrance of the river to the top end, probably about 20 to 27 wharves, and each of those wharves is adjacent to particular ironworks of different employers. I could enumerate the whole of the 27 if you wished it.

283. No, thank you. Do I understand that the wharfingers employ the men?—Not the wharfingers—the firms themselves. We have not contractors. It is all done by the firms themselves.

284. The ironmasters?—Yes, the ironmasters employ all the labour directly. There is no contracting and there is no sub-contracting.

285. Do I understand that stevedores are not employed?—Not as contractors. The work is done directly by the employers themselves.

286. What are the different kinds of cargo that they handle?—Pig iron, steel and iron plates, rails and basic slag, manufactured iron and its resultants.

287. Are the men to your knowledge anxious to have some legal right to check the weights?—Emphatically so.

288. Is there in the possession of the employer any document showing the amount of goods loaded or unloaded which can be shown to the men?—If I might briefly explain the method, you will understand it better. The ships in the case of imports are unloaded to the wharf which is close to the works as I have mentioned. The stuff is unloaded into waggons and it passes over a weighbridge and there the employer has a man weighing on his behalf. Occasionally the shipowner also has a weighman there, but that is purely optional and is not a frequent occurrence, so that the employer has the weights taken by one weigher in the case of imports. In the case of exports, the iron plates and so on are weighed in the place previous to shipment. So that he has documentary evidence ascertained by his own servants as to the weights received and forwarded.

289. Your case is that you want the men to be allowed to check the weights of the imports and exports?—My case is this. The men are working continuously, night and day shifts, with no interval at all. There is no overtime. There are two shifts. Men have been working all night discharging or loading and stowing iron. All they know in the morning is that there is a ticket stuck in the cabin window saying such a ship has discharged so many tons of iron ore, or in the case of export loaded so many tons of pig iron. Generally speaking it is unsatisfactory.

290. Would your men be satisfied if they were allowed to see the weight taken by the employer?—I should not put it quite that way. I would say that satisfaction would exist if the men had the same right as is conceeded by the receivers, the merchants, to the shipowners, that is to say, if they had the right to put a checkweighman precisely as in the case of mines to check the stuff passed over the weighbridge.

291. Would the men be prepared to pay for that checkweighman?—I should say that there would be no question as to that.

292. They would?—Yes, I think so.

293. I have been informed that sometimes when work is slack it is customary to distribute one job amongst two or more gangs, so that one gang may unload or load only part of a cargo. Have you known cases where this has occurred among gangs?—Owing to the action of the union we have obviated any difficulty in that direction. If we are going to put twelve men where six have been working previously it is ascertained what amount of stuff the gang of six men had discharged or loaded prior to the additional work coming in. It is weighed off.

294. Sometimes a cargo is lighter when it arrives in port than it is shown to be by the ship's manifest owing to shrinkage caused by the draining away of moisture or the loss of deck cargo in rough weather?—We have not any deck cargo. Iron ore which comes from Spain very often when it is loaded is very moist indeed, and then on the voyage there is a certain amount of evaporation, and I say that it is very much more frequent than anything else that the weight of the cargo received differs essentially from the weight shipped originally at the port of embarkation.

295. How do you propose to meet that difficulty?—I am not concerned about it. I have not thought of a remedy.

296. In some cases I am told that the exact amount of cargo landed is not ascertained until the goods reach the consignee or merchant, which is some time after the unloading. How would you deal with that?—I have not had that to contend with. At Hartlepool the ore received has to be transferred a distance, and very often it is two or three days before it reaches its destination, but in those cases the railway company who own the docks weigh the cargo immediately it is filled into the wagons from the ship, and therefore that difficulty does not arise.

297. (Mr. Sexton.) Have you ever asked employers to produce the necessary documents of a satisfactory character to prove how much exactly was discharged or loaded. Have you ever asked for them?—We have.

298. Have the men ever made any complaints that they have not received a satisfactory document?—We have not asked for any document. We pin our faith to what I am putting before you now; that is a right to see the stuff weighed.

299. You say that the only evidence you have now is a note posted up in the cabin window. Have you ever asked for anything of a more satisfactory character?—I have said to the employers, and the men have said themselves, when a ship comes to the quay, "This ship brought 3,700 tons last time, and it has only turned out 3,250. Now how do you account for that?" "We cannot account for it at all, you have been paid on all that she has brought. If she brought so much on the last occasion we cannot help it." The employers keep a record.

300. Does the employer produce any document to satisfy you of that?—He does not produce any document. You have to take his word. They never offer to produce a document, and I should say that they would be offended if you asked for one.

301. Do you know any actual cases where there was good ground for believing that the man had been paid short tonnage?—Yes, in my own mind I do. I have reason to think that there have been several such cases. I have good grounds for believing so.

302. Have you asked for the production of the manifest or way bill?—The manifest does not give the weight. The only thing we can ask for is the bill of lading, and I am quite certain that there are very few cases where the bill of lading and the output of cargo are anything like exact.

303. I agree that the principle of a checkweighman is a good one, but would not you require a checkweighman for every hatch?—No. The stuff is landed at the wharf, speaking of the Tees, and the same applies to the Tyne and Hartlepool. The wharf has so many cranes on it. There is a rail track down from the works to the wharf very often 200 yards or half a mile. Usually at the end of the track there is a weigh-cabin—the track as distinct from the wharf. We could work nine cranes on one wharf if required. There are two prices paid for discharging ore, that is, one price where the cargo can be worked from the bottom of the ship, and another price where you have to break down or dig down through the centre of the cargo. Where it has been necessary to break down, the tickets have on them B.D., meaning break down. Where it is got from the bottom there is no mark whatever. Now we are confident that we get paid for a number of tons at the lower rate that are really B.D., and if we had our own checkweighman we would see that anything of that sort did not occur. But we should not want a checkweighman for every hold, and I think I could explain to the Committee satisfactory grounds why it would not be necessary to have one for each wharf.

304. (Chairman.) If you had a checkweighman to weigh the whole of the stuff as it goes into the works, how would you distribute the weight amongst the different gangs?—At most wharves, to use the vernacular, the men "chuck in." You always differentiate what ship the stuff has come out of. It is ticketed. The men working on that ship all share and share alike. If men are working at a bad hold and only turn out 220 tons, and others are working on a good hold and turn out 240, the output is shared. In wharves where the men are paid according to the stuff they turn out the wagon tickets specify out of which hold the stuff has come, so there is no difficulty on that point.

305. Where they have a system of pooling such as you have mentioned, do not those who work harder grumble?—No. The men share the output. We have a very rough and ready way of dealing with a man who does not do his share.

306. You watch that closely?—If he deliberately does not do what he ought to do we take care that he does do it.

307. Men paid in that way are satisfied?—Perfectly satisfied.

308. (Mr. Wignall.) Supposing you had someone in authority to go down and check a cargo at any time you wished to check, would that be satisfactory? Suppose you or any official went down?—I should not have time and I do not think it would be satisfactory if I had time, if I may say so. I think that a checkweighman should be a man who was expert at the work, and was not directly a servant of the trade union. That is my own opinion. I have had great experience and I do not think that it would be effective to have a man who would go down like an inspector of weights and measures catching coal-men taking an odd cargo here and there. It should be regular to be of any use. If you singled out a particular employer he would naturally conclude that, by inference, you suggested that he was more dishonest than his neighbour.

309. I do not suggest that. There is no other port in the kingdom that carries on work under the same conditions as Middlesbrough. It is practically isolated?—I should be happy to tell you where there are others.

310. Newcastle?—There is no iron ore at Newcastle.

311. Tyne Dock?—The whole of the Tyne is conducted on exactly the same principle, with this difference, that at Jarrow, Palmer's do their own work. The Tyne Dock belongs to the North-Eastern Railway Company, and they work as nearly as possible on exactly the same system as we do at Middlesbrough. At West Hartlepool they have no iron exports but a considerable amount of iron ore imports. This is a very important phase of the question and I want you to keep that in sight. The witnesses from Wales will tell you that, practically, they have almost the same system.

312. You want to employ a checkweighman. Knowing all these ports and having worked at Newcastle-on-Tyne and this port, my experience is that you are practically isolated as a port from any other port in the country. At West Hartlepool general cargo is imported and exported?—That is incorrect; pardon me.

313. And in Sunderland the same thing?—I have no knowledge of Sunderland whatever, but I think I can claim to have a fairly good knowledge of West Hartlepool. At West Hartlepool the imports are almost entirely confined to timber and the exports to coal. They have a certain amount of iron ore for Seton Carew and Dinsdale, but it is almost entirely confined to timber, as I have said, and it is a seasonal import at that.

314. At West Hartlepool?—Yes.

315. You have given your evidence very clearly. Knowing the place I can sum up the whole thing in one word. There is general dissatisfaction amongst the men. They believe they are not always paid what they are entitled to and that is the crux of the whole position?—That is the crux of the whole position.

316. They are willing to appoint their own checkweighmen if facilities are given them for so doing?—Yes.

317. You in your own opinion believe it to be to the general advantage if some facility of that kind was given to check weights?—I think it would be to the general advantage.

318. I can quite corroborate what you say from my own knowledge?—Yes.

319. (Mr. Orbell.) With reference to the stuff running over the scale, do you know what the weighman weigh to—to 100 or to 200. Do you catch my meaning?—I think so. You mean to say to how low a fraction of ——— weight do they come.

320. That is it?—We get to quarters of a cwt.

321. Do you?—Yes. But with regard to the former part of your question I should like to add to my answer that on any line of rail or wharf you will see a tremendous amount of leakage. You see the stuff that has come up piled upon the wharves. The men lose that; there is no question of it. Any employer will admit it and he will tell you that he cannot help it, but it is perfectly true.

322. (Mr. Anderson.) Is not that passed over a scale afterwards?—No. The same applies to pig iron also. Pigs drop off the bogies; you cannot help it.

323. Following the appointment of checkweighmen do you think it would be satisfactory if an employer was compelled to produce a statement of particulars giving the tonnage worked by the men either discharging or loading, with a penalty for supplying false information?—My relations with employers are extremely friendly and I want to say that they have always exhibited the greatest willingness to show me any documentary evidence that they had. But penalty clauses are altogether a different thing, of course. I think it would be advisable. Personally I do not imagine that any reasonable employer would offer any objection to our being placed on exactly the same footing as coalminers and iron-ore miners, that is to say, being given the right to appoint a checkweigher.

Mr. T. B. Davies.

24 Jan. 1908.

324. But do not you see that this is a system that could not be applied to all the processes of loading and discharging in the United Kingdom?—I suggest that any regulation should be permissive in its operation, and where a system of checkweighing can be adopted the men should have permission to adopt it. In our case there is no question that it could be adopted, and I can see no objection to it.

325. Do I understand that no food stuffs, for instance, are discharged at Middlesbrough at all. Is there no other cargo discharged?—I do not say no other cargo. Distinction should be made between the dock and the river at this port.

326. What do you discharge at the docks?—Occasionally in the docks we discharge timber. Middlesbrough is not a port of export very largely of other goods than iron.

327. Is that piece work?—We have a uniform rate of 8*s.* a day and we do not work piece work in the docks under any circumstances whatever.

328. Then it does not concern it all.

329. (Mr. Wignall.) Your evidence is confined to the river work?—My evidence is confined to the river work.

330. And it does not touch the docks?—There is no piece work in the docks.

331. (Mr. Mead.) I understand that employers have never refused to give the weights when you have asked them?—When I have said to the superintendent wharfinger, "That ship did not turn out as well as "we expected; it has 200 tons less than last time," he has said, "Look here; this is what we have," and he has shown me the weights with the greatest willingness.

332. The weights as arrived at over their weighing scales?—Such as he had.

333. Do you find any dissatisfaction with the weights?—Yes. I am not imputing dishonesty, but I simply say that it is unsatisfactory. If I buy or sell an article I want to see it weighed, it is no satisfaction to be told that it is right.

334. In other words you have to take word of mouth?—We have to take word of mouth.

335. (Mr. Hardy.) Who employ the men—the ironmasters?—Yes.

336. Is it the shipowners' business?—No, the receivers of the cargo, the ironmasters.

337. Where is the labelling "B.D." done?—On the wharf. The stuff goes from the wharf to the furnaces.

338. Who puts the B.D. label on?—Someone employed by the receiver of the cargo.

339. You said that the ticket was taken off again?—No, pardon me, I did not.

340. Do you mean that the ticket is not put on in every case?—When a man is in the weighhouse till two or three o'clock in the morning, he does not see that every waggon has B.D. on. Many a waggon should be paid at 5*d.*, but it is not observed.

341. How would that be remedied by a man being in the weighhouse. Can he tell by the look of it?—No. But instead of sticking in the cabin and looking through the window, it would be his duty as a servant of the men to come outside and say to the other men: "Look, this is a breakdown waggon."

342. He would have to exercise care?—Yes, he would not be entitled just to trust to Providence.

343. (Mr. Larkin.) Being a servant of the men you would make him come out of the box?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. G. H. Lock.

Mr. George H. Lock called and examined.

344. (Chairman.) What is your position?—District secretary of the Dockers' Union, Cardiff.

345. For how long have you held that position?—Four years.

346. How many men in the district are members of the union?—About 1,500.

347. What proportion of the work done by these men is done at tonnage rates?—About 90 per cent.

348. Have you heard complaints that men paid tonnage rates do not receive the amount due to them?—Yes, in all grades.

349. About how many complants do you receive a year, on an average?—Three or four some weeks. It is all according to whether there are a large or small number of boats.

350. Have you investigated these complaints?—Yes.

351. Do you find that some of them are justified?—Yes, and I am prepared to prove it.

352. Let us take the cases one by one. What are the principal cargoes that you import?—We have grain. There is a large number for the various firms at Cardiff. Then pit wood. There is the rough timber or fir timber. There are two sets of wood coming there; one is known as Norwegian which we call props in South Wales. The other is pit wood which is fir and has its bark. Then there are deals and baulk timber and iron ore, broken stones and copper ore and burnt ore.

353. Who employs the men?—The majority of it is done by a contractor.

354. What are the contractors known as?—Stevedores and contractors. If you get one of the cards you see "stevedores and contractors." That is the position they take. We have a large shipping of rails and steel sleepers also.

355. Do you assert that the men in some cases receive less wages than they should receive?—Yes. In one case in two days' work there were 50 tons per gang short. I have the proof in my possession.

356. What cargo was that?—Iron ore.

357. When was that?—Last year. I have the dates in my pocket.

358. What were the particulars in that instance?—These cargoes are loaded into dukes, as we call them, or large iron waggons at the Roath Docks. They are taken across to the works and tipped right out. These waggons run from 15 to 18 tons, and the men were paid 15 tons on the average.

359. How did you ascertain from the wages paid that the weight was short?—This was done by the contractor, I may say, and I asked permission from the manager of the company if he would allow me to check these particulars and he gave me the opportunity. That I did, and I went over the weights. I went to the contractor about the matter. He afterwards paid one gang 22 tons, and the other ones something less. I have the exact figures here.

360. That is near enough?—He paid one gang 22 tons and the other 14.

361. And the whole of the loss to the men before that was what?—They were paid 873 tons whereas 977 were due to the men.

362. And what was paid to the men afterwards?—36 tons only were paid to the men.

363. Did the employer give any reason for that?—He gave a reason which I did not consider was fair.

364. What was the reason?—He said that he had paid other men for it and he could not pay it to two lots of men. He paid the men working by night on the 15-ton average. He deducted that from the day workmen and put it on to the night men, making every man equal although he did not do the work.

365. And some of the men suffered in consequence?—Evidently. As I have stated, the true weight was 977. The total received by the two gangs was 909, leaving a shortage of 68 tons.

366. Have you any other grievances?—I have another case of the same sort which I went over.

367. What was the particular cargo in this case?—Iron ore—the same contractor. That was the 25th May 1906. While checking 91 waggons I found that the items varied from 1 cwt. up to 1 ton 4 cwts., and we had one waggon 2 tons 6 cwt. short. Those waggons were weighed by the railway company—the Rhymney Railway Company,

368. What happened then?—After allowing for one waggon to the benefit of the contractor we made it 13 tons odd. That was then taken from the men.

369. Did you bring the case before the employers?—Yes.

370. What did they say?—The usual thing—that the contractor had paid out the whole of the weight, and he made reference to that when the attention of his superiors was called to the matter. He said that if one section of men had been underpaid the others were overpaid, and, therefore, the whole of the bulk of the ship was actually paid out.

371. Did you bring this statement to the notice of the employer of the contractor?—Yes. I should not have stated it here to-day if I had not.

372. I know, but I want to get it on record. What did the employer of the contractor say?—He gave me a letter on the matter, and he asked me if I could find the number of men that were working on the particular ship. He wanted the amount given to the other men. A gang may be here to-day and shifted elsewhere to-morrow.

373. Have you any other cases?—Every week and every day that I go on the dock.

374. The same kind of thing?—Yes.

375. Are there complaints about iron ore?—Yes. There are complaints in every grade.

376. Are there complaints with regard to the grain?—No, not so much with regard to grain, but the men complain that they are paid on 62 lbs. to a bushel and they say that they ought to be paid on less.

377. That is a question for their union?—I only mention that.

378. With regard to timber have you had complaints?—Yes, many. Last year we had a boat that brought 647 standards and 50 cubic feet. The second time the same year it brought 626 standards and 145 cubic feet and the men who worked the latter had half-a-crown more than the men who worked the first cargo although there was a difference of 20 standards, I am giving the figures according to the Custom House measurement. I have the exact figures and anybody who cares to have them can have them. They can be got from the Cardiff "Journal of Commerce" which is very useful to the men. On July 12th, 1907, a Swedish boat had 2,126 loads. That is 646 standards and 40 cubic feet over.

379. What are these?—These are deals. We get them in loads and I have to make them up into standards. August the 27th the same paper shows the same boat as having 2,065 loads which I make 625 standards and 125 cubic feet over, and the men who did the 625 standards had half-a-crown more than the men who did 647.

380. At the same rate per standard?—At the same rate per standard, because our tariff is signed for two years and cannot be broken for two years. Last year, during one week alone, through getting one or two measurements from one firm, we were able to get 15*l.* one week from one particular stevedore for this particular work.

381. (Mr Wignall.) Which was underpaid?—It was underpaid; I can give the names of the boat and what was paid to each man.

382. (Chairman.) Did he give any explanation?—No. When he saw that I had got the measurements and that I was determined to go to law about it, he gave the payment sooner than get his name into the paper.

383. What are your principal exports?—General goods in detail, but chiefly iron and steel sleepers. We have a lot of tin sometimes, and lots of things going away.

384. Are the men employed by the stevedore in the matter of exports?—Yes.

385. Have you any complaint to make about the system?—Yes. We have no possible means at our disposal of getting the weight, not even the same as for the iron ore or for the timber. We have simply to take the word of the stevedore for what it is worth.

386. What would satisfy the men with regard to this?—So far as the men are concerned they would be satisfied if I had permission to see the captain's bills of quantity or his bills of lading.

387. Both inwards and outwards?—Both inwards and outwards.

388. The men would be quite satisfied if you saw that?—Certainly. They would take my word for it if I got the privilege. That is what they desire.

389. What do you suggest should be done in the case of deck cargo which is lost in rough weather?—That is already dealt with. If a cargo is lost in a storm we always find that the insurance people or some other parties who are concerned in the matter send a tallyman there who checks every piece, piece by piece, over the side of the ship to the carrier who carries it to the waggon or pile.

390. What document would the men require in that instance?—I would take the same. If it was the Dock Company that had to do that I would be satisfied, and the men also would be satisfied with having their report upon that subject.

391. To sum up, may I say that in cases where the men are employed at piece-work rates there is generally a document in the possession of their employer showing the exact amount loaded or unloaded?—Yes.

392. And if the men had the legal right to see that document they would be satisfied?—Perfectly satisfied. You have not mentioned the pit wood. There they have to depend only on a list given by the foremen to the men. There is no chance of seeing the weight of a waggon or going into a machine, or anything else whatsoever. We simply see, "ss. So-and-so, paid so much," and the cargoes go on to the particular collieries that have taken the pit wood, and we have no check either aboard or ashore.

393. (Mr. Wignall.) From your experience as a trade union official, and from your practical experience of work at the dock, which extends practically over your whole lifetime, you are able to speak not only as to things as they are now but with regard to work at the dock prior to your employment as a trade union official?—Yes.

394. This is an old standing grievance about the loss of tonnage and not a new grievance?—That is so, alteration of figures as well.

395. During your experience as a trade union official, when the men have complained to you that they have been underpaid, you have been to a lot of trouble in getting evidence from the receivers of cargo or railway companies or anybody who could give evidence to prove that the figures are right or wrong?—At Cardiff the railway companies will give no information whatever. There is only one person in the timber trade who will give you the measurements.

396. So that you have repeatedly applied for and been refused access to documents which would prove your case?—Yes. That occurs every week when I have to go to the employers.

397. When iron ore is imported directed to firms whose wharves are full up and whose cargoes have to be handed over to a contractor, you invariably have trouble with the contractor?—Every week regularly.

398. Then you have to go to the firm receiving the ore and they sometimes give you the weight?—Yes.

Mr. G. H. Lock.

24 Jan. 1908.

399. Invariably you prove that the men are not paid what they are entitled to?—They prove that my figures are correct.

400. In that way you have recovered a considerable sum of money in past years?—Yes.

401. When you have applied to the contractor has he refused?—I may say that he has absolutely refused.

402. He has not only refused but you have been turned away?—Yes, by policemen.

403. Have the men for a long time been agitating for a checkweigher?—Yes. They would like to have a checkweigher, but they are not in the happy position of having enough money to pay a man.

404. Did not the iron-ore men propose themselves at one time to pay one shilling a week for a checkweigher?—Yes.

405. Is it not a fact that they actually commenced paying until I pointed out that they had no right to appoint a checkweigher and they were wasting money?—Yes.

406. The whole scheme fell through?—Yes.

407. Is it within your knowledge that the men have said that it would be worth 5*s.* or 6*s.* a week to each man to get a checkweigher appointed?—Yes; only last week they told me that it would be worth 5*s.* or 6*s.* a week.

408. They were quite willing then to appoint a checkweigher if they had facilities for appointing a man to check the stuff where it was weighed?—Yes, they would have been only too glad to do it then.

409. There is general dissatisfaction with the conditions that exist at the present time?—Yes.

410. That applies to the whole of the men?—The whole of the docks.

411. Have you had considerable trouble with men outside of those who agree with the tariff, coming in and getting on board ships and taking cargoes at prices which we knew would not pay?—Yes.

412. Is it a fact that your men have come to you and complained that they have not been paid on the full cargo?—Yes.

413. Because these people have come in and arranged with the captain or the broker at a low rate?—Yes.

414. Is it a fact that these men have done occasional jobs and you have never been able to recover anything from them?—Yes.

415. Because they have no money?—Because they have no money.

416. So that taking it all round, the matter has been a source of constant trouble to you?—Yes, and it will be until it is altered. In fact one man we had to sell up.

417. (Mr. Orbell.) You stated that owing to getting some figures from a particular employer you were able to get 15*l.* from some other employer who was at fault?—Yes.

418. If the employer had refused to give you those figures would you have had any other means of ascertaining what was short?—None whatever except the Customs measurement and the master stevedore, the employer of the men, denies that that is correct.

419. Do the men accept the Customs measurement?—They are agreeable to accept it.

420. Have you any trouble in getting these measurements in Cardiff?—Not now, because a paper has started which gives these details.

421. That paper is not a Government concern, is it?—No, it is not a Government concern.

422. But speaking of the Customs, do you have much trouble in getting this information from the Customs?—5*s.* 6*d.* I paid and I had to work out the details myself afterwards. It was given to me in loads.

423. Does the Customs put any obstacle in your way?—It takes you some time before you can get it.

424. Then it is sometimes difficult to get it?—Yes.

425. (Mr. Anderson.) The appointment of a checkweighman would not solve the question of the weights which are handled in loading?—No.

426. How do you propose to deal with that?—We would take the captains' bills of quantity as I think they are called.

427. (Chairman.) Bills of lading?—I do not know what they call them going out; it is bills of lading coming home.

428. (Mr. Anderson,) Bills of lading?—That would do for us.

429. Would it be satisfactory if it were made compulsory on the part of the employer to place a statement of particulars somewhere where it would be accessible to the men or their representatives?—They would much prefer that I saw them.

430. Under a penalty for giving false particulars?—The men would much prefer that their official saw these figures rather than themselves, because there are many reasons why men do not like to go for these particulars. A man has to consider his wife and family, and if he makes himself rather obnoxious in this matter he is not required.

431. Just simply giving access to the men interested in the job would not satisfy them?—No; they want their officials to see them.

432. They want it to be compulsory that the information should be provided, so that they would not have to pay for asking for it?—Yes; they want their officials to see it.

433. (Mr Hardy.) Are pit wood and props paid by weight or measurement?—Pit wood is paid by tonnage, the pit props is by measurement, and that makes the difference between the two.

434. Where is the weighing or the measurement done?—The pit props is done day-work.

435. Where?—At Cardiff and Barry it is done piece-work.

436. Is it weighed at the ship's side?—The props are measured at the ship's side. The Norwegian props the Cardiff Railway Company does, and pays day-work at Cardiff.

437. Is it suggested that the men or the men's representatives should have access to records which are only in the possession of somebody who is not the employer of the men?—They would be satisfied as long as they have weights.

438. Is that what you want?—We would be satisfied with the weight the captain gets.

439. Do you wish to send a man to the consignee's warehouse where he weighs quite independently of the ship's weighing?—They have no weighing machine—besides, it is done by the Cardiff Railway Company.

440. Then the railway company are the receivers of the goods. Do they employ the men on the ship?—No.

441. Then you want somebody who does not employ the men to give you information?—We would rather have it from the captain, because the man who employs the labourers does not often act honestly, and that is the man we are grumbling at.

442. Is it not rather a strong order to ask that somebody who is not concerned with the employment of the men should have his records overhauled?—I will give you an illustration. I know this case well: The foreman is stevedore for the ship or for the company who has brought the pit wood over for sale, and he is also foreman for a colliery company who has to receive the same pit wood as well as to discharge it. That man has to give the bill either way. He may alter the weights against the men to his own satisfaction, which has been done.

443. Take a case of this sort. A number of men are employed on a ship discharging sugar. Those men are paid by the shipowner or by some contractor who is working out the ship. That sugar is not weighed until it gets, say, to Hammersmith. Do you suggest that the men employed on the ship should have the right to send somebody to Hammersmith to the receiver's place and see the sugar weighed. The receiver has nothing to do with the cost of discharge of the ship nor the employment of the men on the ship?—We should be satisfied with the captain's bill of lading there.

444. (Mr. Harrington.) With reference to the question of the contractor paying men short tonnage, did you find out whether he had paid the other gang extra money or not?—You see that on some of these particular cargoes you get as many as a dozen different gangs of men all paid for the one cargo, and then when you go to find these men it is impossible to tell. To-day you will get one gang and to-night you will have another gang; to-morrow you may have another, and following that you may have four more gangs, strangers, mixed up, and you have to take about 12 lists from the men to find out a ship's quantity.

445. It is customary to average out the trucks?—Yes; that is what is done. The foreman has in his possession the weights from the company every morning. If he has sent any trucks to, say, Crawshaw Brothers or Dowlais Upper Works, he gets a bill from the Rhymney Railway Company similar to what I have in my possession, or he can have it. It is a permit, as we call it, similar to this (handing the same to the Committee). From that he can check the men's weights and could from that give the men the proper weights. Instead of that he marks off 1 cwt. and so on, running up to 1 ton 4 and 2 tons 4. These waggons, according to the Board of Trade, must not run over 10 tons. Many of them are redischarged up at the top of the Rhymney because they have more weight on them than the Board of Trade will allow them to take on the line. That never gets to the men. It is transferred to other waggons and the men are not paid for that. I have a weight here, 9 tons 17 cwt., supposed to be weighed on the Rhymney weighbridge, and here it is 8 tons 5. If any of you gentlemen were ever in Cardiff you may have seen plenty of waggons on the Rhymney Railway overloaded. You could ascertain that by going on the Rhymney bridge. The men never get the tonnage at all.

446. Is there any possible chance of their being overpaid at any time?—When they are overpaid the men have it deducted the following week, "Less paid on such and such a boat." I have brought the documents with me to show you if you wish to have them.

447. (Mr. Anderson.) There is never any difficulty in getting the particulars then, is there?—None in the least.

Mr. G. H. Lock.

24 Jan. 1908.

448. (Mr. Wignall.) Is it not a fact that you have been applied to on more than one occasion when the cargo has been made up and the contractor has found that he has overpaid a gang?—Yes.

449. He has come to you with all the particulars of the cargo and all the evidence that could be obtained from the four corners of the earth, so to speak, to prove that he has overpaid, and is it not a fact that you have gone and got the money back for the contractor?—Yes. A steamship was discharged on the 22nd. It was listed to have 3,210 loads. I make it 972 standards 120 cubic feet. These men were paid 930. I have an upplication now from the stevedore to get him back 60 standards, which means about 2*s.* a man back.

450. As a matter of fact when the men have been satisfied that they were overpaid they have repaid the money?—Yes.

451. When the contractor has overpaid there is no difficulty in getting the documentary evidence is there?—None at all.

452. But when you claim for short payment you cannot get the documentary evidence, that is the point?—No. He can get the information over the telephone from the merchant, but I cannot get it in any way.

453. (Mr. Lloyd Morgan.) Did you say a short time ago, that even if the men had a right to appoint a checkweigher, you doubted whether they would do it?—I said they are not in a position at present.

454. Why?—Because trade has gone down terribly.

455. Who is to do the checkweighing?—They would be perfectly satisfied if I had the chance of seeing the company's weights.

456. That is to say they would appoint you as their checkweighman?—Yes.

457. (Mr. Sexton.) In cases where the poverty of the men will not allow the appointment of checkweighmen, the men would be perfectly satisfied that the trade union official should be appointed as checkweighman?—Yes.

458. (Mr Lloyd Morgan.) That is to say that the men should be allowed to appoint, if they like, one of the officials of the trade union to act as their checkweighman?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Frederick H. Rogers called and examined.

Mr. F. H. Rogers.

459. (Chairman.) What is your position?—District secretary of the Dock Wharf, Riverside Union, at Barry Dock.

460. How long have you held that position?—I have held that position for nine years.

461. How many men in your district are members of the union?—Close on 1,200.

462. What proportion of the work done by these men is done at tonnage rates?—About 90 per cent.

463. Have you heard complaints that men paid at tonnage rates do not receive the amount due to them?—Complaints are made, and I have gone into the matter, but we have no way of finding out the correct weights or the measurements.

464. How many complaints do you get in a year?—Really, I do not keep any account of them.

465. Are they very frequent?—Yes.

466. How frequent?—I may say that we get about two in a week, and perhaps three.

467. Do you investigate the complaints?—Yes.

468. Do you find that some of them are justified?—Yes, in some cases.

469. What are the principal cargoes that you have come to speak about?—I have not come to speak about any in particular. There is coal and pit wood.

470. What are your principal imports?—Pit wood and a few cargoes of grain.

471. Who employs the men?—The Barry Railway Company mostly with regard to the pit wood.

472. Do they contract with regard to any of the work?—Not to my knowledge.

473. Have you any information to show that the men have received short wages?—No.

474. Then what is your specific complaint?—I have no specific complaint. The only thing is that our men would like to have a check to know the amount they have discharged during the day or the week from a particular vessel.

475. You mean that they think the present system unsatisfactory?—Yes.

476. And they think that they may not get their full wages?—Yes.

477. And what do they propose should be done as a remedy?—Speaking for myself personally, I would suggest that the bill of lading be produced.

478. Would that satisfy the men?—I have no doubt it would.

479. Are there any occasions where the particular cargo is of such a nature that it would be impossible for the men to ascertain the precise weight until the merchant receives it?—Really, on that I could not answer you.

480. (Mr. Wignall.) Taking Barry Dock as a whole, that is about one of the best places in the United Kingdom?—There is no doubt about that.

Mr. F. H. Rogers.

24 Jan. 1908.

481. The conditions are better there?—Yes.

482. Largely because the Barry Dock Company are the employers of labour at the dock?—Yes.

483. And it is only when an occasional contractor comes there (and that is getting less every day) that any dissatisfaction arises at all?—Yes.

484. Since the elimination of the contractor and the Barry Company insisting on the right to do all their own work practically, the trouble has been very much reduced?—Yes.

485. Apart from the feeling of the men that there is nothing to guarantee that they have the weight, there is not very much to complain about in the Barry Dock?—No.

486. The import of timber may sometimes cause a little grumbling?—Our deals, as a rule, are charged at day-work rate.

487. If there was any serious case you think that the Barry Company would give you what documentary evidence there is in their power?—They have generally done that.

488. They are very good?—Yes.

489. And that is the general position with large companies?—Yes.

490. And it is the interloper, the man that comes in between, that causes the trouble?—Yes.

491. That is the precise position?—Yes.

492. (Mr. Scrutton.) Are you aware that all bills of lading are marked "Weight unknown"?—I really could not tell you that.

493. (Mr. Wignall.) The real reason of that is that you have seen so very few of them that you scarcely know what they are like?—Yes, that is so. We have to take it for granted.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. J. Larkin.

Mr. JAMES LARKIN (a Member of the Committee) called and examined.

494. (Chairman.) What is your official position?—At present my official position is organiser of the National Union of Dock Labourers.

495. Where are you stationed?—At present in Dublin.

496. For how long have you held that position?—For two years or thereabouts.

497. How many men in your district are members of the union?—In the Dublin district at the present time there are something like 2,500. Practically all the men in the port are in the union.

498. Can you estimate what proportion of the work done by these men is done at tonnage rates?—60 per cent.

499. Have you had complaints that men paid tonnage rates do not receive the amount due to them?—I have, sir—too many.

500. About how many complaints do you receive in the course of the year?—We have about three a night; that is, seven days a week.

501. Have you investigated these complaints?—Yes. I have some information with reference to this point.

502. Do you find that some of them are justified?—We have not had a case in point where we have been in the wrong.

503. When you found a general grievance have you brought the matter to the notice of the employers?—As a matter of fact we have had two small strikes for this particular reason.

504. What has been the result of your application to the employers?—In two cases, by the pressure of the strike, we got certain documents produced.

505. What cargoes do your men principally handle?—In the port of Dublin they handle all classes, but principally coal. The cross-channel traffic is general traffic.

506. Who are the employers of the men?—One would have some difficulty in saying. The stevedores do the bulk of the work apart from what is done by the railway company. It is nearly all stevedore work.

507. That is what I wanted to know?—The brokers may employ one stevedore or they may employ all the stevedores in turn according as the boats turn up—you really do not know unless you go to serious trouble and go to the police court. You find out who the employer is then.

508. The work is generally done by stevedores?—Yes.

509. How have you ascertained that the wages paid to the men are short?—In one case where we brought a man into court over a cargo of phosphate, Mr. Healy, M.P., was the counsel on behalf of the union. The case was tried before Mr. Swift, magistrate.

510. What is the date?—1902. Twenty men were working on this particular ship. They should have received 6*d.* per ton. The men were paid 14*s.* in all for 560 tons. Upon going into court the firm offered 27*s.* 9*d.*, = 1,154 tons. Mr. Healy refused to accept less than 28*s.* per man and all costs. That is exactly double. Then there is another case in point: There was a man who was a stevedore and also a shipbroker at the port of Dublin, and who is, at present, a shipbroker and stevedore. He was fined by the collector of customs, in the year 1901, the sum of 25*l.* for falsifying bills of lading. He paid the men 240 tons on account. On the men differing with the stevedore, he paid them another 10 tons, as they say over there, for the purpose of closing their mouths; but upon the men objecting and threatening to bring him into court, he produced sufficient money to pay another 12 tons or 262 tons in all, and the stamped bill of lading, a copy of which he had deposited in the Port Entry Office, which he had altered himself, was produced. The man, himself, actually altered the figures. We got a copy of the bill of lading and a man prepared to swear that it was altered, and that was proved. The actual weight discharged was 284 tons 4 cwts. He was fined 25*l.*, and paid the men in full. Then there is another case. An agent paid on a certain boat for 429 tons. The same men who discharged the boat loaded the following day 475 tons of wheat in sacks. The fore hatch was bulkheaded off to keep her head up. The boat took 475 tons of wheat which was tallied in by one of the men who discharged the steamer. The coals were bunker coals, she was flying light in the forward hatch. Freight was paid on the tally. The coal was not weighed out, and we had to accept their own statement.

511. I understood you to say that this boat was said to contain 429 tons of coal?—We were paid for 429 tons.

512. And it was found to total 475 tons of wheat in sacks?—Yes.

513. You draw the deduction that you were underpaid for the coal?—Yes.

514. When was this particular instance?—A fortnight ago. The man who tallied it was one of the men who actually discharged her. On another boat the agent pays 400 tons. When she is chartered the firm pays 460 tons.

515. The same kind of coal?—Yes, Yorkshire coal. Then there is another boat, on which two stevedores have been employed. The boat was discharged by one of them on the 22nd of December. She had Newcastle slack; 2,414 tons were paid for, or 2*l.* 6*s.* 11½*d.* per man, at the rate of 5½*d.* a ton for discharging. The same boat came in on the 10th of January from the same port, with the same coal, consigned to the same parties, and was unloaded by another stevedore, who paid only 2,251 tons, or 2*l.* 3*s.* per man. That is a deduction of 3*s.* 11½*d.* per man on 24 men.

516. (Mr. Anderson.) Was it possible that she was not so deep that trip?—She was drawing as much water, and she was full up to the coamings.

517. (Chairman.) Did you complain to the stevedore about this?—We complained to the stevedore, but we cannot get definite information from anybody. They have rails alongside the ship. The coal is filled into what they call grabbers, which are taken over a scale, and weighed inside the gasworks, and it is tipped then into the fire. It is actually in the fire 10 minutes after it is out of the ship. We want a check of the weight going into the gasworks. There is a right to stop a cart in the street if I sell a sack of coal. We ask the same right, or the right to get the weight by some means or other. We want to check the actual weight discharged out of the ship—never mind the bill of lading, because anybody who understands knows that it is not the weight on the bill of lading. The stevedore is only put there as a chopping-block, and we do not want to make the stevedore responsible in order that, in case of injury, the actual employer may try to get out of paying compensation. We do not want stevedores.

518. Is the stevedore not employed by the shipper?—No; he may be employed by the consignee.

519. Is he not paid so much per ton?—He is paid all right.

520. Is he paid on a tonnage rate?—On the actual freight.

521. If you saw the document on which he was paid would that be satisfactory to the men?—Quite satisfactory if we have the right to get that. When we go they simply ignore us. I have been for 18 years at this business—since I was 14 years of age—and Mr. Sexton will know that before I came into office I was superintendent of the Harrison line of Liverpool, one of the biggest in the world, and I know that this thing is done deliberately. I have been at work myself, and I speak of what I know.

522. Have you anything else to say?—I can see good grounds for great faith in a tally of grain, but if I bought I would not accept a tally.

523. With regard to grain at Dublin?—A man is put on by the stevedore to tally the cargo out. He may give the parties buying the grain correct returns, and I do not say that he does not, but he may cook the weight against the men. If they are selling 2,000 quarters of wheat we want to be paid on that 2,000 quarters. If it is not in the ship we do not want to be paid for it. We do not want money that we do not work for.

524. I take it that you do not wish to ask for anything that will impose on the employers or the merchants any tax?—Not the least. If a vessel turns out 1 per cent. short we are prepared to take 1 per cent. short. In the case of gunny bags payment is by measurement. All these gunny bags are averaged out at 9 cwt. a bale. Anyone who has practical knowledge knows that they range from 3 cwt. As a rule those we handle at Liverpool are New Orleans that go up to 16 cwt. We have to take 8 cwt. all round. With regard to minerals in Glasgow, there is no check at all. A stevedore takes the money, and he throws out, as we say, a handful of coppers to the men. The minerals are weighed over the scales, but we can never get the actual weights. A stevedore is only an exploiter of the men.

525. (Mr. Sexton.) Previously to your present position you were working both at the docks and at sea since you were about 12 years old?—Yes.

526. Therefore you have a complete knowledge of the work of the docks?—Yes.

527. When you were sent to Belfast what kind of system did you find there. First of all, how many men in Belfast to-day are members of the union?—I should say from 4,900 to 5,200. It fluctuates to a hundred or two.

528. What is the percentage of the men in the union as compared with men working at the dock?—97 per cent.

529. When you went to Belfast what system did you find there with regard to piece-work?—Simply chaos. A stevedore was employed, and he paid the men just what he pleased. There was one man paying 3½*d.* a ton to fillers for discharging coal. Another man was paying 4*d.* a ton per man. The main hatch gang were paid by the man who was paying 3½*d.* a ton, 13*s.* 11*d.*, and the man who was paying 4*d.* a ton paid 10*s.* 11*d.*

530. The same ship?—The same ship. One man was paying 3½*d.* = eight men.

531. There is more than one stevedore in one firm sometimes?—Yes, there may be three.

532. These stevedores sometimes have no capital?—Sometimes they have not enough for a week. Sometimes they have to borrow money when a ship comes up.

533. They were employed to evade legal responsibility?—Yes, and they are still kept on.

534. These men are paid by the employer direct the full amount of tonnage discharged?—Yes. A firm at Belfast was paying a man 6*d.* a ton for discharging rails or plate iron. The men were to get 5*d.* a ton. Their agent, who is still employed, was paying 3*d.* a ton for years, and told the men that the firm would not pay more. He was illegally deducting 2*d.* a ton. He was threatened with a summons and he then paid it.

535. The system which you have described generally prevailed before you went to Belfast?—Yes.

536. Were the men given any satisfaction whatever at any time before or after as to the actual amount of tonnage discharged?—No; that was the cause of the strike.

537. That was the original cause of the big dispute?—Yes.

538. They asked for the information and it was refused, and the men came out on strike?—Yes.

539. That was the general prevailing condition at Belfast at that time?—Yes.

540. The men had no protection?—No.

541. If they had asked for the information they would have got the sack?—Yes, and the men in some cases were forcibly expelled when they asked for information.

542. Going to Newry and Dundalk, what do you say?—At Newry there is a firm who employ as stevedores two illiterate men who cannot write their own name and cannot reckon up. These men avowed that they paid the money out which they received from the shipowner, and I have known a case in point where a cargo has been actually weighed bag for bag and the men have not got within 90 tons of the ship's cargo. The money was always paid in public-houses.

543. Until you stopped it?—Yes, until we stopped it.

544. Coming back to Belfast, the coal is weighed on the quay?—Yes, every ounce of it.

545. On hand scales?—Yes.

546. And a tally kept?—Yes.

547. It is sold to retailers, who go down and buy it and sell it in the town?—Yes.

548. So that there would be no difficulty, as a tally is kept, in ascertaining the exact amount, even to a cwt.?—Not the slightest.

549. Now, with regard to Dundalk?—In Dundalk we had a dispute, when the agent appeared before the Dundalk Harbour Commissioners and admitted that the men were getting certain tonnages stopped from them; it had not been done with his knowledge, but he admitted that. The stevedore was getting 17 men's money and going into a public-house and putting 13 and 14 men's money on one side and paying it out. As to the remainder, he admitted himself that he did not know where it went to.

550. It was the cause of a very big dispute in Dundalk?—Yes, it was the cause of a very big dispute. It has now been satisfactorily settled.

551. (Chairman.) Is there evidence which can be procured, corroborating what you have just said about the Dundalk case?—Yes. The Chairman of the Harbour Commissioners will give a copy and I can send the "Dundalk Democrat" to you.

552. (Mr. Sexton.) What was the average wages of dock labourers previous to your going to Belfast?—

Mr. J. Larkin.
24 Jan. 1908.

The average would work out at 17*s.* a week taking tonnage men and casual men. They work night and day at times.

553. Have you any idea of the average amount of coal passing over the quays at Belfast?—Roughly, 30,000 tons a month, that is 6,000 tons for the Corporation and the remainder for retail distribution.

554. What is the average number of men employed on the average five days a week?—Something like 1,100 men work in and out of the yards. It is better now, because we have lessened the hours.

555. Is there any difficulty now in procuring documents to show the tonnage?—No. The agreement drawn up as a result of the big strike has been modified since by the Board of Trade, but in the first agreement which I drew up, and which was signed by the stevedores and by the employers, they agreed that at any time within reason, if we applied to the offices we could get the documents, and in some cases they gave us the documents. It was always stated that bills of lading and quantity or freight bills should be shown upon application.

556. But there is no legal right?—There is no legal right. It has been refused in one or two cases since they found that out.

557. (Mr. Bellhouse.) To what extent was this agreement modified by the Board of Trade?—That clause is practically struck out altogether.

558. Was there any particular reason given?—They thought it was unnecessary, They thought that the honesty of the employers was sufficient guarantee that we would get hold of the information.

559. (Mr. Hardy.) In the case of the gunny bags, what hardship was there?—The usual system in Liverpool is daily work, but in this particular job, gunny bags discharging over ship's side into lighter going from the Harrison south docks to the north docks, it is by tonnage.

560. And a separate agreement made?—A separate agreement.

561. The men knew what they were doing, so what hardship was there?—We did not agree. We agreed to work at a halfpenny a ton per man, but afterwards they struck the average.

562. (Mr. Anderson.) To which you did not agree?—No. We did not know at first.

563. You did not know what was going on?—No, not for months, until I found the matter out when I became foreman. I worked on the job myself and then I became foreman of the job.

The witness withdrew.

SECOND DAY.

Thursday, 30th January 1908.

PRESENT:

ERNEST F. G. HATCH, Esq. (Chairman).

JAMES ANDERSON, Esq. (Amalgamated Stevedores' Labour Protection League).
GERALD BELLHOUSE, Esq. (one of His Majesty's Inspectors of Factories).
C. W. GORDON, Esq. (Gordon Steam Shipping Company).
THOMAS HARDY, Esq. (Manager of the London and India Docks Company).
JAMES HARRINGTON, Esq. (London Master Stevedores' Association).
JAMES LARKIN, Esq. (National Union of Dock Labourers).
J. C. MEAD, Esq. (of Messrs. Mead, Son, and Hussey, Shipowners).
H. ORBELL, Esq. (Dock, Wharf, Riverside, and General Workers' Union).
J. HERBERT SCRUTTON, Esq. (of Messrs, Scrutton, Sons, and Company, Shipowners).
JAMES SEXTON, Esq, (National Union of Dock Labourers).
JAMES WIGNALL, Esq. (Dock, Wharves, &c., &c., Union).

Mr. PATRICK CUMMINS called and examined.

Mr. P. Cummins.
30 Jan. 1908.

564. (Chairman.) What is your position?—Dock labourer; working at the docks in Belfast.

565. Do you belong to any association?—Yes; I belong to the Dock Labourers' Union.

566. Are you an official of that union?—No. I am a member of the committee, and have been for some time.

567. Can you tell me how many men in your district are members of the union?—We have been over 5,000 strong.

568. Are they all employed in dock labour?—Yes; all in some department—the general cargo or coal department.

569. What proportion of the work done by these men is done at tonnage rates?—The coal trade is the only work done by tonnage, except when they load iron ore there.

570. What proportion of the 5,000 men you told us about are employed at tonnage rates?—I dare say there might be close on 2,000 employed in the coal department, I could not say exactly.

571. Have you heard complaints that men paid tonnage rates do not receive the amount due to them?—I have.

572. About how many complaints have you heard, on an average, in a year?—I have had many myself. I have not taken a note of them exactly, but I have notes here of a portion that I remember.

573. A considerable number?—A considerable number.

574. Are the men usually employed by stevedores?—A large number in the case of small merchants that cannot afford to keep a weekly staff. A big merchant keeps a weekly staff and employs the men on the weekly wage system. The smaller merchants that cannot afford to do that give the work to the stevedore, and it is done at tonnage rate.

575. The stevedores are employed by the merchant?—Yes.

576. Will you tell the Committee the circumstances of one or two cases where you have found a genuine grievance. First of all will you give me the date?—I can give you the year, but there have been many cases, and I have not taken particular note of the date. I am cognisant of so much of it, and I am so used to it, and the men in the port are so used to that kind of thing that it is impossible to give any particular dates. It is an everyday grievance the year round, day in and day out. I took a note of these particular cases so that I should have them ready when I came before the Committee, for there is so much of that sort of thing that I cannot remember it all when I am asked the question. In 1893 I was one of a gang discharging a ship which we had been in the habit of discharging for about two years previous, about three times in a fortnight. She carried gas coal for the gasworks. Our men that did her on this occasion were in the habit of discharging her all this time. This vessel carried 520 tons. That was her carrying capacity, and that is what they usually paid on for carrying to the gasworks. The manager, on this occasion, paid us 420 tons. We protested, but took it as part payment. It was on a Saturday night at midnight. We had no remedy on a Saturday at midnight, and we would not be doing very well to be going home without some money in our pockets for Sunday. I was president at that time of the branch of the Dock Labourers' Union. I was working amongst a gang of union men. I instructed our delegate on Monday morning to ask for the bill of lading. The manager stated that he had paid us correctly. The coals are all weighed, every pound, as it goes into the gasworks. It is weighed over the bridge, so we knew well what the vessel carried. Three days afterwards, our delegate, calling two or three times, saw the head of the firm and stated his case, and when the firm saw that it was likely to lead on to a law case which it was sure to do, he caused the bill of lading to be produced. It was then found, when the bill of lading was produced, that we were paid 100 tons short, and we got the money.

577. That was in 1893?—That was in 1893.

578. Cannot you give us more recent cases than that?—I am going to give you some.

579. I do not want too many. I do not want to take evidence of what happened 15 years ago?—That was one case, and I want to show you the difference and how we stood when we had the union. We gained this point.

580. What date do you refer to now?—This is about two years ago.

581. (Mr. Gordon.) What is the exact date?—I cannot tell you. I did not take note of it, but I will give as near as I can the time.

582. (Chairman.) I take it that you have the exact date?—I have not, but it is about two years ago—the case that I am going to give you now.

583. But we shall want something more precise than the recollection of a case. Cannot you give us the exact date?—I could not. It is impossible for me. I did not take any note. If I had been aware that you would require the exact date I might have taken means to find it out. When I get back I can forward the date. I will keep as near to it as possible.

584. But that will not do?—I do not want to put you in a false position, and I do not want to put myself in a false position.

585. (Mr. Orbell.) Can you give us the month?—I cannot.

586. (Chairman.) Have you any cases where you can give us the dates?—I cannot; it is impossible for me, because it is a thing that is so usual an occurrence that we have never taken any particular note.

587. Have you had any cases in the last three months?—No. We have cause for grievance every day in the week and every day in the month, but we have no remedy.

588. (Mr. Gordon.) What is the grievance?—The grievance is that they will not produce a bill of lading, and it is not safe for a workman to look for it or enquire for it. If he does, he is not required.

589. (Chairman.) Do I understand that the grievance that the men are not paid their full tonnage rates is general amongst your workmen who are paid by tonnage rates?—Quite so; that is quite correct.

590. Have those grievances been on the increase or decrease since 1893—since the case you mentioned to us?—Since that time the men, as I have already, I believe, stated, are in such a position that it is more than their employment is worth to seek or look for a bill of lading, and they have never attempted it. When any man had the nerve or the courage to look for his weight he was victimised immediately afterwards. The only satisfaction he could get was that they fetched out a slip of common paper on which was written such a ship so many tons. That was all the satisfaction he got. He had to take their word for it.

591. Would you say that last year, 1907, there were more grievances than in 1906?—I would not say that, because in 1907 the union was got up.

592. How often do you have grievances now?—Our grievances really existed all the time, as I have already stated. There is no such thing as a bill of lading produced, and we are not paid on the bill of lading.

593. The men are not satisfied?—The men are not satisfied, certainly not, and they dare not seek for the bill of lading.

594. (Mr. Sexton.) What were the average earnings of the tonnage piece-work men on coal in 1906. What would they earn in a week?—If trade was good they would average 30*s.*

595. At how much a ton?—At a halfpenny per ton per man.

596. How did that compare with 1893?—1893 was something similar. We were working under the same conditions.

597. I am not going back as far back as 1893, but I will bring you to the commencement of 1907. Do you remember the commencement of Kelly's dispute on the coal quay?—I do. Their men were weekly men. They were not not working by the ton for that firm.

598. I know, but you remember Kelly's dispute?—Yes I do.

599. Were any of the disputes that occurred about that period after Kelly's dispute, owing to the fact that the men were paid short?—Decidedly.

600. Can you give us any specific case in that particular period?—Yes, I believe I can.

601. This was May, 1907?—I just happen to have 1907. I mind it well without taking the date. There was a man who was a sort of sub-stevedore; he got the discharge of a steamboat that carries 600 tons. I happen to have discharged her many times myself, and I know a fair lot about her. The men were paid 490 tons. When they threatened law proceedings they got another 50 tons. That would be 540 tons. They were still 60 tons behind.

602. That is what they alleged, that they were 60 tons behind?—That they were 60 tons behind. That is one case.

603. That was the cause of a dispute too, was it not?—Yes. I can also tell you something else. You see the contractor who employed this sub-stevedore has a staff of weekly men on a weekly wage, but sometimes he is overpowered by the amount of trade he has, and has to give some of it away at a tonnage rate, and it is I and men like me who follow that business.

604. Since you have commenced this agitation and demand for the production of what you call bills of lading, have the employers made any attempt to abolish the tonnage system and to compel you to adopt the weekly system?—In every case where they can get at it.

605. In every case where you have threatened to take action?—Yes.

Mr. P. Cummins.

30 Jan. 1908.

606. And that is generally the policy of the employer now?—That is generally the way in which the trade acts towards us.

607. You have been on the quay for over 20 years, have you not?—For over 30.

608. And you have worked at nothing else or, at any rate, very little else but coal on tonnage?—I have been in the business on nothing else but tonnage all that time. I have been in the capacity of workman and the capacity of boss a portion of that time.

609. You have said already that when men asked for what they considered their rights they were boycotted?—Decidedly.

610. Have you known of any cases lately?—I was going to tell you that that sub-stevedore and the eight men were told after that that they need not call there, and they never got another job in the same firm, and I can give other cases.

611. That case is quite enough?—To put it roughly, it is necessary for a fellow to have a strong nerve to look after his rights. If he does it secretly he may be found out. He has to do it straight and square and above board, and if he does it he is not wanted any more.

612. (Mr. Scrutton.) You mentioned one firm. Have you complaints against any other firm?—I could give complaints, but you want to be concise on the matter. You want real genuine evidence, but I know, personally, that what I say is the case, for I, myself, on many occasions, have had the courage to look for my rights and my fellow workmen's rights, and claim a bill of lading from employers. I have a case here, if I might read it to you, that it will be worth your while to listen to. I will not keep you many seconds.

613. That is not an answer to the question. Have you complaints against other employers than the one mentioned?—Yes, certainly.

614. Do you suggest that this system of short paying to men is general among all the employers?—Yes, I do. To give you further information, as you are on that question, I work with a stevedore at the present time in Belfast. I have had occasion many times to ask him with regard to tonnage rates. I said to him only last week: "Do you really see a bill of lading "when you are paid by these offices yourself?" "No," he said, "I never see a bill of lading." "How do you settle your accounts?" I said. He said: "I take what "I get and say nothing. If I did not I should not get "the work again from that office." That is the answer I got from him.

615. Is that general?—Yes, it is general. It could not be any generaler without putting us underneath.

616. (Mr. Hardy.) You spoke of day wage instead of tonnage rate. Do the men object to day pay and prefer piece-work?—There was a class of men that happened to think that tonnage would not suit them, and they put them on the weekly wage system. They have a very curious way of working down there.

617. Would not that get over the difficulty. There would be no cheating then?—They would be doubly and trebly cheated then—if you understood it as I do, you would know that where they should be getting about 50*s.* they would be getting about 25*s.*

618. Do you mean that with all this cheating a man earns double as much as he would by day-work?—If you get anything at all to speak of for your labour it is by piece-work, not by day-work.

619. (Mr. Orbell.) I suppose you mean to say that when the men are changed from piece-work to day-work they have to go on at piece-work speed for day-work pay, which is generally about half the amount of what they would earn for shipping the same number of tons of coals?—That is really it.

620. That is the objection that the men have?—That is just what it means.

621. (Mr. Bellhouse.) What remedy do you suggest? Do you suggest, as a remedy, the production of the bill of lading?—Yes, that is one thing that is very necessary. I may tell you that there is such a thing as three bills of lading coming with every ship. I have a case noted down here. There was a contract with the Union, Belfast. It is let out in contracts every year. Some merchants obtain the Scotch portion and others the English. The master of the work is supposed to see the bill of lading before the ship is discharged. The master took it on himself on this occasion to ask for the bill of lading. The captain gave him his bill of lading. When the agent, or the merchant, or somebody came in the morning and heard of this, he sent for the man and said: "How is it you got "from the captain the bill of lading and gave it to "Mr. ——"? "He asked me to do so." He said: "I am going to tell you I think of dismissing you for "doing it. You have done it without my instructions. "That might have been the wrong bill of lading that "you gave that man." The man that gave me that information was a boss, and he says: "I have known "bills of lading given by the captain, and there were "60 tons more in the ship than what the captain's bill "of lading specified."

622. (Chairman.) That would be absolute fraud?—Well, fraud or whatever you like to call it. That is his statement. He says he is prepared to swear it.

623. (Mr. Bellhouse.) Is it the custom in Belfast to pay the stevedore on the bill of lading or the actual freight?—That should be the case, but I have already stated that I asked the stevedore did he really get paid himself on the bill of lading when I challenged him on the amount of tonnage we were getting paid for, and he said he could not pay us on other than what he got himself.

624. It is suggested to us and it is a fact that the bill of lading is not an accurate account of what there is on the ship. Can you suggest anything else besides the bill of lading which could be produced to the workers as evidence of what there is to be unloaded?—No, excepting where the coals can be weighed after they leave the ship, as in the case of the gasworks. You can obtain the weight there.

625. By a checkweighman?—It is not in every case. The coals are put into yards.

626. (Mr. Sexton.) They are weighed out in bags?—Yes, I know that, but there might be two or three different cargoes in one pile.

627. (Mr. Hardy.) How do you suggest that the men can be satisfied about that?—It is very difficult for me to make a suggestion. I can see nothing except to put the employers in a position of having to produce the document in connection with the cargo.

628. What document—the bill of lading?—The bill of lading.

629. You are a practical man. Tell us how you suggest that the men can be satisfied that they are being fairly paid?—The remedy is to make them produce the document with the original weight that the ship has taken in. That is the only remedy I know of. How you can do that is the question.

630. (Mr. Scrutton.) The men would be quite satisfied if they received payment on the same weight that the shipowner receives payment on in respect of his freight?—Yes.

631. (Mr. Mead.) With regard to this dispute that you mentioned with a firm in 1893, was that a firm of merchants?—Yes, coal merchants.

632. Are they shipowners as well?—Yes.

633. There was a dispute about a vessel which, as a rule, carried 520 tons?—Yes.

634. On what do you base her carrying capacity as being 520?—She was taken to the gasworks for about two years, and we were in the habit of discharging her.

635. Did she always turn out 520?—It might be 10 or 15 more or less. There may be a waggon or two over at one time, and a waggon or two less the next. On an average it is 520 tons.

636. You base it on your own personal working?—Yes.

637. You stated that the manager paid you on this occasion?—Yes.

638. Was he the man who was in the habit of paying you?—I have already stated, and I say it again, that we only do a little work for this firm. It is only when they cannot overtake their work that they take on the likes of us. The man who paid us was the manager in their employ.

639. Had you ever worked for that man before?—No.

640. He might not have known at the time when he paid you late on Saturday night what the ship had on board her?—He said that that was all he would pay on the ship when he was paying extra men.

641. Was anything put into writing when you threatened proceedings? — I did not threaten proceedings. I said that we would take it as part payment.

642. You waited on them several times afterwards?—The delegate did.

643. Everything was done by word of mouth?—Yes.

644. What did they ultimately pay you on?—On 520 tons.

645. On what you say the ship ought to have carried?—Yes.

646. Was any record kept of the increased weight they paid you on? You spoke of a slip of paper?—I have no slip.

647. There is no record that they increased the payment to 520 tons?—No, there is no record. I have only kept it in my memory.

648. There is no record that they paid you 100 tons more?—No.

649. You are making this statement that a certain thing took place. You were one of the men who were the recipients. Was no slip given to you on the 420, and no increase slip given when the 520 was paid?—Nothing at all. You have to take the word of mouth of these gentlemen when you are paid.

650. You have stated already that a slip is given?—I said, in some cases. When you inquire for the tonnage of a particular vessel, in two or three days they will produce a slip of paper and say: "That is the weight on such a boat."

651. That is not an answer to my question?—With regard to what you ask about, there is no record that I am aware of.

652. Did you ever ask for a slip when they paid you on 420?—No.

653. Did you ever ask for a slip when they paid you on 520?—I did not.

654. You did not in either case ask for any document to show you why they paid you a certain weight?—I certainly never did.

655. With regard to your story about "the wrong bill of lading," do you know how many bills of lading are signed as a rule for a steamer?—No, I do not.

656. Then you are not aware that there are certain bills of lading, one of which may come by the steamer, and others which may come by post to the merchant or consignees?—I am informed of that.

657. Do you know that of your own personal knowledge?—No, I do not, only by that statement.

658. Are you aware of the fact that whilst the particulars on the body of a bill of lading, which is intended for the captain, would be precisely the same as on that intended for the consignee, there would still be a different bill of lading. Do you know the difference between a merchant's copy and the captain's copy?—I cannot say that I know; but I suppose the captain gets the original and the merchant gets another.

659. I want to know whether you understand that there are various bills of lading in existence?—I have already stated that I cannot make the statement personally.

660. You said that the remark made was that the wrong bill of lading had been given. It is perfectly feasible that a wrong bill of lading was given because it was intended for the merchant?—I think you misunderstand me.

661. (Mr. Gordon.) Do you know anything about bills of lading?—I would know a bill of lading when I saw it.

662. Do you know enough about the purport of a bill of lading or the practice in connection with bills of lading?—What do you mean by "the practice"?

663. The practice as between the merchant and the shipper or as between the receiver of the goods and the shipowner?—No, I do not.

664. (Mr. Sexton.) You know that you have not been paid what you have earned?—That is it.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Thomas Hutchcroft called and examined.

665. (Chairman.) Where do you come from?—Goole.

666. Are you an officer of the trade union?—Yes, at the present time.

667. What position do you hold?—Branch secretary.

668. How long have you held that position?—About a year and nine months.

669. How many men in your district are members of the union?—380 at the present time.

670. Are these men employed in dock labour?—Yes.

671. Can you tell what proportion of them are paid by tonnage rates?—About 75 per cent.

672. Have you heard complaints that the men who are paid tonnage rates do not receive the amount due to them?—Many complaints.

673. About how many complaints do you receive in a year?—As a rule we have an average of one or two a week.

674. Have you investigated these complaints?—I have.

675. Do you find that some of them are justified?—Yes.

676. What are the principal cargoes handled by your men at tonnage rates?—Coal chiefly, copper ore, hog ore, iron ore, and pitch.

677. Do grievances arise in respect of all these cargoes?—No.

678. Which of them?—Coal chiefly.

679. Are there no grievances with regard to the ores that you handle?—With regard to the ores the cargoes are always weighed out in our port by a weighman. They are put on to the scale as soon as they are lifted out of the hold and weighed, and then tipped into a lighter over the side. It is the same with pitch.

680. Are the men satisfied with that system?—Yes.

681. They have no complaints at all to make?—They have no complaints to make when it is weighed.

682. Do they ask for a checkweighman?—Yes. The weighman is one of the gang and he has the weight first hand.

683. Do the men check the weighing themselves?—Yes, the weighman does.

684. Does the weighman act on behalf of the workmen?—Yes. He is one of the workmen, but he is paid by the owners of the cargo. He is paid by the merchant to weigh, but still he is one of the stevedore's men.

685. (Mr. Sexton.) He returns the weight to the employer and gives it to the men at the same time voluntarily?—Yes.

686. (Chairman.) The grievance is entirely confined to coal?—Yes.

687. What is the precise grievance the men have?—The precise grievance the men have is that we have no system at all of ascertaining the tonnage work. We have no possible way of getting the weight.

Mr. T. Hutchcroft.

30 Jan. 1908.

688. Are the men usually employed by stevedores?—Yes.

689. By whom are the stevedores employed?—By the shipowner or his agent.

690. Can you give the Committee the circumstances of one or two cases where you have found a genuine grievance?—Yes.

691. Can you give me the date and full authentic particulars?—No.

692. I do not think that the Committee under these circumstances would care to hear the cases that you have. You say that to your knowledge the men have a general grievance?—Yes.

693. (Mr. Sexton.) Can you give any instance where money has been recovered on short tonnage?—Yes, I can.

694. And can you tell us how many men were affected?—Yes.

695. Give us that, then?—In connection with one particular gang there were six men employed by the stevedore.

696. (Chairman.) When?—About 18 months ago. The general rule is for a stevedore to get a note out of the shipowner's or his agent's office, as the case might be, with the amount of tonnage. It has been this particular stevedore's practice to take a copy of that official note and make a lead-pencil scribbling note of it to show it to the men so that he had not to show the proper note. In this particular case that comes to my mind, when the money was paid out they thought there was something wrong and that they ought to have had more than was paid to them; they made a noise about it and grumbled, and he said that that was all he had been able to recover and that was all they were entitled to. One man, a little bit more prominent than the rest, said, "Why not show us the proper note?" and he would not produce it. He said that if there was going to be any grumbling about it he would clear them all out and have a fresh gang.

697. Do you mean by the "proper note" the note that the stevedore received from the people who employed him?—Yes; and he would not show the proper note, and he has never done it to this day. However, he discharged the gang on the Saturday and got a fresh gang on the Monday; and after he had put the fresh gang on the men brought the grievance to the union office and we threatened proceedings, with the result that these men were paid 5*s.* a piece extra on the following Monday after the men had been discharged.

698. (Mr. Sexton.) And that did not satisfy them?—That did not satisfy them. They were entitled to 7*s.* 6*d.*

699. (Chairman.) Have you any particulars of that case?—No, I have not.

700. Can you get them?—I do not know whether I can or not. It is about 18 months ago. I do not think I could.

701. Have you had any similar cases since?—Not to the extent of this one. We have had several cases similar. We have never been able to get at the root of the thing because we have no system of checking.

702. Have you recovered money in cases similar to that of which you have just told us?—Yes, in two or three instances, but we have not had so much trouble to get it, and it has not resulted in the discharge of the men.

703. The grievance of the men is, I take it, that they have no legal right to insist on seeing the documents on which the stevedores are paid?—Yes, that is the whole case.

704. (Mr. Wignall.) With regard to those men who insisted on seeing the documents and recovered 5*s.*, did the men who recovered the 5*s.* ever recover their job?—No, not to this day.

705. They lost it entirely?—Yes.

706. They have never had any more employment from this man?—No.

707. Because they demanded the money that was due to them the gang was disbanded, and was thrown out into the cold?—Yes.

708. There is nothing in existence in your district to give the men the right to demand the production of any proof that they are getting the right payment?—Nothing whatever.

709. Even if they are getting the correct tonnage rates the men cannot be satisfied that they are getting them?—Yes.

710. That is the position?—Yes.

711. (Mr. Sexton.) The man employed to weigh the iron ore first gives the weight to the employer?—Yes.

712. Then when the men ask him, as a matter of courtesy, not of right, he gives them a copy of what purports to be the right figure?—Yes.

713. Have they any knowledge as to whether it is correct?—No.

714. They have only his word for it?—Yes.

715. (Mr. Gordon.) That the weight he gives them is the same as he gives to the employer?—Yes.

716. Who were the men who had the dispute to which you referred? Were they at the hoist or were they coal trimmers or what?—Coal trimmers.

717. What size steamer was she?—About 1,000 tons, I should think.

718. Have they not a fixed sum within a few shillings for such boats?—It depends on the state of the tide; that is the difficulty in our ports. If it is a neap tide she can only take half. The following week on a spring tide she can take a full cargo away. She has to load to a certain draught, 14 or 15 feet, as the tide will allow. There are scarcely two voyages alike.

719. Are there no tickets on the trucks?—On some of them there are and on some there are not.

720. Do the coals pass over any weighbridge?—No.

721. They simply have the colliery weights?—Simply the colliery weights.

722. Did you apply to the shipowner or his agent for the weight?—No.

723. (Mr. Mead.) I believe it is the custom in Goole to load coal in two ways, is it not?—Yes.

724. What are the ways?—One is rail-borne coal and the other canal-borne.

725. What we call "compartments"?—Yes.

726. Of which system do you have most complaints?—The railway system.

727. Are there any complaints at all with the compartment system?—We have not had any yet.

728. And that system has been in vogue for a considerable time?—Yes.

729. We can dismiss that altogether. With the compartment system you are satisfied?—We should like a better production than we have.

730. But I want to know have you any grievances with regard to compartment loading?—Yes, I think we have a legitimate grievance.

731. Can you cite a case of a compartment grievance?—No, I cannot.

732. With regard to railway weights, do you know at all what the system is that is employed at Goole?—Yes.

733. What is it?—All the coal is weighed at the pit as it is put into the waggons, and the colliery company advises their agent at the port of shipment of the numbers and the corresponding weight in each waggon. The consignment is sent to Goole and tipped on board the ship. The waggon numbers are taken by the man in charge for the railway company. The colliery agent knows the weight. The shipowner gets the weight shipped on board that ship from the colliery agent.

734. When they know how many trucks the ship has taken they "compile" the cargo as it is called?—Yes, and the shipowner is advised. Where the waggon is labelled the labels are taken off and taken to the colliery agent's office, and used as a check against the pit weight, but in some cases the waggons are not labelled at all.

735. Do most of the steamship owners in Goole employ stevedores, or do any of them do their own work?—The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway do their own work, but all the others employ stevedores.

736. You are the branch secretary at Goole. When you have had grievances mentioned to you, have you kept any record of those grievances?—No.

737. You keep no record of the complaints made to you at all as a secretary?—We have not in the past with regard to this particular business.

738. You have no record of the grievances which you say exist?—No, only memory.

739. (Mr. Sexton.) When you get a complaint you at once investigate it personally?—Yes.

740. (Mr. Orbell.) I suppose if a case was reported at your branch meeting, it would come forward in the ordinary minutes?—Yes.

741. Is it a fact that most of these complaints are lodged probably in the street or when you are round the dock?—Always in the street.

742. If it did come to the branch, there would be a record in the minutes?—Yes.

743. (Mr. Hardy.) The grievance at Goole, I understand, is confined to coal loading?—No.

744. You said so?—No, not confined to coal loading, but chiefly in connection with coal loading. There is a very big grievance in connection with tonnage work.

745. How does the stevedore get his information, do you know? He is paid by the ton, I suppose, when the loading is done?—It is bad to tell how the stevedore is paid.

746. Bad to tell because you do not know, or because it is too bad to tell?—I do know, if I might explain. One stevedore will be paid perhaps 5*s.* a week out of the particular firm's office that he is stevedore for, and the rest of the wage comes out of commission from the men that he employs. Some will give a good commission and some will give a bad commission. Another stevedore might be paid 10*s.* a week for looking after the employer's interest, and the rest would come out of the men's wages. Some will give 5 per cent., and some 7, and some 10.

747. (Chairman.) Do the men pay the stevedore a portion of what they receive themselves?—Yes.

748. (Mr. Hardy.) The stevedore pays the men?—The stevedore pays the men, but there is a deduction made from the lump sum.

749. By whom is the stevedore paid?—By the shipowner or his agent.

750. He gets something from the men, but he is paid by the shipowner?—Yes.

751. And he is paid by a tonnage rate, I take it?—Yes.

752. Would you be satisfied with the evidence that the stevedore has of the tonnage?—No.

753. From whom do you want to get the evidence?—I would not take the stevedore's evidence. Mr. T. Hutcheroft. 30 Jan. 1908.

754. Do you want to make it penal upon the shipowner, who has nothing to do with the men, that he should supply the men with information?—Yes, clear of the stevedore altogether.

755. You want to get behind the stevedore?—Yes.

756. (Mr. Sexton.) The shipowner employs the stevedore?—The shipowner or his agent.

757. Or the consignee?—No, the shipowner or his agent.

758. Then he insists as a condition of employment that the men shall pay him more than half of his wages?—Yes.

759. (Mr. Hardy.) I want to know who is the man to be hit, that is the point. Coals are not weighed at the ship's side, I understand; they are weighed at the colliery?—Yes. There is no coal weighed at the port of shipment at all.

760. Who has the colliery weights?—The colliery agent.

761. Do you suggest that he should be obliged to show the weights?—Yes.

762. He has nothing to do with the men?—He has nothing at all to do with the men.

763. (Chairman.) You do not mean to suggest that people who have nothing to do with the employment of the men should be made to show documents to them?—I should, if necessary.

764. (Mr. Scrutton.) Supposing that the stevedore produced a certificate from these people, it would be satisfactory?—Yes, if it was properly signed.

765. (Mr. Orbell.) Your objection to taking the stevedore's word is because, to take the case of those six men, for instance, a false note may be shown. That is, you do not see an authentic document?—It is possible, in my opinion, for the stevedore to be in league with the shipowner or his agent as a paid servant.

766. Dropping the shipowner for a moment, you do know of cases where the stevedore has produced, in your opinion, an improper note?—Yes.

767. For instance, you stated, "He showed us a "note and we said we wanted to see the proper note"?—Yes.

768. Because you thought that the money he had paid you was short?—Yes.

769. (Mr. Hardy.) You want the stevedore to show you the information which he has and from which he makes up his charge?—Yes.

770. (Mr. Orbell.) That is what you mean. You do not mean to say that you want to run into the shipowner's office and to hold him responsible over the stevedore's head, providing you can get some amount of guarantee that what you receive from the stevedore is really the proper account?—That is what we require—a properly signed account and a declaration that it is correct.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Samuel Fisher called and examined. Mr. S. Fisher.

771. (Chairman.) What is your official position?—I am general secretary to the Cardiff, Penarth and Barry Coal Trimmers and Tippers Union.

772. For how long have you held that position?—For 21 years.

773. How many men in your district are members of the union?—About 1,300.

774. Are they all employed in dock labour?—They are employed in the tipping and trimming of coal and coke.

775. What proportion of them are paid by tonnage rates?—The whole of them.

776. Have you heard complaints that the men paid tonnage rates do not receive the amount due to them?—No. In our district there is no difficulty at all, that I know of, concerning the weights.

777. The principal cargoes handled by your men, I understand, are coal?—Yes, coal and coke.

778. Who employs the men?—The coal shipper, the colliery proprietor or the freighter.

779. Does the colliery proprietor ever let the contract out to stevedores?—Only to this extent—that the colliery proprietor or several of them might engage the same foreman, as we call them. We do not call them stevedores. One foreman might act as a sort of contractor and do work for half a dozen or more firms. Only to that extent is the work let out.

Mr. S. Fisher.

30 Jan. 1908.

780. Do the firms submit a statement of the weights to the men?—The foreman of each gang would get the total amount shipped.

781. Would he get a statement in such a form that the men would be satisfied?—Yes. He would get a correct statement from the ship. The ship weight would be given to the foreman, and the foreman would have a list of the boats or vessels loaded during the week with the tonnage shipped into each, and that would be put on the table when the men were being paid, so that all the men could see the list of steamers they had worked on or vessels, and the weight carried in each.

782. Then I take it that there is no possibility of your men having a grievance, because they can see precisely what they had handled?—I do not see very well how a grievance could crop up. I would like to explain, if you please, that the coal is put over machines. The colliery weight to start with is given to each office, and then the coal is weighed over machines at each tip.

783. Where?—At the docks. There are weighing machines for each tip. There are two weighing machines (there used to be one only) at each tip. There may be a few still with only one, but there are not many anyhow. The full waggon is weighed and run on to the tip. Then the coal is discharged into the shoot and from the shoot into the vessel. Then the empty waggon is run back over the empty road and over a machine, and the empty waggon is weighed so that they do not go absolutely by the tare painted on the waggon; but they re-weigh each waggon as it has been discharged, so that they get an accurate weight of the coal shipped.

784. You say that the coal is weighed at the colliery, and also weighed just before it is tipped into the ship?—Yes.

785. Do you find any difference between those two weighings?—Yes, they vary.

786. What is the percentage of difference between the two weighings?—I do not think I am in a position to say.

787. Can you give us an average?—I am afraid I am not in a position to.

788. (Mr. Hardy.) The weight would be less on shipment than at the colliery?—Yes, I think so, because there would be wastage coming down the line. The bumping would shake lumps off and that sort of thing. I am in a position to say, although I could not prove it, that in some cases the weight is more. It varies.

789. (Chairman.) How could it be more?—The machines vary a little, and the colliery machine would not be so accurate perhaps.

790. Would the weight be more because of the absorption of moisture?—Yes. For instance, if it came out of a pit on a dry day and then it rained heavily, coming down from the colliery to the dock the weight would increase considerably.

791. It could not be more if it is weighed properly at the colliery than it is when it is tipped into the ship unless the weight is increased by absorption?—No. We have found very often that the machine at the colliery perhaps is not so well looked after as the machine at the dock.

792. (Mr. Wignall.) Your work is exclusively confined to the shipping of coal at Cardiff, Penarth, and Barry?—Yes.

793. Your union does not extend to any other operations outside coal and coke shipping?—No; it is only coal and coke shipping.

794. There is a weigher appointed at the tips to weigh all the coal before it is tipped into the ship?—Yes. The dock people employ the weigher.

795. Where do you get a copy of the weight from?—From the weigher, or from the dock people really.

796. And you have no difficulty in obtaining that copy?—No, absolutely none.

797. It is given to you as a favour, although you have never been refused a copy of the weights?—I do not know that it is a favour. I think it is a right that the men in the district possess to have the weights.

798. (Chairman.) Custom, I suppose?—Custom at any rate.

799. (Mr. Wignall.) The dock companies do funny things sometimes. Supposing they issued instructions that on and from next Monday the weights were not to be handed out to anybody, but were to be kept in their office, they would have a legal right to do so, would they not?—Yes, I think so.

800. If they did issue that instruction, you would have no right to demand from the weigher who was there for the company, and who was paid by them, a copy of the weights?—No; that is so.

801. Up to now they give you the weights without any difficulty, and the men are satisfied with the weight they obtain?—Yes, that is right.

802. Though the copy of the weight is given, it is given by a party who does not employ them, who does not pay them, and who has no right of control over them?—Yes.

803. (Mr. Hardy.) Are not the trimmers employed by the dock company?—No. I said just now that they are employed by the colliery proprietors and the freighters.

804. To whom does the dock company give the weights—to the men employed by the dock company or to other men?—The men employed by the dock company have the weights. The weigher and his gang belong to the dock company and nobody can keep the information from them. They have it.

805. Are they paid by the piece, too?—Yes, they are paid tonnage rate, too.

806. Then I understand the dock company's men to have the weight in the first instance?—Yes.

807. Do those men give to the other men on the ship, or does the dock company independently give it to those men, or does the weigher give it?—The weigher makes out the total quantity and hands it to the trimming foreman.

808. (Mr. Wignall.) I want to make it clear that trimmers are not employed by the dock company at all?—No.

809. And the dock company has no control over the trimmers?—That is so.

810. They are employed entirely by what you may call a middleman, if you like, outside of the dock company's interest altogether?—Yes.

811. The dock company will employ and pay the weigher, the hoist men, and the tippers, and all the men employed on and about the dock?—Yes.

812. The trimmer is the man that goes into the hold to trim the coal on the ship or to level it out in the hold of the ship?—Yes.

813. These are employed by the foreman who represents some office in the district?—Yes.

814. The dock company does not pay any compensation when accidents occur. The trimmers are employed by the colliery owners?—Yes, by the owners of the coal, the colliery proprietor, or a middleman who contracts for large quantities of coal.

815. (Chairman.) How is the contractor paid?—So much per ton.

816. (Mr. Wignall.) There is a tariff?—We have a tariff.

817. (Chairman.) Where does he get the particulars from upon which he is paid?—From the weighing machine.

818. (Mr. Hardy.) I understand that at Barry and the South Wales ports there is no difficulty; it all works very well?—As far as the society I represent is concerned we have no grievance.

819. The men on the ship get information from the dock company, although they are not in the employ of the dock company?—Yes. There is no difficulty.

820. (Mr. Wignall.) I want the Committee to go away with the fixed idea in their minds that these trimmers are not in the employ of the dock company, and they are not in the employ of the shippers. They are in the employ of the middleman, and they get a copy of their weights from the dock company's employé, who is there for that purpose?—Yes.

821. If it was not for that document being available at any time to you or your men, you would be largely at the mercy of the middleman with regard to the exact tonnage?—Yes.

822. As a matter of fact, you have never had any difficulty up to the present time?—I can appreciate Mr. Wignall's position very well. He is supposing a condition of things something like this—that for some reason or other the dock authorities issue a notice to their weighers forbidding them to give any information at all as to the quantity shipped into any vessel, and that they also raise other difficulties so that the men then would not know how much coal had been shipped into any particular vessel. If they were working for a contractor such as I spoke of just now, he might be making money out of them; he would not be employed directly by one colliery proprietor and paid by that colliery proprietor; he would be a sort of contractor getting work from where he could. It would then be to his advantage to hoodwink the men and to say that only a certain quantity had been shipped when a greater quantity had been shipped. Then he would be making money.

823. (Chairman.) I understand that the dock company give the particulars to the men as a matter of grace?—Yes.

824. Not as a matter of right?—No, not as a matter of right.

825. The contractor is paid on the weight which the dock company send to the colliery proprietor as their charge for handling the coal?—Yes.

826. So that the men would be satisfied if they saw an authentic statement issued by the colliery proprietor to the contractor as to the amount of weight that the men had really handled?—The men would be satisfied with that.

827. The proper way of dealing with the matter by legislation would be to require the colliery proprietor to provide the contractor with a signed statement which the men could see?—Yes.

828. (Mr. Wignall.) In your experience have you ever had a case where men have complained that they thought that they had not the full amount of tonnage?—Yes.

829. And you have had to resort to the weighman's sheet?—Yes.

830. That has been not an isolated case, but often occurring?—Yes, more or less frequently. We have gang men, preference men, and hobblers. The hobbler is a casual man. He may not be satisfied with the weight that has been supplied to him, and he has come to me as the secretary, and I have gone and secured the correct tonnage and handed it to him.

831. You have never had any difficulty in getting access to the weighman's sheet?—No, I have not found any difficulty.

832. And that has always given satisfaction?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Henry Seer called and examined.

833. (Chairman.) What is your official capacity?—I am secretary to the Dockers' Union at Newport.

834. For how long have you held that position?—For 17 years.

835. How many men in your district are members of the union?—In the town about 1,400.

836. Are they all employed in dock labour?—They are all employed in dock labour.

837. Can you estimate what proportion of the work done by them is done at tonnage rates?—In general there are 700 men employed on tonnage work.

838. Have you heard complaints that any of these men do not receive the amount due to them?—Yes, hundreds of times.

839. About how many complaints do you receive in a year on the average. Do you get them, for instance, once a week?—We do not expect them once a week, but sometimes we get three or four in one week.

840. Have you investigated these complaints?—I have.

841. Do you find that some of them are justified?—Yes, a very large number.

842. What are the principal cargoes that are handled by your men at tonnage rates?—General cargoes and coal-tipping and stowing and so on, pit-wood discharging, and all kinds of timber large and small, and iron ore.

843. Are the men usually employed by stevedores?—Yes, in some cases they are, in other cases by the dock and wharf companies.

844. Do the shipping companies employ the men direct?—No. There is hardly anything of that kind in our town.

845. Will you tell the Committee the circumstances of one or two cases where you have found a general grievance. I want as recent an instance as possible, and the date and the general particulars. Take the general cargo first?—January 1902.

846. Cannot you give us something a little later than that?—Yes, I can give you the first and the last up to that date. From there on I have not any record, for certain reasons. In January 1902 after being paid by the stevedore we recovered 35*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.* That was recovered by making a stand. What I mean by that is this, there was dissatisfaction on the part of the whole of the men, and, together with the men concerned, we approached the brokers for the ship and prevailed upon them to let us have the measurement of the cargo. They gave us a copy of the ship's manifest. We employed an expert in cubing cargoes, who has done it for many years, and the result of that was to recover 35*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.*

847. Did you have any difficulty in getting that money?—No, not when we proved our case.

848. What excuse was given for the deficiency?—As a matter of fact we did not intend to resume work until this matter was cleared up.

849. Who employed the men in that case?—A firm of stevedores.

850. What is the next case that you have?—A case of discharging deals in August 1902. Nineteen men were engaged, and in consequence of dissatisfaction when they received their pay, we succeeded again in getting the exact output, and recovered 4*s.* 5*d.* each for 19 men.

851. Who employed the men in that case?—The same stevedore.

852. Did he give any reasons for the deficiency?—No; no reason whatever. He was unable to dispute our figures, because we had them from the merchant.

853. Were there other cases in 1902?—I have another case in October the same year.

854. You had three cases in 1902?—I have taken down three cases in 1902.

855. How many had you in 1903?—I have only taken down one in 1903—December 11th, 1903.

856. What did you recover in that case?—Sixteen men 5*s.* 6*d.* each.

857. Who employed the men?—In this case a contractor to the dock company.

858. (Mr. Mead.) What kind of cargo was it?—I have not the particulars, but, as far as I can recollect, I fancy that this must have been general cargo.

859. (Mr. Hardy.) Inward?—Out.

860. (Chairman.) Had you any cases in 1904?—I have taken one case in 1904—the same contractor with the dock company. In April 1904 I have two ships belonging to the same owners, on which we recovered 5*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.*

Mr. H. Seer.
30 Jan. 1908.

861. What did you do in 1905?—Will you accept another one in 1904? I have an important case here. It was the same boat, the same owners, and the same man for the dock company. We had to go into court to prove our case, and we recovered 18*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* Ten men recovered 23*s.* 2*d.* each, six men recovered 18*s.* 8*d.* each, and six men recovered 4*s.* 6*d.* each.

862. (Chairman.) What defence was adduced?—When we produced the measurement, it was a question of this kind—that under certain conditions dead weight should be paid, and not the measurement. That applied to beer as well as to boilers.

863. (Mr. Hardy.) That is a thing about which there might well have been a dispute?—Yes. I want to be fair in the matter, and I do not want to give only one side. It appears—and it is very often done, and that is why I would like to mention it—that some shipowners in order to secure freight will arrange with companies to carry their goods at dead-weight freightage if they cannot get it by measurement. In this case this beer was carried, or arrangements were made to carry it, at dead-weight freightage instead of measurement, which is considerably more, and would be more to the men.

864. (Chairman.) Do you consider that the defence in that case was a fair one?—No. We claim to be paid by measurement, and it does not matter to us whether the ships carry at dead weight or anything else. We succeeded on our point with regard to measurement.

865. You do not suggest that there is any desire on the part of employers to be unfair to the men with regard to this question?—I am hardly in a position to say. We were paid in the first instance dead weight, and the action taken resulted in getting measurement.

866. (Mr. Wignall.) Anyhow the judge was satisfied that your case was a good one?—Yes, and he gave judgment for us.

867. (Chairman.) What do you say about 1905?—I have two cases in 1905. Both of them are cargoes of deals. One is in January. This is again the contractor for the dock company whom I mentioned before. I obtained the weights from the merchant, and recovered 2*s.* 2*d.* each for 24 men. In August the same year, on a cargo of deals, 24 men recovered 4*s.* 6*d.* after obtaining the weight from the merchant.

868. Were all these recoveries made by making a protest to the stevedore?—They would not give it unless they were obliged to. When we get the account and the men are dissatisfied from some information received, perhaps from somebody on board or somebody ashore, as the case may be, and they complain and say that they are not satisfied, they usually apply to me to try to prove the case, which I do in the way that I have described, by getting information where I can, sometimes from one and sometimes another.

869. When you have proved your case, have you had any difficulty in getting the thing adjusted?—No. They are afraid to go into court as a rule. They do not like it.

870. In 1906?—I have three or four cases that I have taken out.

871. We do not need to have them all?—I will give you the first and last if you like.

872. Very well?—From the same contractor for the dock company as I mentioned before, on a general cargo in one hold, for eight men we recovered 4*s.* 2*d.* each. There is another one, if you will take it, in March the same year, the same man, general cargo. For 35 men we recovered 13*s.* 2*d.* each. In April the same year, the same man, general cargo, we recovered 3*s.* each for 26 men.

873. (Mr. Scrutton.) That was simply by putting the case before him. You showed him that he was not paying quite enough and he agreed to pay more?—It was not quite as easy as that.

874. (Chairman.) What do you say about last year?—I have only a record of one case. There have been cases, but I am not prepared to give chapter and verse for them. I have one in April, a general cargo. We recovered 2*s.* 1*d.* for 34 men.

875. You have given us several instances of where you have recovered certain sums for the men in the years 1902 down to 1907. Are we to understand that those are all the cases you had in those particular years?—No.

876. Were there many more?—Yes; I expect ten times the number. I am not quite sure, I cannot give it you exactly, but very many more.

877. (Mr. Scrutton.) Do you suggest that the stevedore in these cases received payment on a certain tonnage, and that he then put forward a lower rate of tonnage, or that he was settling with the men provisionally before making a final settlement with the employer?—Unless we have ground for complaint after a settlement of this kind we hear no more about it. It is only when we can prove our case, and show by information, gathered sometimes from the brokers, sometimes from the owners, sometimes from other people not directly concerned, that there is a difference, that we are able to recover.

878. But that is not an answer to the question. My question was: Do you suggest that this contractor was deliberately receiving payment on one basis of tonnage and then coming and trying to settle with you on a lower basis?—I know it; I am positive of it.

879. What evidence have you of that?—This is my evidence—that in every case, bar one, that I have given, we have gone to the people from whom they have had payment, and got information from them that has enabled us to establish our case and demand payment.

880. How long afterwards?—Sometimes it takes a good time. I have a case here where I have been to the agent for information. The case occurred on November the 2nd, 1907. The actual weight in that ship—general cargo—would amount to a little over 800 tons, and the measurement weight would amount to 1,961 tons, all under frames—about 180 pairs of wheels included in the 1,961—very nearly three times the actual weight. So far as the agents and brokers are concerned we cannot get any further. They say that they have given us a correct copy of the ship's manifest, but even with that our men are not satisfied.

881. Why?—Because they believe that they have put more on board and are entitled to more measurement than they have been paid for.

882. Did you say that they had seen the ship's manifest?—I said that the ship's brokers had given us what they said was a correct account as sent to the owners of the ship, although they say that the men who stowed the cargo are not satisfied that they have had what is due to them.

883. (Mr. Hardy.) Is it suggested that the men have been deliberately told the dead weight when they thought they were being told the measurement weight, or have they been given both weights and the dispute has been whether they should be paid by weight or measurement?—There is a case in which the actual weight is 716 tons. I expect the wheels are included, but that is not very much. The measurement weight is 1,961 tons, but there is nothing in the world said as to whether this measurement was dead weight or not. A total is given of 1,961.

884. You cannot complain of 1,961 having been given. You might complain that 716 tons was given as the weight on which the men ought to be paid. Did they get both weights?—They do not say what is the dead weight, nor do they say the difference between the dead weight and the measurement weight. We think it would facilitate matters and be very much more satisfactory to the men doing the stowing.

885. 1,961 tons is the biggest weight?—That is according to the measurement, but whether it is the exact measurement or not I am not prepared to say.

886. (Chairman.) What would satisfy the men; what are they asking for?—In work of this kind they would like to have something more reliable and something that would enable them to have confidence in the thing to prevent dissatisfaction.

887. What do you suggest that should be?—I am hardly prepared to give an immediate answer, but it seems to me that if a sworn copy or a reliable copy of the ship's manifest is placed in the hands of people from whom it might be obtained by the men, or somebody representing them, something of that kind that would meet the case.

888. Some documentary evidence which is impartial?—Yes.

889. (Mr. Scrutton.) That would only give rise to disputes. Would they be satisfied to be paid at the same rate as the stevedore or the contractor is paid?—They would, providing that it is in accordance with the conditions of their tariff.

890. (Mr. Wignall.) So far as the coal shipping is concerned there is no complaint, because there is a weighman appointed by the dock company?—At our tips at Newport we have a machine to every tip, and the machine is very close to the tip, and there is very little objection on the part of the dock company to men asking for information of that kind from their weigher when they require it, but it is not then the official weight. It is only official when it has been passed through from the weigher to the general office and checked, and so on; then it becomes official.

891. Have you opportunities of seeing that document?—You can get it as a favour sometimes, and sometimes you have to give a tip for it if you want it, or to get it how you can.

892. And it is possible for the dock company to issue instructions to prevent you having access to it at all?—As a matter of fact, in the beginning of 1906, when they took over most of the import work in particular, they closed their machines to everybody except the men directly employed by themselves. In a little time we prevailed upon them to allow the machines to be opened. As far as I know with regard to pit wood, the men may have the weight by paying the weigher and keeping an account of every truck they load with iron ore or pit wood. That means one man from each gang in each hold of the ship must come up out of the hold, take the number of the truck and keep the numbers of all trucks, and when they have finished the day or the job appoach the weigher to have the weights filled in. That is the privilege just now.

893. The bulk of your trouble lies with the general cargo, and not with the coal?—The shippers are usually the owners of the coal, and they employ their own men, and get their own gangs. If they are dissatisfied with the weights on the spot, they can approach the colliery people and get the weights there. Then they can go to the brokers, and they do not very often refuse to give it to them.

894. How do the colliery people obtain a copy of the weight that is shipped on the steamer, or whatever it may be?—There are three copies. The freighters are supplied with one and the dock company with another, and another is kept on the spot. They get them every morning. As soon as possible after office hours, the previous day and night's shipping is sent by the dock company to the colliery owners, or shippers as they call themselves.

895. Every case you have mentioned to-day of recovering an amount of money has represented an enormous amount of time and trouble in getting information?—Yes, about six months in some cases.

896. You have frequently been refused information?—Yes.

897. There are documents in existence which you could obtain if they were willing to give them to you, which would satisfy the men on the quays?—Yes.

898. Taking the general cargo men—the iron ore men, and so on—if facilities were given them for appointing a checkweighman, would they be willing to appoint one of their own number to check weights?—No; they could not afford it.

899. They get a copy of the weights now by paying for it, as you say?—I will give you a case. We have a very large wharf, with two large berths, capable of accommodating a ship carrying 3,000 tons. It can take in two ships of 3,000 tons each, and can put out from 2,000 to 2,400 tons in 24 hours, and they have not a machine on the premises nor in their name. If they want other than the weight that is supplied by the contractor for the wharf company, they have to go to the Great Western people, and they cannot get it unless they pay them a farthing a ton. They never have had a machine. They have been in existence for about 30 years doing a great deal of work, employing sometimes as many as 60 men, and doing a very large output. They have not a machine on their premises, and no means in the world for getting at the weights of what they put out until they get it from the railway company.

900. To sum it up, there is general dissatisfaction?—Yes. Where there are machines belonging to the wharf company, they have to take their numbers, and take off the weights for each truck loaded by them. That is the only means they have.

901. (Mr. Larkin.) Do you think it is simply a mistake on the part of the stevedore in not paying the correct weight?—A clerical error?

902. Yes. Or is it deliberate?—It is deliberate.

903. Mr. (Orbell.) You got 35*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.* in January 1902. You told one gentleman here that you would not have got the clerks to prove that you were entitled to that sum, except for the fact that there was some question whether the men would resume work if they did not get it?—I mentioned that because in this case a man did actually stop. They had just got their stomachs full. Every time they get paid for a ship they expect more money, and that disappointment just brought them up to that pinch that they would not work any longer until they had this matter cleared up. They accompanied me to the broker's office, about 40 or 50 men, the whole of them.

904. But do you think it was on account of the doubt with regard to the men going to work that you managed to get the facts as to the proper tonnage the men were entitled to?—I expect it was more that than anything else.

905. It was not by the goodwill, or the honesty, or the love of right of the agent who was to pay, that you were paid?—No; we cannot get that at all.

906. With regard to the case in 1903, where you recovered for 16 men 5*s.* 6*d.* each, they received some money, did they not, when they finished the job?—Yes.

907. What was the length of time between the finishing of the job and the receiving of the 5*s.* 6*d.*?—I do not think I have that.

908. It does not matter about the exact time, but was the ship cleared from the dock?—Yes; and I have known cases when the ship has been back for another cargo, and gone away before we have got through with it.

909. In your opinion, even if there was a dispute over the dead weight or measurement, there had been good time for them to clear up any difficulty in that direction and to pay?—The men were paid, but they were not paid what they had earned.

910. Exactly; but you were asked whether, in the first place, the stevedore had paid on dead weight as a kind of sum in advance, an instalment, and afterwards paid on measurement, which brought out a greater sum. Whether that was so or not, there was ample time to adjust it before you made a request to get that sum?—Yes. The men would not have got any more, unless we had found out that something was due to them.

911. And, as a matter of fact, are there many disputes on account of men not being paid the proper amount of wages due to them?—They are just about in that frame of mind now at this very moment. I told them that in all probability I should be called upon to give some evidence touching upon these matters, and that has, perhaps, pacified them to some extent. They are pleased to think that the matter is going to have some consideration, and they are looking forward and hoping that a means will be found by which they shall have what they earn.

912. There is no question as to the amount per ton, but as to the number of tons that the men handle. You have a printed tariff agreed to by the stevedores and so on that fixes the price per ton, the number of men, and the detail. The dispute is as to the number of tons that the men have been paid for, and not the price per ton?—The number of tons—not the price.

Mr. H. Seer.

30 Jan. 1908.

913. (Chairman.) Is it clearly stated on the tariff whether the men are to be paid by measurement or dead weight?—Yes.

914. (Mr. Gordon.) Have you ever applied direct to the shipowner with regard to these disputes?—I have. A very very long time ago I applied to some Cardiff owners. I could not give you the name of the ship, because I did not know it would be wanted; I could if I was nearer to my books. I have been led to believe that whether the thing is right or wrong they do not like to give information of that kind.

915. Have you ever applied—because that is only hearsay—to any shipowner for assistance in these matters?—Direct only to one or two, or three, perhaps, at the utmost.

916. With what result?—Really, I cannot tell you exactly what the results were now. That is a very, very long time ago. I had a case of pit wood discharged on the wharf, where, as I said just now, there is no machine, and never has been. The men were very dissatisfied with regard to the pit wood. They knew what the ship used to put out, and in this case they had a great deal less than they had had before. That was the ground of their dissatisfaction. In that case I applied to a Cardiff owner, and eventually I had the weight from the shipowner, but in that case it turned out to be exactly what the contractors had paid the men.

917. Did the shipowner say that that was what he received freight on?—I do not know what he was paid freight on. I have been led to believe that for certain reasons of their own, if there is an appreciable difference between what the ship had put out and what they knew had been paid the men for discharging, they would hesitate or really refuse to give us the information.

918. Have you ever applied to a shipowner?—I have never troubled them since 14 or 15 years ago. I have been told that shipbrokers and shipowners, and people of that kind, hardly care to give information, because they have a dislike to being, perhaps, taken into court should anything happen. There is a case now in which the people said the very same thing: "Look here, what "is going to happen if we give you the information you "ask for? Are you going to subpœna us? Are you "going to take us into court and expose us?" This stands a great deal in the way of getting information from people who are hardly concerned at all. I take it that the ship's broker is not concerned in the least about the matter.

919. (Mr. Larkin.) There is a very serious point here; we want it cleared up. Do you know that the broker has given you the actual weight, and do you know that the shipowners pay the broker the proper freight, and does the broker in collusion with the stevedore make it his business not to pay the men the actual weight they have loaded or unloaded?—If you ask me if I know it and I say yes, I shall have to prove it, but I am fully convinced that in some cases they do—not in all.

920. (Mr Hardy.) Your chief complaint is against a man who is employed, as I understand, as a contractor by the dock company?—That is my chief complaint.

921. Have all these cases, or any of them, been brought to the notice of the dock company?—One case, because it was their own contractor that we were taking action against.

922. I did not ask for information about the action in the county court to which you referred, because there appears to have been a genuine difference of opinion about how the men should be paid. I want to know whether these instances of what you think are nothing but robbery have been brought to the notice of the dock company?—I have not had a case against the Newport Dock Company.

923. But this contractor is employed by them?—He is their contractor.

924. Do they know of these wrong doings?—They knew of the case of the boilers and they knew of the case of the beer.

925. In the case of the boilers there was an honest difference of opinion, I can imagine, and with regard to the beer too. You have given sample cases?—For the last two years and three months the contractor that I have mentioned has been on his own, so you had better distinguish.

926. Is he not on for the dock company now?—He is not on for the dock company now; he is on his own.

927. (Mr. Mead.) Certain of these cargoes that you have mentioned are timber cargoes. Would you tell me what the custom is at Newport of arriving at the output of a vessel with timber?—In some cases the cargo is measured up by the Customs measurer.

928. By whose authority?—I cannot tell you. They have their own man in Newport and he engages other men and he receives his orders from the Customs authorities—I do not know from whom in particular.

929. To measure up to see what the out-turn of the cargo is?—Yes.

930. Do you pay your men in Newport so much per standard?—So much per standard for deals.

931. What is the average time from the day that a vessel discharges her cargo of timber up to the day of final output as we call it?—It all depends. Sometimes they are taken out very quickly and sometimes they take as much as eight weeks.

932. To get the out-turn of a steamer's cargo?—But we have a clause in our tariff to the effect that a ship shall pay according to her bills of lading, and in the cases that I have given you the men are paid (I do not know where they get their information from) in the course of the week two or three times (?), and that is the end of the matter.

933. The contract with the men who employ the labourers is that in all cases the labourers are to be paid on the bill of lading standard capacity?—We like that, but we do not get it.

934. I thought you said so just now. What is your bargain?—I do not know that they ever pay on bills of lading.

935. I want an answer. What is the basis on which the men undertake the work? How are they supposed to be paid?—They undertake the work at so much per standard.

936. On the out-turn of standards?—Yes, I expect that is what it would be.

937. Is that so, or is it on what the vessel is supposed to have taken in?—There is nothing distinct. There is no definite law laid down beyond what I have told you, and that has not been adhered to—to pay the men on the ships' bills of landing.

938. But I ask you is the contract on the output standard capacity or on the bill of lading capacity? Is it on the number of standards discharged?—There is no doubt that is how they are paid.

939. Then there is no breach of contract?—There is no breach of contract.

940. It is sometimes eight weeks before it is cleared up?—Sometimes they are taken right away at once.

941. Say a fortnight or a month or six weeks. I do not bind you to eight weeks. How are the men paid during the interim from the time the ship has discharged her cargo till the final out-turn is arrived at?—I cannot answer.

942. How do they arrive at the amount they are to pay whilst the men are doing the work?—I cannot tell you, but the contractor pays them on a certain number of standards.

943. I want to know the system and you say they are paid on the out-turn standard. I want to know what system is employed from the date that the ship is finally discharged till you know what she has actually put out?—I do not know how they pay the men. I have mentioned the fact that in our tariff, which they do not adhere to, we have asked to be paid on the ship's bills of lading. I cannot tell you when they use the ship's bills of lading or when they use a certain output. They pay on standards. When we find the difference between what they have been paid and what the ship has turned out we take action.

944. That may be a matter of weeks?—Yes. I have known cases to take eight weeks. I have known a case where it has been dealt with right away at once.

945. (Mr. Scrutton.) With regard to general cargoes, you know that sometimes a ship is paid by weight and sometimes she is paid by measurement?—Yes.

946. And there might be a case where the ship being paid by weight the men think they ought to be paid by measurement?—Yes, quite so.

947. Therefore there is room for difference of opinion in these general cargoes?—No, not with regard to the men.

948. You have said that there may be a difference of opinion and the men may think when the ship is paid by weight that they ought to be paid by measurement. Take an article like railway wheels, for example?—The ship sometimes gets freightage on actual or dead weight, but it is invariable and it never changes its conditions with regard to stowing as far as the men are concerned.

949. The men think they ought to be paid by measurement?—It is laid down in the tariff and printed and everybody knows it. I can give you a case in which the charterers are carrying for dead-weight freightage but the men are to be paid on measurement. If they have measurement goods to stow on board the ship it makes no difference to them whether she is carrying her cargo for dead-weight freightage or measurement freightage.

950. Therefore the measurement has to be agreed as between the contractor and the men in every case?—No, there is no need of any special agreement at all. The rule is laid down with the figures and the conditions.

951. But my point is that there are no definite figures for such a cargo. That is the point I was coming to. It has to be agreed every time?—No.

952. Where are the figures of measurement of the cargo on which the men have to be settled with?—We have it in print. Every broker in Newport has it.

953. But you have not the measurement of cargo. Where are the figures of the tonnage on which you are to be paid?—The figures are in the men's stowing book.

954. The men have not the measurements of the cargo?—They cannot have until the cargo is measured.

955. But the cargo is not always measured?—Measurement—portions of the cargo are measured when they come under measurement rules, but if it is a dead-weight cargo and no condition is applied as to the stowage then it is not necessary.

956. No figure exists which represents the basis on which the men expect to be paid?—Yes, there is a clear and definite figure laid down.

957. (Chairman.) May I put it in this way to you. Are the conditions upon which the men are engaged these: If the men are paid by weight and freight is paid on dead weight there is no dispute. If, on the other hand, goods are of the measurement class, notwithstanding that the employers have to carry those by weight, do I understand that the agreement with the men is that they must be paid by measurement?—Yes.

958. That is the agreement?—Yes. Let me just explain.

959. I quite understand the point?—You had better allow me to explain, because there is difficulty and doubt about the matter. All kinds of classes of goods are named. The kind of goods that go at dead-weight stowage are named, and the kind of goods that go at measurement charges are also named.

960. So that it does not matter what the employer arranges about the freight?—Not a particle.

961. The men must be paid on the basis that you have named?—Yes.

962. (Mr. Hardy.) If the shipowner is carrying these goods by weight there is no document which he has and can show to the men that will give the measurement, is there?—No.

The witness withdrew.

[Adjourned for a short time.]

Mr. Henry H. Watts called and examined.

963. (Chairman.) What is your official position in the London Docks?—I am assistant manager and staff inspector, London and India Docks.

964. I believe that for some years past you have been in intimate connection with labour and are acquainted with the conditions in relation to piece-work?—Yes. Shall I read the statement that I have?

965. Yes, if you please?—"The labourers employed "by the dock company are guaranteed a minimum "wage, whether on day-work or on piece-work, and "their earnings on piece-work can never be less than "if they were on the daily or hourly rate of pay. The "work of discharging ships is chiefly performed by "master porters or stevedores, acting as contractors for "the shipowners, and in some cases the work is done "by direct employment of labour by the shipowners "themselves. A certain amount of ship discharging "is, however, done by the dock company, who have "also a large number of labourers employed on the "quays and in the warehouses. 83 per cent. of the "labour of the dock company (exclusive of foremen, "&c.), is performed by piece-work at rates which are "either agreed with the men, or are fixed as the result "of experience and are well known to the men. Some "of these rates are tonnage rates, and some are package "rates. Wool, for instance, is discharged at so much "per 100 bales, the rate varying according to descrip-"tion. Goods that are paid for by weight are not "always weighed at the ship, and it would cause great "delay and expense if such were required. Some of "the goods are sent away by barge to up-river wharves "and warehouses where they are weighed, and the "dock ompany, whose charges for the discharging "depend upon weight in some cases, obtain a return "from those wharves and warehouses of the ascertained "weight."

966. You said, "in some cases." Is it not general?—We obtain weights where we do not get the weights at the dock. I follow on and say: "In other cases, the "dock company weigh representative packages in order "to ascertain the average weight. The charges of the "dock company are made upon the weights so ascer-"tained. At the end of the job an account is made up "in detail of the work done and priced at the agreed "or fixed rates, and the amount due to the labourers, "after deducting payments on account, distributed to "the men according to the number of hours worked by "each man. I hand in a specimen account." That is worked out to one-tenth of a 1*d.* That is the usual practice. The total number of hours of the men employed on the job, and the surplus after the wages have been deducted is reduced to one-tenth of a 1*d.*, and then paid over to each man according to the number of hours that he has worked. "As soon as the balance "is ascertained, the amount per hour is published on "a board at the departmental office, and payment is "made to each man separately by the company's pay "officer. The account of the work is open to the "inspection of any representative man who has been "engaged on the job. It would be quite impracticable "in the discharge or handling of general cargoes that "a checkweigher on behalf of the men should supervise "the weighing, because, as I have pointed out, portions "of the cargo may be weighed at various places miles "away from the ship, and at places over which the "employer of the men has no control. I have stated "that the charges of the dock company depend upon "the weight and quantities, and the evidence that "satisfies them ought to be sufficient for the labourers. "The manifest of the cargo of a ship being discharged "by the dock company is in the departmental office, "and is useful as a general indication of the contents "of the ship, but it is not a document that could be "relied upon, as it frequently happens that cargo not "manifested is in the ship, and contrariwise that "manifested cargo is not turned out. Moreover the "manifest does not state weights in many cases. "I hand in a copy of a ship's manifest and of a "plan which also does not state weights even if it

Mr. H. H. Watts.

30 Jan. 1908.

" were in other respects reliable. I expect that the " documents are quite familiar to you." (handing the same to the Committee). " The number of bills " of lading for a general cargo is often very great. " They specify the weight or measurement in some " terms, but it would be a work too difficult for ordinary " labourers to transpose these weights or measurements " into avoirdupois in many cases. Where the cargo is " discharged overside, the dock company do not come " into possession of the bills of lading, and not always " even when the cargo is landed. It is the practice of " some shipowners to retain the bills of lading and give " releases authorising delivery without production of " bill of lading. There is no objection to the men " seeing any document in the possession of the com- " pany as evidence of weight or quantity, but it could " not be tolerated that goods should be weighed for the " mere purpose of ascertaining wages."

967. For how long have you been engaged in dock work?—More or less, for 30 years.

968. You have told us that the proportion of work done in the London Docks at tonnage rates is about 80 per cent.?—That is the proportion of the work performed by contract of our total labour.

969. Have you known of complaints from the men that they have not had their full tonnage?—No, I cannot recall any case. Any general complaint of any kind would not come under my immediate notice. A man might raise a question with a department and he would be satisfied.

970. When stevedores are employed, are they paid by weight?—Yes. We do not employ stevedores. We employ ordinary dock labourers. Most dock labourers are our own weekly men.

971. What evidence of the weights do you suggest could be given to the men?—With regard to the weights that we get together from the one or two sources I have mentioned, and upon which we levy our charges for the discharging of the ship or casting over the quay and delivery of the goods or any other services, in our piece-work account, we make them agree with the return that is made to the office of charges on which the bill to the shipowner is rendered.

972. So, in your opinion, that would be quite sufficient evidence to enable the men to form an estimate of what they ought to get?—Yes. I do not see anything better. We are satisfied with that, and we take all the means possible to ensure that it is correct. We have an independent staff who are quite apart from the departmental staff. They are known as examiners, and are not under the control of the superintendent at all. One of these officers always examines these accounts and compares them.

973. Would you have any objection to the men seeing that piece-work statement?—No, not at all.

974. You say that with a certain kind of cargo the weight is only ascertained after the goods reach the merchant. How long would it be before the dock company ascertains that weight?—Sometimes a week or a fortnight, three weeks in some cases.

975. Would it be easy after that time to find the men who had been employed on the job?—They are all booked, and they follow the department or the dock. When the account is made up and the surplus to be paid is declared it is notified, and the men come and get their bonus. They are not kept without their pay in the meantime.

976. Do you consider that the demands of the men are reasonable, that they should be allowed to check the weight upon which their wages are paid?—I think it is quite reasonable that they should be satisfied that they are being paid upon the correct weight, but I cannot answer for employers other than the docks company.

977. That is what I want to know?—From the docks company point of view, I do not know how they could be better satisfied than with the weights that we rely upon.

978. But at present they are not available to the men?—Yes. It is a general understanding. Our officers have always been instructed that whenever men employed on any particular job wish to have information about the way in which the piece-work bill is made up, it should be given to them.

979. Have they ever asked you for the information?—Yes, occasionally; some pretty regularly follow the bill up to a certain extent.

980. Have they never been refused?—I do not think so. It would not be tolerated if it was known to any of the responsible officers.

981. (Mr Orbell.) I understood you to say that there is no difficulty in ascertaining the exact weight or numbers of tons that the men have handled on the piece-work arrangement?—No, not eventually.

982. Then of course there would be no objection to giving those weights that you have received to the men concerned?—No; we should be quite willing that the piece-work account upon which we pay the men should be open to them.

983. That would be the plus system, would it not? I am not very well acquainted with the plus system myself?—You have to make up the bill. You get the total weights of the cargo in the ship. In order to make up the bill at certain rates, from which is deducted the ordinary pay of the men giving the balance, you must have the information to make up your bill.

984. (Mr. Anderson.) It is really a statement of particulars?—Yes, and the tonnage is the total tonnage from which we have collected our charges from the shipowner.

985. (Mr. Orbell.) You have not known of any dissatisfaction on the part of the men because of not being paid on their proper tonnage?—No.

986. They have expressed no dissatisfaction at all?—There is a large number of men spread over all the docks in London and there are accounts every day in every department and men might complain, but the officer would be obliged to give them all the detailed information necessary to satisfy them, and I do not recall a single case where we have had complaint made to headquarters that such information has been withheld.

987. You would not say that the men have not complained?—They might complain quite unreasonably.

988. Have they complained to some persons whom they considered to be officials?—They may have done. With regard to our system it is so generally understood by our officers that they are to give that information where it is called for, that I cannot understand any cause for complaint or dissatisfaction connected with the dock company.

989. That may be, but you have not been one of those who have had to share in the plus. Are you in a position to-day to know that complaints are lodged?—There are a number of departments. I cannot say that a labourer may not have complained at Victoria Dock last week that he thought the balance ought to be more than it was. It would not be conveyed to me, but if there was any general idea that the men were not being fairly treated we should hear it at the Dock House before long and enquire very closely into it, and if there was the slightest cause for dissatisfaction we should have it put right.

990. That would be when it got to you. You have confessed that complaints might be lodged in the various departments, and might not come to your notice. You are not really in a position to know unless your superintendent of the department reports it to you, the quay superintendent or clerk or any of these officials whose duty it would be to report complaints to you?—No.

991. Unless they do that, you do not know anything about it?—No. You, representing a trades union, would not know whether a man had a cause of complaint unless it was reported to you or he came to you and made it known.

992. Then should I be quite justified in saying that he had no complaint even although they had not come to my notice?—I do not think you would be justified in saying one thing or the other. In just the same way, I cannot say whether there has or has not been a complaint at the docks. While you are on that point, I have here a form of contract that was used for many years about the docks when contracts were made with the men. One of the clauses is, I notice: "Such "accounts to be open at any reasonable time for the "inspection of the men associated in the work."

993. I believe you are quoting from the agreement made in 1889. Is that a part of it?—It is a form that came into operation after that time.

994. We will say 1890, somewhere about November?—Very likely.

995. It is so, if you look at the date?—I think it was the dock company's form. I do not think it had any particular reference to that. It was instituted some time after that.

996. Is that contract put into force to-day by the men to whom you give work out as piece-work?—Until comparatively recently it has been.

997. What would you call recently?—It might be the last year or so. I do not think it is much in use now, as a matter of fact.

998. No, it is not?—But these lines are followed. The men sign this form of agreement, and they know that all these conditions obtain. Where there has been any alteration, I think it has been rather in favour of the men.

999. If you will pardon me, I must be clear on this one particular point. That agreement or form of contract was enforced up till recently. That would mean anything from a year to a year or so ago. When you say that the men to-day sign that, you do not mean that; you mean up to a year or two ago?—I did not say that the men to-day sign this. I produce this to show that the conditions upon which we have worked with the men for a good many years embody a clause which says that the accounts are to be open at any reasonable time for the inspection of the men associated in the work. These contracts were signed by the men as well as by the docks company.

1000. Were signed—not are signed?—That is hardly the point. The thing is that the men understand that they have this opportunity whether they sign a contract or whether they do not. All our piece-work arrangements are on the lines of the men having the option of calling into question our returns and of being satisfied, as far as possible, that our accounts are correct.

1001. You would not object to the men carrying out that particular clause?—No.

1002. And if any man got left outside or did not get his regular turn of work because he asked for the particulars of the ship, you would not agree with it?—No, there is no such feeling as that.

1003. I suppose you would not go so far as to say that no man has been left outside because he has asked for such particulars?—I should say certainly he has not. It would be a very bad day's work for the officer who did it.

1004. I am very pleased to hear that. Now as to distributing the plus or the balance of a ship, I think in answer to the Chairman, if I remember rightly, you said that these men follow up the boat, and there is no difficulty in finding a man for him to receive the plus that belongs to him?—It is rather that the man finds the ship or the department where the job has been undertaken. He comes for his plus where he knows the job has been declared where it is not paid by the day. But we recognise that short reckonings make long friends, and we get the plus declared as quickly as possible, and in more cases during the last few months than formerly we have declared the bonus each day, and paid it on the estimated weights ascertained for the day, and then we have cleared up the job at the end. It is purely in the interest of the men so as not to keep them out of anything which is due to them longer than we can possibly help.

1005. When you refer to men generally finding the ship, are you referring to the registered men—the A or B list?—Yes.

1006. And the permanent men that may be taken off your permanent staff for the time being, and put on to contract work?—Yes.

1007. How would that apply to the casual man? He would not be an A or B man. How is it with him?—He follows it up. Supposing the plus is not made up till next week, and the ship is finished this week, he may be at work at some other part of the dock, and he comes round at 4 o'clock or at dinner time when he hears that the job is declared and is on the board, and he gets his pay.

1008. (Chairman.) If he were working outside the dock would he be permitted to go inside to see?—Yes. There is very little supervision exercised over that kind of man coming in. The constable might say, "What "are you going in for?" and he would say "Plus." It is a recognised thing.

1009. (Mr. Orbell.) Whilst you say that no man would be left outside and not got his proper turn of work through asking particulars about a ship, you would not say that it does not happen through some of your subordinates?—I cannot answer for all our people, but I want to assure you that it is not allowed under any circumstances. It is such a recognised well-known condition between the company and the men that they have this opportunity that we do not regard it as anything offensive if they ask for particulars.

1010. With regard to the casual hand, that is a class outside the A and B or permanent class, do you think it would be possible for one of these men to make a complaint or ask questions as to the plus and the proper return of the ship, and for that complaint not to reach your ears?—Yes, I think it is possible.

1011. Do you think it is probable?—You see, that if there are a few casual men employed on a job, there are also a large number of permanent A and B men.

1012. What would you call a few?—It depends. It varies a good deal, but most of our work is done by the permanent registered and B men and not by the casuals. The casual work at our docks is a very small proportion of the whole.

1013. Would that statement apply when you are dealing with wools in the wool season?—Yes.

1014. But most of the men on that work are registered men?—Yes, the larger proportion of the wool work, taking one year round, would be done by weekly and B men.

1015. Of course I accept your statement?—I am speaking of what I know, We have those figures given to us and we keep very close supervision over those kind of things. I was going to point out that if there is any occasion for a casual man to raise the question that he has not been properly treated over a ship, it would apply equally to the A and B and all other men, because every man is treated alike. Although a man may be a permanent man he does not get a penny more pay than a casual man. He gets his sixpence and his equal division of the bonuses, so that the idea of treating casual men in a different way to the other men cannot come in.

1016. No, but as a matter of fact your permanent men will not complain and your A men will not complain, and it is the man who has only a little bit to lose that complains, and he loses that little bit that he has got. Mind you, I do not blame you because it does not come to your knowledge?—I cannot carry it further.

1017. (Mr. Anderson.) You said something about general contractors in your first statement. Have you any contractors now for discharging?—No, not to speak of. I will read the clause again: "The work of dis-"charging ships is chiefly performed by master porters "or stevedores acting as contractors for the ship-"owners, and in some cases the work is done by direct "employment of labour by the shipowners them-"selves."

1018. I do not mean that particular statement, but further on there is something about the contractors?—We have no contractors.

1019. That is what made me ask the question?—One of our strong points is that we employ our own men and pay each man separately.

1020. You employ them weekly, and are in direct touch with the men employed in discharging vessels in the docks now?—Yes. I might say there is the small job of piling soft wood, and that is about the only instance where we occasionally employ a man who comes in and brings his own men.

Mr. H. H. Watts.

30 Jan. 1908.

1021. I am not concerned with that?—We deprecate employing a man who has to dole out the money to someone else. It is a strong point.

1022. (Mr. Sexton.) Your system is not generally adopted by the big firms in London, is it?—I cannot answer for the big firms in London, but I do not think it is. Ours is a system of our own.

1023. It is entirely unique so far as London is concerned?—Yes, I think so.

1024. I suppose you could not give us any reason why the system is not adopted by the other companies. Have you any knowledge with regard to that?—No, I cannot answer that. It does involve, shall I say, more trouble and more care and supervision than individual employers might care about.

1025. How many men do you employ that are included in the preference and the A and the B list?—There are about 1,200 permanent men.

1026. (Chairman.) Are they A's?—Yes, about 1,000 A men and 2,000 B men.

1027. (Mr. Sexton.) Roughly about 4,000 altogether?—Yes, roughly about 4,000.

1028. These men are shifted about from dock to dock as required?—Yes. We shift the permanent and the A men, but the B men we do not actually shift; they go of their own accord. We publish information as to where there will be work from time to time.

1029. Supposing that some of these men were at Tilbury Dock one day and they were shifted to St. Katharine's Dock the next day and kept there for a fortnight, how would they ascertain the plus from Tilbury Dock without going down to Tilbury Dock?—If they were weekly men they would probably live at Grays and would come up. We transfer men to a very small extent in that way from Tilbury to the upper dock. We avoid it as much as possible.

1030. I will confine the area and make it smaller. Supposing that a man is working at St. Katharine's and he is transferred to the nearest dock to St. Katharine's and is kept there for a week and has not time to go to St. Katharine's, how does he ascertain the plus that is due to him at St. Katharine's; is it sent on?—In the best way he can, is the answer to that.

1031. You see there is difficulty there?—I do not think there is much difficulty. If they are weekly men the pay is conveyed to them wherever they are. If a man is working at another dock—if he is a London Dock man, say, and is employed at Victoria Dock on the pay day—the pay is passed through to him with his surplus and everything.

1032. (Mr. Wignall.) With regard to that statement of particulars of cargo that you have just handed in, is there a copy of that posted within reach of the men who are working, so that they can see it without difficulty or trouble?—No, it is not posted; it is in the departmental office, that is the nearest office to where the ship is discharging.

1033. For the men to get access to it would mean coming to the office?—Yes. They might have it on board the ship.

1034. That account is made up after the cargo is completed?—Yes. You cannot get it together until afterwards.

1035. When it is made up is it available for the men who have worked on that particular cargo to see it?—Yes.

1036. But they have to apply to the office for permission to see it?—Yes.

1037. That is where our objection comes in. We assume that the average dock-worker does not care about coming to the office; and if he comes to the office, he is not always treated in the most amiable way?—You must not say that of the London and India Docks.

1038. We are glad we have found out the ideal place at last, but that is my point—that the men ought not to have to ask for it?—In the general way it works by way of a representative man. If there is a little dissatisfaction, it is spoken about amongst the men, and one of the men, perhaps the more intelligent, will come up and see the office about it.

1039. (Mr. Orbell.) Does that apply to general cargo? Are not you quoting the tea business?—No. Perhaps in the tea department the idea of a representative man has been better recognised on the part of the men. They appointed a man distinctly, and he used to follow it up week by week, and that has continued longer than it has been done in the general work of the dock. But the principle is the same. If on any particular job the men are not satisfied, one or two men will come up and speak to the officer, and he will go into it with them.

1040. (Mr. Larkin.) You say that ordinary labourers cannot transpose weights. I would like to ask who transposes the weights for the dock company in London?—I am speaking of foreign weights.

1041. So am I?—I do not say they cannot, but it would not be easy for them to do it.

1042. Who does it in London?—The officers of the department if they use those weights.

1043. Are you aware that in Liverpool the casual labourers do that, and do it correctly?—Yes.

1044. I have done it for some years myself. Another point you make is that men can go to the office and ask for the particulars. Do you think the A or preference man would dare to ask, knowing that the casual man would be very likely used against him and get his job?—I think so. The permanent man certainly could not be dismissed for asking for the information that the company undertake to give. He has nothing to fear.

1045. Unfortunately, my own knowledge of this matter is that it may be so, but Mr. Orbell is more conversant with the facts in London. With regard to the tea department, why is the representative man appointed by the firm to go to ask the weights?—The representative man is appointed by the men—we do not appoint him.

1046. He is above the ordinary victimisation point, although he is employed by the men?—The fact that he is not victimised rather proves that if we had a lot of them they would not be victimised.

1047. What are the ordinary commodities that you take the estimated weights of?—It happens with regard to almost any general cargo that is not actually weighed.

1048. Will you specify one particular commodity?—Wool is sometimes paid for by the 100 bales, but sometimes it is paid for by the weight. So many bales are taken to the ton—an average weight.

1049. What would you estimate a bale of jute at or a bale of gunnys roughly?—We do not estimate them in a rough-and-ready way. Some of them are taken and the estimate is arrived at by the actual weight taken of an average.

1050. Can you tell me of any commodity that comes into the Port of London from an East Indian port where you do not get the actual weight?—I do not know that anything occurs to me at the moment. Bales of goods go to private places; I do not know that I could name any particular article. When goods are going away unweighed from the ship they may be weighed at some other destination. If it is not a recognised destination, we take the particulars of the weights—an average weight for our own satisfaction. We depend upon that.

1051. With regard to all commodities from India, is not the Indian weight upon the bales?—I cannot say.

1052. You are quite satisfied to tell the Committee that you really do not know that there is any specific commodity that is not actually weighed over scales, either in your place or the consignee's place?—I could not mention anything. There is a lot of transhipment, but we get at the weight as well as we can.

1053. You do not know of a case where you cannot get the actual weights of any commodity if you wish it?—We get the very best possible weights. It is to our interest to get the weight. That is not ascertained merely to pay the wages on.

1054. (Mr. Anderson.) You say that you do, as nearly as possible, ascertain the correct weights when you are sending in your account to the shipowners?—Yes.

1055. Then you go on to say at the end of the job an account is made up in detail of the work done and priced at the agreed or fixed rates, and the amount due to the labourers, after deducting payments on account, distributed to the men according to the number of hours worked by each man. I hand in a specimen account. As soon as the balance is ascertained the amount per hour is published on a board at the departmental office, and payment is made to each man separately by the company's pay officer. The account of the work is open to the inspection of any representative man who has been engaged on the job. The amount per hour is published on a board at the departmental office?—Yes.

1056. Is there any objection to publishing on that board instead of the amount due per hour a statement of particulars as you send it in to the shipowner?—I think that there would be an objection to that.

1057. You say that the accounts are open, and that the men engaged on the job can have access to the accounts. We do not want you hang them out in the streets somewhere. What we suggest is that they should be exhibited on the board where you exhibited the notice as to plus or nil where the men can readily have access without having to apply, because they are victimised according to the allegations made, as you have heard?—I do not know, but I daresay it could be done. It would not be convenient, and it could only be done, of course, in cases of a ship discharging. We have a lot of piece-work not connected with discharging.

1058. I am only referring to the process of discharging or loading ships. That leads me to another point. The 4,200 men in the three classes are not all engaged in discharging, are they?—No.

1059. A very small proportion now?—Yes.

1060. You have much less now than ever?—Yes.

1061. What proportion is now engaged?—We discharge in the London and St. Katharine's Dock and the East and West India Docks, and a little at Tilbury, not much. I should think that we discharge in the year from 800,000 to 1,000,000 tons.

1062. I should like a definite answer. I want to know whether you have any objection to publishing the statement of particulars on your notice board in the same way as you do your rough statement, as to whether there is any plus or nil. If you have any objections, what are those objections?—Well, I am a witness here. I could not commit my company, and on looking into it, I might find more difficulties than strike me at first about it. All things are possible, but whether it would be convenient to do it I do not know.

1063. If you cannot answer the question offhand it is of no use labouring it?—Very well.

1064. (Mr. Hardy.) I would suggest to the witness and to you, Mr. Anderson, that the dock offices are more or less public. Anybody has access to the docks. Do you think that a dock employer or any employer would be willing to publish to all the world the details of the wages which he pays to his men for certain work?—I think there would be great objection to that. When the question was asked, and when I gave some kind of assent to it, I had in my mind nearly a list of the tonnages without any other details.

1065. Without prices?—Without prices. I do not see the slightest objection to that.

1066. No. Mr. Orbell seems to be living a good deal in the past as to the grievances which dock labourers have. A good deal has happened in the docks in the last 10 or 15 years in the way of organising the labour?—Yes. There is great improvement, I think.

1067. I think that not more than 3 per cent. of the labour employed by the dock company is in the nature of purely casual labour?—Yes, about 3 per cent.

1068. Is there any reason why a permanent man who is regularly employed should not make any complaints he pleases direct to the directors?—No.

1069. Can anybody but the directors discharge a permanent man?—No.

1070. Have you ever heard of any case of a man being left off because he asked for particulars?—No, certainly not, and, as I said at first, if such a thing was known it would not be tolerated.

1071. With regard to the form of agreement or conditions of agreement signed, at any rate at one time signed by somebody on behalf of the men, those conditions are well known to the men and are observed?—Yes, except in one or two cases.

1072. Can you tell us the percentage of men employed by the dock company or about the percentage of men employed by the dock company that are on regular weekly wages?—It is 70 per cent.

1073. The men that are sent from dock to dock, the transfer being arranged by the dock officers, are men that are on weekly wages?—Yes, the permanent and the A men.

1074. I put this in relation to Mr. Sexton's question as to how the men are to know when they have a bonus due to them. In the case of weekly men, the bonus is paid to them on their wages at the end of the week, is it not?—Yes.

1075. Therefore there is no necessity that they should go about from place to place to ascertain what their bonus is?—That is so. Wherever they are stationed on the pay day, there they are paid the money that they may have earned in two or three different docks.

1076. Can you suggest any reason why a man should be left off by a foreman, supposing a foreman had such power in his hands because he made inquiry about his wages?—I cannot imagine any, because it is so well understood by the officers that the men are at liberty to make that inquiry, and, further, I say that during the last few years, as a result of the organisation of the labouring classes, and the strict instructions that I may say are observed as to the order in which the different classes of men are to be employed, the foreman has not the power of dealing with the men in the way in which he did some years ago. It is not in the hands of the taking-on foremen to act towards the men in the way that used to be the case some years ago.

1077. Has any foreman, or any officer of any sort or kind at the office, any possible interest in withholding from a man the amount of his bonus?—Not the slightest.

1078. And as a matter of fact do the men generally apply for their bonus?—They generally apply for their bonus, and it is always available for them directly it is notified that it is ready.

1079. (Mr. Orbell.) It is a fact, you say, that nobody but the directors can discharge a man?—A permanent man.

1080. Has a departmental superintendent, for instance, power to suspend a permanent man?—For a grave offence he could suspend a man, but he has to report the particulars to the Dock House.

1081. I understand that, but he could suspend him?—Yes.

1082. It would be possible to suspend a man for a sufficient time for the directors to meet, and then to discharge him?—The directors meet every day.

1083. You have power to suspend a man?—Yes.

1084. You have suspended some?—Yes, I expect so, in my time.

1085. A permanent man?—Yes, I expect so. I do not recall a case at the moment.

1086. The directors only have power to dismiss entirely, but a subordinate has power of suspension, and that suspension can go over to a period when the man may be discharged?—If he suspends him he must report the circumstances.

1087. (Mr. Mead.) Arising out of the question put to you about transhipping cargo, I take it, with regard to any weight that you require in connection with a cargo that goes to the continent or elsewhere, that you would accept the weight that the shipowner hands to you?—Yes. Sometimes we get the weight from abroad, say Hamburg.

1088. From many ports abroad you would not get the weight, because it is not the custom to weigh it. In those cases you would accept the figure that the shipowner gave to you?—Yes. We satisfy ourselves that it is about correct.

1089. (Mr. Larkin.) May I ask you what port you could not get the weight from?—I cannot give one offhand.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. G. Hart.

Mr. GEORGE HART called and examined.

1090. (Chairman.) What is your position?—Delegate of the Stevedores Executive Council.

1091. Of what association?—The Amalgamated Society of Stevedores, London.

1092. For how long have you held that position?—For two years.

1093. How many men in your district are members of the union?—About 1,200.

1094. Are they all employed in dock labour?—Yes, as far as I know.

1095. What proportion of the work done by these men is done at tonnage rates?—The majority of it.

1096. What proportion of the men in your union are paid on piece-work rates?—The greater proportion.

1097. Have you heard complaints that the men doing this kind of work do not receive the amount due to them?—As far as the deal work goes, generally, there is a dispute amongst ourselves on every job we have finished. We consider that we have not been paid out for the number of standards in the ship.

1098. Have you investigated these complaints?—I investigated one (I had not time to go farther back) within the last month.

1099. When you made the investigation, did you find that the complaints of the men were justified?—Yes.

1100. Is it entirely timber that the men deal with?—Yes; deals, and boards, and scantlings.

1101. By whom are the men employed?—By a member of the society.

1102. But who pays your men's wages?—The master stevedore, whom they are working for. There are several masters. They are working for one man to-day and in a couple of days' time they are working for another master.

1103. What is the general complaint of the men that you represent?—The general complaint is this: You go on a ship; she is supposed to have so many standards in her. You ask the mate how many she has. I can quote one—1,240. When we were finished we were paid for 1,193. There is a discrepancy of 47 standards. The stevedore shows you a paper and says, "That is all I can tell you."

1104. What paper is that?—The account of the ship's clerk.

1105. How is the stevedore paid? Is he paid by measurement?—He is paid by standard.

1106. If you had the document upon which the stevedore is paid, would that satisfy the men?—Yes, if we saw that actual document.

1107. The men would be quite satisfied if they saw that?—Yes, they would be quite satisfied if they saw that; but, in this case, the paper shown to you is not the actual document.

1108. (Mr. Anderson.) In the case you mentioned, you were told by the mate of the steamer that she had 1,240 standards in her?—Yes.

1109. Have you seen any other evidence as to what she had in her?—Yes; some of the men finished about two hours previous to me on the same job, and they went down to the library and looked at the "Timber Trades Journal." It was quoted there as 1,240.

1110. As a matter of fact, did you see that paper yourself?—Yes.

1111. What did you see there?—"1,240 standards."

1112. You know from your own knowledge that you were only paid for 1,193 standards?—Yes.

1113. Have you had any satisfaction with regard to that point?—Not as regards the money.

1114. Was it pointed out to the employer that the ship had 1,240 standards in her?—It was pointed out to him that it had 1,240 standards, and it was quoted in the Trades Journal.

1115. What did he say?—He shoved the paper on the counter and said: "All the account I have is 1,193, "and I cannot pay on anything more."

1116. Was it possible for him to have the exact account?—I should think so. The mate said 1,240, and the Journal put in the same figure.

1117. Had she lost any on the passage?—Not that I know of.

1118. Would you have been told if she had?—I should have been told. There was no reference made to any loss, and you can always tell within a little, because the cargo is shifted on the deck.

1119. Is the complaint general?—It is general.

1120. Not only with regard to this steamship and this particular firm, but with other firms as well?—Yes. It is a general complaint at the Commercial Dock.

1121. Is it a fact that you cannot get the particulars?—Yes.

1122. Is it a fact that, going back 10 years ago, you could get the particulars?—At one time we could go to the ship's clerk, and by giving him two or three shillings, we could get an account of the job, and it was paid out on that. We put 3*d.* a man.

1123. You were satisfied with that?—Yes. You could get it also from the Customs. Now you cannot get it. I have been told, in fact, on more than one occasion, by the ship's clerk, "It is more than I dare do."

1124. Have you ever known a case of anybody being victimised?—Yes. A few years ago—10 or 11—I was manning a job. I disputed 60 standards. I could not get conclusive proof in writing, but I was convinced that the boat had 60 standards more in her. I applied for the money and could not get it.

1125. Did you get some?—We got some, but I do not know exactly the amount. The stevedore threw down the money and said, "There is a bit for your-"selves, and if I hear any further account of it I will "let you have it." I never heard any more. The result of that was that I was boycotted by that firm for about seven years, until the outside foreman died. Until he died I never did an hour's work again for that firm.

1126. Have you very good reason to believe that it was because you applied for particulars of the job and for the balance due?—That is the only conclusion I could come to.

1127. You were always able to do your work?—Yes.

1128. You were good enough for other firms?—I never was discharged for incompetency yet.

1129. (Mr. Gordon.) Did you apply to the shipowner or the ship's agent for any particulars?—I applied to the dock office and to the Customs, and I asked the clerks that I actually thought did know, but I did not go to any shipowner.

1130. Nor to the steamship owner's agent?—No. At that time I did not actually know who were the people to apply to. I went to the superintendent of the Surrey Commercial Dock at that time. He took me to his office and got his clerk to turn this particular job up.

1131. And you were shown the particulars?—Yes.

1132. (Mr. Harrington.) In the case you referred to, were you informed that you were not to work for that firm any more?—The man told me point blank that he would see I never did another hour's work in the firm while he was there. He was the outside foreman.

1133. The steamer as to which you recently had a grievance had a deck load?—It was after the deck load season. She had an ordinary 6 feet deck load.

1134. You had no idea, except from what the mate told you, of the amount of cargo?—Yes. I had the "Timber Trades Journal."

1135. You are quite aware that when the deals are stocked on the quay they turn out short in the case of timber vessels arriving in London?—It is not a common occurrence. I should think it is rather exceptional.

1136. But it is a fact, is it not?—The job would take about 10 weeks to put up off the quay. The job is not up now. It will not be up for some weeks. We started this job on New Year's day, on Wednesday, and finished on the following Tuesday at half-past two in the afternoon, six days' work, and working until 10 o'clock on the Monday night. My statement is this: If the stevedore gets a paper quoting so many standards, and he pays out on that, and in the Journal it shows 40 or 50 standards more, we think we are justified in receiving pay for that.

1137. (Chairman.) On asking for some information?—Yes, without the ship has shot any of her cargo or anything of the kind. We are acquainted with that fact, and it only happens, as a rule, in the case of a big deck load.

1138. (Mr. Harrington.) You are aware of the fact that very likely the stevedore has not received a return of the steamer at all yet?—That I could not say. I do not understand that part of the business.

1139. (Chairman.) In the ordinary course of events would you have expected any further sum in respect of the ship if you had not called attention to the point?—We have a good grumble, and it goes at that. We get no further satisfaction. We might get a promise, but on no occasion have I ever had any money handed to me after a time when we have finished a job as a balance of that job, That is my experience.

1140. That is the point?—I have been promised on many occasions: "When we get the papers we will let "you know, and if there is anything to come, you shall "get it."

1141. (Mr. Harrington.) You would be satisfied if your master told you that?—I have had to be, whether I was or not.

1142. If he could not get the figures you could not get them, could you? If it is not possible for him it is not possible for you?—But surely a ship does not come from the Baltic with a load of wood unless it is known what she is shipping.

1143. Yes, very, very frequently?—Is that so.

1144. (Mr. Anderson.) The point is this—that you never hear when a job turns out in excess of what you have been paid for?—Never.

1145. Has a master stevedore ever come to you and said: "That job has turned out 30 standards more than "I paid you for. I have paid you 30 standards short. "Here is 30*s.*"?—No, never in my experience.

1146. Have you ever had it the other way about?—Yes, and had to pay back.

1147. The master got the particulars then?—I have had the vice versâ experience.

1148. The employer has shown the statement?—Yes.

1149. He has had no difficulty in getting full particulars then?—No. What has happended has been this: The man I have been working under has called us out and has said "I paid you for 30 too many!" and we have had to pay it back.

1150. So if it is possible to get particulars when you are overpaid it is quite possible to get them when you are underpaid?—It seems to me so.

1151. (Mr. Anderson.) Do you know of any cases where a master stevedore has voluntarily come forward and made up the balance?—No, never in my experience. We have had occasions when we have found out, and there has been a summons in the ordinary way, and we have got it in that way, but never voluntarily.

1152. (Chairman.) I take it you would be quite satisfied if you were to see the statement upon which the stevedore himself is paid?—I would be more satisfied if it was within our province when we were working on a job to walk on a ship and look in the chart room and see a note of what that ship actually has in her without being under obligation to anybody by having to ask.

1153. (Mr. Larkin.) Would you be satisfied if you got the final measurement or the Customs measurement or the official measurement that the cargo of pine or spruce is paid for on?—Yes, with regard to the number of standards, I would.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. James Murphy called and examined.

Mr. J. Murphy.

1154. (Chairman.) What is your official position?—I am assistant secretary of a branch of the Amalgamated Stevedores' Labour Protection League, London.

1155. For how long have you held that position?—Seven years.

1156. How many men in your district are members of the union?—I suppose over 2,000.

1157. Are they all employed in dock labour?—And river work.

1158. What proportion is employed on piece-work?—There is a lot of shovel work and a lot of cargo work—taking in and discharging, done at piece-work rates.

1159. What proportion?—Most. Some firms do it by day-work.

1160. Have the men who are paid by tonnage rates complained that they do not receive the amount due to them?—Yes, plenty have complained; some more particularly.

1161. How many complaints do you receive on an average in a year?—There is no satisfaction with regard to the boats that bring phosphorous rock, copper ore, locust beans, and so on, when the cargo is not weighed.

1162. How many do you receive, on an average, in the year?—I have had two this last fortnight.

1163. Two a fortnight, may I say?—I have had two this last fortnight. I have known it for 20 years.

1164. How many did you have before?—There might not be anybody connected with our branch on the particular ship.

1165. How many do you think you have a year?—Twenty.

1166. Do you investigate the complaints?—Yes, and we try to rectify the state of things if there is any proof.

1167. Have you found any claims that were not justified?—I have found some. The men have not a chance of getting a correct statement. They will not give it to them. A man was asked, and he said: "No."

1168. What are the principal cargoes your men handle?—I am speaking of shovel work, copper ore, phosphorus rock, locust beans, and general cargoes of all kinds—tallow and cement.

1169. Do grievances arise in respect of all these cargoes?—Not every one.

1170. But on the different kinds of cargoes?—Yes. There are discrepancies, with cement, for instance.

1171. Who employs the men?—The master stevedore.

Mr. J. Murphy.

30 Jan. 1908.

1172. Do the master stevedores present a statement to the men, showing what wages they have earned?—No. You only get a return for what you have earned according to the tonnage when it is finished. It is counted up, and you get so much. If there is a dispute, you may get it corrected sometimes; other times you may not.

1173. Can you give me any particular instance?—Yes. At one time Government casked cement weighed 4 cwt. a cask. Then they deducted the weight of the cask itself, and gave the net weight only. It weighed to 4 cwt. some odd pounds. One particular firm I work for very often pay us 90 tons, and the actual weight of the casks is 95 tons, according to their own weight. There are so many few odd pounds that they do not give to us.

1174. Do you assume that the stevedore was paid for a lighter tonnage than he paid the men on?—Yes, because there are so many odd pounds that they do not count at all in the different casks. It should be really 95 tons to the 500 casks, and they pay 90.

1175. Is that done deliberately?—We take an average, because we have agreed to it. We have no other way to rectify it.

1176. You agree to it?—We have to.

1177. Do I understand, then, that the stevedore is paid on a higher tonnage than the men are paid on?—Yes. We get it from a good authentic source, namely, the foreman.

1178. For how long have you accepted this condition of things?—Five or six years.

1179. What remedy do you propose?—I propose the doing of what should be done, that is, making it compulsory to have a kind of return shown the same as the master stevedores are paid on.

1180. You want to see some definite statement upon which the stevedore is paid his own tonnage?—Yes. As he is paid so we should be paid. With regard to phosphorus rock, they cannot get the returns in a day or two. It might take two or three weeks, and we are quite willing to wait that time, provided we get the proper payment eventually.

1181. You would be quite satisfied to take a certain part of the wage provisionally and to have the balance paid as soon as the returns came in?—Yes.

1182. (Mr. Anderson.) You were asked if you knew of any claims that had not been justified, If there are any, is it not because you could not get the particulars to justify them?—Yes.

1183. You have been unable to?—Yes.

1184. A few years back was it comparatively easy to get the returns from ship's clerks and others on demand at a small fee?—Yes, at one time.

1185. Is there any alteration now?—Yes, a lot.

1186. Can you get them at all from them?—If you do the men are afraid they will run a risk.

1187. They do it under fear?—They will pledge you to secrecy before they give it to you, in case they get discharged for doing it.

1188. For goodness sake do not tell anybody I told you?—Yes.

1189. They sympathise with you to the extent of giving you particulars?—Some do and some do not. The consignees at one time would give them to you right direct, but now they would attempt to lock you up if you asked them.

1190. Have you ever been victimised yourself in consequence of asking for particulars of what you have done?—Unfortunately I have on more than one occasion.

1191. By more than one firm?—Yes, two firms particularly, for the same reason. I have been made the scapegoat.

1192. Have you ever been employed there since?—When they have been compelled.

1193. I mean when they could help themselves?—No, only when they could not get another society man to take on.

1194. That was in consequence of asking for particulars of what you had done?—Yes, I have pencilled for particulars several times.

1195. (Mr. Hardy.) Everybody knows that so many casks of cement weigh so many tons. You know it, and the employer knows it?—We get 90 tons now.

1196. There is no concealment about it?—But they only pay us 90.

1197. You know it, and the employers know it. How would an alteration in the law better your position?—We should get the correct weight.

1198. (Mr. Anderson.) Would the remedy be this: that the master stevedore, the employer, should furnish you with the statement of tonnage on which he is paid?—Yes, that is what I am trying to say. That is what would satisfy us; that is just the point.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. T. Merrells

Mr. T. Merrells called and examined.

1199. (Chairman.) What is your official position?—I am district secretary of the Dock, Wharf, Riverside, and General Workers' Union.

1200. For how long have you been in that position?—Eight and a half years.

1201. How many men in your district are members of the union?—Do you mean Swansea alone, or the district I cover.

1202. The district you cover?—Approximately about 1,800.

1203. Are they all employed in dock labour?—Yes.

1204. What proportion of the work is done by tonnage rates?—Including piece and tonnage rates, I should say 95 per cent.

1205. Have you ever heard complaints that the men do not receive the amount due to them?—Yes, frequently.

1206. How many complaints do you receive a year?—50 or 60, perhaps.

1207. Do you investigate the complaints?—Yes, every one that is made to me.

1208. Do you find the complaint is justified?—Yes, as far as mistakes are concerned.

1209. Are they generally adjusted by the employer?—Yes, in every instance, as far as I know. We are in a rather favourable position as far as our docks are concerned. We have no hostility on the part of the employers. If anything arises we can generally get the thing rectified. They are ready to show us their accounts.

1210. What are the principal cargoes handled by your men?—General cargoes, tin plates, coal, and various ores—copper and iron.

1211. If there is any discrepancy, which is liable to occur in all business matters, do I understand that the employers are ready to adjust it?—Yes, that is my experience. I might say that I hold rather a unique position so far as the port of Swansea is concerned. I happen to be a member of the Swansea Harbour Board, and as such I can always get ready access to the accounts.

1212. Do you consider that you are in a more favourable position than most?—Yes; from what I know, I should say so, 1213. Are the men employed by stevedores?—A very small percentage.

1214. Who actually employs the men?—So far as the general work of the port is concerned, apart from the shipment of coal, the harbour board employ about 75 per cent. of the labour, I should say, and the bulk of the labour is employed direct by shipping firms or their agents. There is very little contracting in Swansea.

1215. With regard to what little there is, how is that arranged?—It is chiefly confined to the timber trade and other cargoes that come along, such as road metal.

1216. Are the men paid in those circumstances by the contractor?—They are paid by the contractor. There are only two contractors in the port of Swansea.

1217. Do you hear of any grievance in those respects?—Yes. Men oftentimes are of the opinion that they have not exactly what is due to them, and they come to me and explain the position, and I go frequently to the harbour office to see. I get the account that is rendered to the office for the dues. Sometimes there are discrepancies, and I see the employer, the contractor, and in almost every instance the discrepancy is made good.

1218. Do you consider that, because you have access to the documents, that is the reason why the account is adjusted?—I would not say the sole reason. If there has been any question at all, I have never yet been refused. If I go to the shippers or merchants, they are always ready.

1219. Would it be any advantage to the men if such particulars were to be presented by right and not by favour?—I should say yes to safeguard the future, because we cannot say how long the present condition of affairs will last. An employer might refuse me, and I may not be a member of the harbour board after this year. I had a conversation with the manager at Swansea Harbour. I told him, and he expressed the opinion that, so far as they were concerned, they would be quite ready at any time. He thought it a proper thing and the right thing. That is not the opinion of the board itself, but his own private opinion.

1220. (Mr. Wignall.) The conditions with regard to the question we are dealing with now are very much improved compared with what they used to be?—Yes, since the harbour trust has done the work direct.

1221. Since the abolition of the contract with the middle man and the harbour board taking over the work a good many of the grievances have been removed?—Undoubtedly.

1222. And the conditions all round are much better?—Undoubtedly.

1223. You have explained your means of getting access to the books, and so on, so that as far as the work direct for the board is concerned, through your access to the books you are able to satisfy the men as to whether their grievance is justified or otherwise, although there may be frequent complaints?—Yes. You will understand that I am not making a charge of any attempt at fraud, but in this season starting now there is a large quantity of copperas shipped at Swansea in casks. It is shipped by various firms. With regard to a particular steamship company, we find that the casks do not average the same as with any other firm. At the same time I know of my own knowledge that the men are paid on the return that is made to the harbour. But we have no means of checking it except by that. So if there is any discrepancy, not only are the men receiving less, but also the harbour dues. With casks of the same size the men can check the number of casks that go in, and when the total is paid the average always turns out greater with one firm than with the other. I cannot fathom it because we have no check.

1224. Before you were elected to the harbour board you had occasion to apply to the customs on more than one occasiou for a copy of the manifest?—Yes. That is not a reliable return.

1225. You have been driven to that to justify the men's claim?—Yes, on many occasions. I have had to pay half a crown on each occasion.

1226. Your experience is not confined to Swansea?—No.

1227. It extends to other places?—Yes.

1228. You have heard complaints from other ports?—Yes, at Llanelly, for instance, the tin plates are not even weighed. They are taken direct from the works over a private railway and shipped into coasting boats, and there is no means whatever of checking.

1229. You have heard the men say that it would be a great advantage to them if they had some sort of return from the employers?—I discussed this with them a fortnight ago on the first intimation that I was likely to be called, and they said it would pay them to appoint somebody. They are only a small body of men, about 60 or 70 regular men, getting their living there.

1230. Summing up the whole thing, generally speaking, notwithstanding the conditions that exist and your unique position, there are complaints, and the men feel that there ought to be some protection to guarantee their tonnage rates being paid in full?—There is no question of their opinion.

1231. (Mr. Hardy.) You would not suggest that things should be weighed that otherwise would not be weighed?—That would be impracticable. If everything had to be weighed it would necessitate employing a dozen checkweighers.

1232. (Mr. Bellhouse.) Where are the tin plates weighed that you mentioned just now?—At Llanelly.

1233. At the consignees?—I do not want you to understand that it refers to Swansea, but to Llanelly. They are sold at so much per box, and they go out of the works where they are manufactured direct over a railway, They are not weighed at all.

1234. (Mr. Larkin.) They are transhipped to Liverpool?—Yes.

1235. Do you know that they are weighed at Liverpool actually?—No, I do not know that.

1236. Sheet by sheet. 5 per cent. of it is weighed.—That is only for sampling purposes.

1237. To get the estimated weight of the cargo, and they get the actual weight if they want it?—All the tin plates that are shipped in Swansea are weighed over the railway. The bulk is put to store and shipped out again from the shed. It would be impracticable to weigh those. The only check that the men have is very ineffective. They ask the hatchway man or call man to keep a tally of the number coming aboard.

1238. (Chairman.) The check made by the railway company is sufficient for all practical purposes?—Yes, but it might be made by the railway company, and the stuff might not be shipped for a month or two months. There are hundreds of consignments coming to the same warehouse. Of course every pile is kept separate.

1239. You do not wish to introduce any new method by which the trade in any respect would be interfered with?—No, I do not, and I say it would interfere if we asked for the plates to be weighed when they come into the warehouse and when they go out.

1240. A box of tin plates of the same size would not vary much?—Not to any degree.

1241. (Mr. Larkin.) You say you would not be satisfied with railway weights?—Yes, I should.

1242. Are you aware that 21 cwts. of coal is taken as a ton?—I was not speaking of coal.

1243. You want the actual weight?—Yes, certainly that is the point.

The witness withdrew.

THIRD DAY.

Informal Meeting of some Members of the Committee.

Thursday, 6th February 1908.

PRESENT:

ERNEST F. G. HATCH, Esq. (Chairman).

JAMES SEXTON, Esq. (National Union of Dock Labourers).

JAMES LARKIN, Esq. (National Union of Dock Labourers).

Mr. J. Woods.

6 Feb. 1908.

Mr. JOHN WOODS called and examined.

1244. (Chairman.) What is your official position?—I am secretary of the Liverpool branch of the Docker's Union.

1245. How long have you held that position?—Four years now.

1246. How many men in your district are members of the union?—Roughly speaking eleven or twelve thousand.

1247. Are all these men employed in dock labour?—Yes.

1248. What proportion of work done is at tonnage rates?—I can only give an estimate, say, about 3,000 or more.

1249. Have you heard complaints that the men paid tonnage rates do not receive the amount due to them?—Yes.

1250. About how many complaints do you receive a year on an average?—I cannot exactly say how many, they have become so common.

1251. How many in a month?—I might get a dozen.

1252. Have you investigated these complaints?—Sometimes.

1253. Do you think that some of them were justified?—Yes.

1254. What are the principal cargoes handled at tonnage rates?—Coal, salt, gravel, phosphate rock.

1255. Do grievances arise in respect of all these cargoes?—Yes, in every branch of them.

1256. Can you tell us any instances where you investigated complaints and found that they were justified, in regard to salt?—Yes, a case arose seven or eight weeks ago. A barge of salt was lying in the King's Dock, Liverpool. The men discharging the salt were paid for 244 tons. A week afterwards, for unloading the same barge, the men were only paid for 204 tons.

1257. How do you know the barge contained the same amount in both instances?—I have only the men's word for it.

1258. Did you make any complaint to the employers?—No.

1259. Why?—Because it is no use. They would simply tell us the tonnage and that is the end of it.

1260. Have you no other instances to tell us of any other kind of cargo?—No.

1261. You told us just now that you have as many as 12 cases a month?—I often have, but I am so used to them that I take no notice.

1262. Then the men suffer all these grievances without making any attempt to remedy them?—Yes, they have got used to it.

1263. Are the men, generally speaking, dissatisfied with the present system?—They would like to know the amount of tonnage. The captains dare not tell the tonnage. If the men could only demand to see the tonnage note they would be quite contented. There is a case in point where a captain told his tonnage and he was suspended by his employers.

1264. Is there in the possession of the employer any document showing the amount of the stuff loaded?—I think so. Every barge gets a shipping note.

1265. Do they weigh it going into the barge?—I think so.

1266. Some documents showing the actual weight would be procurable?—I think so.

1267. The men would be quite satisfied if they could see a document?—Yes.

1268. A shipping note would be a satisfactory and truthful account of the quantity of stuff in a barge?—Yes, I believe so.

1269. (Mr. Sexton.) You have had a good deal to do with all kinds of material. Have you had no complaints from the men who work coal?—They all complain but they have no redress, they can take it or leave it.

1270. In respect to the cargoes of salt. How long does it take them to get from the salt works to the Mersey?—I really could not say. Probably they would do it in one tide.

1271. Eight hours?—From Northwich it takes 4½ hours and from Winsford 6 hours.

1272. Therefore there is no reason to believe that during the transit from the salt works to the ship there is any depreciation in the weight of the salt?—There may be a little, but a great deal of the salt is perfectly dry and, in a great many instances, as hard as rock.

1273. There is no depreciation in eight hours?—No.

1274. In respect to macadam, is there any depreciation?—No, it is hard and the water has no effect.

1275. In respect to coal, there are complaints every day?—Continual complaints.

1276. You spoke of a captain who told his tonnage and was suspended, where did you get this information from?—From the men who were on the barge, but they will not give the captain of the barge away, for if they did it would be detrimental to him.

1278. The men are continually complaining that they can get no document?—Yes.

1279. Was there no better method a few years ago than there is now?—Twenty years ago.

1280. What was that?—They showed their notes.

1281. Now they will not show them at all?—No.

1282. When they are asked, what is the answer?—The man who asked would not be answered.

1283. Have the men ever had to go to the Custom House for the weights?—The gravel men, I believe, can get the weights from the Custom House by payment of 3*d.*

1284. Is it a fact that the men knowing the uselessness of making application for these documents have gradually accepted the inevitable?—As a rule.

1285. If they protest what happens?—They are told that they are not wanted any more, and therefore they are afraid to speak.

1286. What is the average earnings of these men?—I have not any idea.

1287. What is the average earnings of men in salt, do they average 1*l.* a week?—No, I do not think so.

1288.—Do you know of any cases where men have taken action on their own?—I know of a case in Birkenhead about three years ago. I think it can be proved. A vessel of phosphate rock was being unloaded. The men depended on the tonnage put into the railway wagons and weighed over the machine. One of the men went to the weighing department of the railway company and asked for the weights. He was refused, so he said, "I am a foreman; I cannot pay the men until I get the tonnage." Then he got the weights, but when the men received their money it was 13*s.* a man less than the correct tonnage. Mr. J. Woods 6 Feb. 1908.

1289. (Chairman.) How long had they been working?—About a week.

1290. What action did the man take?—He would not take his money. He said "I have got the actual tonnage" and when they saw he could prove it they paid the 13*s.* without any bother.

1291–2. (Chairman.) Was any explanation given by the firm of the shortage?—No. Two years ago we had another clear case. Men on lighters were filling tubs to be transferred into the ship. They were paid on 197 tons. The stevedores were paid on the tonnage which the mate got from the Salt Union, and they were paid on 11 tons more.

FOURTH DAY.

Thursday, 13th February 1908.

PRESENT:

ERNEST F. G. HATCH, Esq. (Chairman).

JAMES ANDERSON, Esq. (Amalgamated Stevedores' Labour Protection League).

GERALD BELLHOUSE, Esq. (one of His Majesty's Inspectors of Factories).

C. W. GORDON, Esq. (Gordon Steam Shipping Company).

THOMAS HARDY, Esq. (Manager of the London and India Docks Company).

JAMES HARRINGTON, Esq. (London Master Stevedores' Association).

JAMES LARKIN, Esq. (National Union of Dock Labourers).

J. C. MEAD, Esq. (of Messrs. Mead, Son and Hussey, Shipowners).

J. LLOYD MORGAN, Esq., K.C., M.P.

H. ORBELL, Esq. (Dock Wharf, Riverside, and General Workers' Union).

J. HERBERT SCRUTTON, Esq. (of Messrs. Scrutton, Sons & Co., Shipowners).

JAMES SEXTON, Esq. (National Union of Dock Labourers).

JAMES WIGNALL, Esq. (Dock, Wharf, Riverside, and General Workers' Union).

MR. ALFRED EDWARD CLARK called and examined. Mr. A. E. Clark.

1293. (Chairman.) What is your position?—Coal porter.

1294. You are not an official of the union?—No; I am a member of the union.

1295. How long have you been employed as a coal porter?—Turned 18 years.

1296. Have you heard complaints among your men paid by tonnage rates with whom you work, that they do not receive the amount due to them?—Quite so.

1297. How many complaints do you hear in the course of—say—a month?—It is almost a daily thing to have dissatisfaction amongst the men. We work, and when we have done we are not paid for what we really know ourselves is the amount of work we do; and the system is such that we cannot demand this money. The reason why we cannot demand it is that we would be boycotted wherever we went afterwards.

1298. Please give some instances of what you refer to?—Take, for example, one vessel that we had in the Tilbury Dock. We had to do that ship without a weighman.

1299. What were you unloading?—Coal. It was about July 1906. It was some time in July when we started work. We started at five o'clock in the morning and we stopped at 11 o'clock and asked what coals there were in the after hold of the vessel. It was a vessel with three holds. The foreman told us it was 480 tons. We knew that that was not satisfactory. We refused to do any more work till we got to know the proper tonnage or something slightly inclined towards the proper tonnage.

1300. How did you know that 480 tons was not satisfactory?—Because we had had the ship so frequently. We are like everyone else. If you were going to write on a sheet of foolscap paper by the knowledge you have already got, you would know how long it would take you to do it. We know by the quantity of coals in the hold how long we will take doing it. We have the ships to do frequently, and we know how long it takes to do them.

1301. What was the difference between the tonnage you were paid for and what you estimated was in the ship?—We estimated 520 to 530 tons of coals, in that ship.

1302. And you were paid for 480?—The foreman told us 470 tons first, and when we stopped he made it 487.

1303. You and the other men thought that they ought to be paid for 520 tons?—Yes, quite so. Then again there is another case on the 16th of December, 1906. We had to put all her cargo on the quay. When we started work the foreman told us it was 480 tons in the hold. We protested against it. We knew that there was more cargo than that in the hold. He told us that if we did not like to do it he would have to get someone else. The men wavered, and things being rather bad in the labour market with us, we had to do it. We had to take the coals as 480 tons. The same ship came again not quite a month later—about the 5th January 1907. She made out then 537 tons which we maintain was the proper complement the first time.

1304. How did you know that?—We know by the same class of coal, and the hold being as full of coal, because years of experience teach us how much is in the hold. If you asked us when a vessel was lying there, how much was in the vessel, we could tell you within 10 tons. If we see the bulk of coal in the hold we can tell you within three or four tons, how much coal is in the hold by years of experience.

Mr. A. E. Clark.

1305. Have you had any similar experience in connection with any other cargoes?—Yes.

1306. What cargoes?—Not exactly myself—not my own experience. We will take, for instance, the men who work what they call by piece work, and yet they are forced to work by a quantity limit.

1307. (Mr. Hardy.) Are you speaking of general cargo?—Yes, sugar—piece-work—chiefly run for the Clan Line in the Tilbury Dock. The men start, for example, this morning first thing, When they are done to-night they are told it is 200 tons, their limit, when they know as a fact that they have done upwards of 230 tons.

1308. (The Chairman.) What do you mean by "200 tons, their limit?"—The bosses tell them that that is all that you can do in a day and yet they know it is 230. If they insist on having it, they are left on the stones next morning; they are not required. They are not sacked. None of us are sacked—far from it—but we are left out next morning, or if not exactly left out next morning, two or three mornings afterwards.

1309. Have you made any complaints to the employers about these grievances you have told us about?—That is more than the men dare do. Those who have their families to study have to think of their families and sacrifice their principle.

1310. (Mr. Hardy.) Were you employed on this job to which you refer?—No, not on this work.

1311. (Chairman.) Have you anything else to tell us?—Yes. Now we will take a case—

1312. Tell us things you know of your own knowledge?—This is my own knowledge. I might explain that these grievances are talked over in our branch room, so that these men are almost like myself. We all work in different sections in the dock. In this next case. One gang of men on the 17th December last filled 377 tanks of coal for 240 tons, and the firm said that these tanks weighed 19 cwts. I might explain that these tanks have a proper weighing machine that they put on the chain every now and again to see if there is the correct weights coming out of the tanks at all times of the vessel discharging. When they start the first two or three tanks are weighed, and after being worked for two or three hours they put the thing on again and weigh two or three more. The men were paid for 240 tons. They protested against it, and the manager said that he could do nothing further in it, and that they had to take it. When the firm loads these barges—by my own experience, because I work there—the result is that when a 95 ton barge comes along they put 100 tanks into it, and why should not we not be paid for the 95 tons which the barge takes, and which we know the barges take.

1313. You were paid for filling 240 tons?—Yes.

1314. What do you suggest you should have been paid for?—We should be paid for 350 to 360 tons.

1315. (Mr. Lloyd Morgan.) Do you mean that you are defrauded out of about 70 tons?—Yes. It is over 100 tons that we are defrauded of.

1316. Over what period would that extend?—A matter of about 10 to 12 hours' work.

1317. (Chairman.) Did you make any complaint in respect of this?—Yes, frequent complaints. There are always complaints.

1318. But in respect of this one instance did you make complaints?—The men did. I was not exactly in this. I was not in turn for the ship. I was on the ship previous to this.

1319. (Mr. Gordon.) Do not the firm make a distinction between large and small coal?—There is large and small coal, but this coal is weighed at certain periods of the shift to see that the tanks are all running the same.

1320. If you are discharging large coal or Welsh coal in tanks, they will not carry so much as if it were dead small coal—gas coal, for instance?—Yes. Welsh coal is the heaviest coal we fill.

1321. Steam coal?—Yes.

1322. Do you distinguish between the light and the heavy coal?—Yes, there is that distinction. Take, for example, our heaviest coal, Welsh small. When that comes, the same tanks which run 19 cwts. of north country coal will run 21 to 25 cwts. of that coal.

1323. (Chairman.) The last case you told us is not within your own personal knowledge?—Yes, it is within my own personal knowledge.

1324. But you had no personal experience?—No; I was not in it.

1325. You were told of it by some of your fellow workmen?—Yes, my own workmates, but it is my own personal knowledge.

1326. (Mr. Wignall.) Is all the coal weighed before it is put into these tanks? Is is weighed on the wharf or near by?—No, not at this particular place. They have not the weighing machines on the cranes. If they had, every tank would be weighed. Instead of that they have their proper weighing machine which they fix to the chain and fix to the tank, and they weigh three or four. In two hours' time they weigh three or four more, and in another two hours they weigh three or four more and average them.

1327. They have a record of the weight in the office or somewhere?—Yes, they have the record of weight by what is in the ship.

1328. So there is a document to be examined or a paper to be produced to prove the exact weight on the lighter?—They go by the water-mark on the lighter. When the lighter is up to a certain mark it has its complement in, and we know that because we can see the marks ourselves.

1329. (Chairman.) What do you suggest the men would be satisfied with?—Being paid on what the ship get paid on for fetching it. That would be our satisfaction.

1330. (Mr. Wignall.) This coal is discharged out of the ship into the lighter?—Quite so.

1331. So what the ship is carrying should be the tonnage upon which you are paid for transferring into the lighter?—Yes.

1332. And all you want is proof of what the ship carries to satisfy the men of the exact tonnage that they handle?—Quite so.

1333. (Mr. Orbell.) In reference to those cases which you say are not within your own personal experience, do you mean to say by that that you were not employed on the job, but you were with the gangs when they were being paid and lodged the complaints?—I am not with the gangs all the time; I am with them directly afterwards.

1334. How did you hear of the complaint with regard to the coals?—I was there at the time the men were being paid.

1335. That is how you got to know of the complaint?—Yes.

1336. And it has been reported in the Branch repeatedly?—Yes.

1337. You say that if the men who are employed were to lodge a complaint, they would be left on the stones?—Yes.

1339. They would not be told overnight that they would not be wanted to-morrow morning when they were at the box and lodged the complaint?—No, we do not hear of anything like that.

1340. How would it take place. In what way is a man left out of work if he lodges a complaint. He is not told overnight or he is not told at the time when he lodges the complaint. When is he told? When does he realise that he is being punished for that?—All the man knows is that two or three days afterwards he is not taken on, and there is no explanation given to the man at all.

1341. What did you mean by 200 tons limit?—There is a proper man to keep tally of this stuff as it comes out, and the officers on the ship tell the men how much is in the ship when they ask for it. When they have done at night they know that they have done 230 tons by the tally. The men can keep check besides doing the work by chalking on a stancheon each one as it goes out. When they go to get their pay they are told that 200 tons is the limit. Suppose that they are three days on the sugar in a ship that has 700 tons. It is less than that generally. On the average it is about 500 tons with this particular cargo. The men are, say, two-and-a-half-days. The first day and second day they will be paid for about 150 tons. Then comes the third day and they are paid for 100 tons. Say there are about 470 tons in the vessel, the third day they will receive about 100 tons, and then there are 70 tons which they have done and which they are not paid for in the three days, and the men want to know where that goes to.

1342. When they complain about not receiving their proper money and they call the foreman's or somebody's attention to the check that they have been keeping, which totals a greater number of tons than they have been paid for, is that the time that the foreman or somebody responsible says that 200 tons is the limit per day?—Yes.

1343. That is the only authority they have for the 200 tons limit?—Yes. I might say the only authority the men have with regard to what tonnage is in the hold is by the officers of the vessel.

1344. Other than the men's rough check?—Yes.

1345. You have been chiefly talking about sugar?—Yes.

1346. (Mr. Sexton.) How do you know you are 70 tons short?—By what the officers say that are in the vessel.

1347. That is the information they give?—Yes. And then again at the end of it the men know they are short because they keep a tally of what weight goes out. For example they are sending ton sets out. The men keep a tally of that so they must know what they do at the end of the day, and yet 200 tons is the limit for a day's work.

1348. (Mr Harrington.) Are not these bags all the same weight?—No, not exactly the same weight. One will be softer stuff and the other harder and drier stuff. There will be a few lbs. difference—not many lbs.

1349. (Chairman.) Is there a difference in weight caused by absorption and leakage?—Yes; the bottom bags get heavier because they get all the liquid out of the top bags.

1350. (Mr Sexton.) Are the bags damaged in transit?—Not with that class of stuff. It all sticks together. It is only by the liquid running out of it.

1351. Is it wet sugar?—Yes.

1352. (Mr Orbell.) Generally speaking, there is an average weight that you can fix on a bag of sugar?—Yes.

1353. (Mr. Harrington.) Is it sugar or jaggery?—We call it sugar; I do not know what you call it.

1354. (Mr. Hardy.) Is it from the East Indies?—Chiefly.

1355. It is jaggery, then?—We call it sugar.

1356. (Mr. Orbell.) Have you any complaints with regard to the same firm in connexion with other cargoes than sugar. Take linseed, for instance?—Yes, we had a very serious complaint with regard to linseed with the same firm. There was a gang of men employed to stow linseed.

1357. (Chairman.) Is this within your own knowledge?—This is knowledge brought to the branch room where we discuss all our complaints; it is not my own personal experience.

1358. (Mr. Sexton.) Was this particular grievance that you are now giving the Committee discussed at the branch meeting?—It was.

1359. Before Committee?—No, before a full branch meeting.

1360. What decision did the branch come to?—The decision of the branch was that the men were robbed, and they could not do anything in it, for each one would be boycotted who handled it.

1361. Did the men who made the complaint give the facts at the branch meeting?—Yes.

1362. As you state them now?—Yes, the men that were directly working it.

1363. As you are giving them now?—Yes.

1364. (Mr. Orbell.) Do you know of a case of shortage of pay or a case which gave cause for suspicion as to shortage of pay on linseed?—Yes, sometime about last July or last August, the men were employed on this linseed, and they were to get 7*d.* per hour, and then go and get their bonus over as plus. The next day they turned up for their plus and it was not out. The day afterwards they turned up for the plus again, and they were told they were a halfpenny an hour in debt. The men themselves claimed that they had earned between 1*s.* 1*d.* and 1*s.* 2*d.* an hour. The men are paid 7*d.* per hour, and they go and get the bonus at the finish.

1365. (Mr. Harrington.) How much a ton was this?—11*d.* a ton.

1366. (Mr. Orbell.) Was there a man who expressed his dissatisfaction to the foreman?—Yes.

1367. Or to somebody in charge?—Yes.

1368. What happened?—He has not been wanted since. He was one of the general ones to be called on when there was any work. He has walked about and has not been wanted since.

1369. What further results were there?—He went away from the district. He has had to go away from the district.

1370. (Chairman.) Who actually selects these workmen?—The calling-on foreman.

1371. Do I understand that you tell the Committee that that foreman was deliberately told not to employ that man?—I cannot say whether the foreman was told not to employ him or whether he did it by himself.

1372. But could it benefit him personally not to employ the man. I will put it in this way: Would the foreman, by paying you shortage of weight, have received any benefit?—Quite likely.

1373. From whom?—If it is like that, it must be by all who are in the office.

1374. (Mr. Lloyd Morgan.) This is a matter you cannot have knowledge of?—All I know is that the men did not receive what they had reckoned; that is all I have knowledge of, and who causes the robbery I do not know, and whether the foreman is only the second hand in it or not I cannot tell.

1375. (Mr. Orbell.) In your own particular case you have lodged complaints repeatedly, have you not?—Quite so.

1376. And in reference to this case of 480 tons which the men were told they would be paid for, which should be in your opinion 530 tons, I understood that the men had to stop work before they got any satisfaction?—Yes.

1377. And did they get paid after the stoppage for the 500 odd tons?—No, we got 17 tons more.

1378. What has happened to you personally in reference to losing work through speaking. Give us your own personal experience?—Through speaking I am practically boycotted. I am not going to say that in the coal department. I am boycotted because I go to work there, but when there is no work there I am not required up at the dock where I used to be required.

1379. (Mr. Gordon.) With regard to the first case you quoted, what is the total dead weight capacity of that boat?—The total carrying capacity?

1380. Yes?—What sort of coals—the ordinary coal which is Durham unscreened.

1381. Yes, the ordinary coal?—She would be 560 to 580—the after hold, 440 middle, and about 310 to 320 forward.

1382. Three holds?—Yes.

1383. Have you ever known a steamer to vary in regard to the contents of a hold when compared with another hold when carrying the same class of goods?—

Mr. A. E Clark.

13 Feb. 1908.

Yes, when they have had to come out to save tides and the likes of that, but then the holds are not full, and we know that when we go aboard.

1384. How were the other men paid in the other holds in this particular instance—were they paid more, or what?—No. They were paid about the general run.

1385. Was the shortage confined to one hold or was there a shortage on the whole ship?—It was only the hold that I was in personally.

1386. How were the other men paid; did you ever ask?—They got the general run.

1387. The men altogether were getting shortage on the whole ship?—No, only the one gang that was aft. We work by gangs.

1388. I know, but listen for a moment; say it was 470 tons. Do you know whether the other men were paid the ordinary quantity on the other holds?—Yes, quite so, they were paid the ordinary quantity.

1389. Was the vessel down to the ordinary water-mark, or was she short on that voyage?—She was down to the ordinary water-mark.

1390. You know that?—Yes, and the holds were full.

1391. Does she always fill with Durham unscreened?—That was house coal.

1392. We are speaking of Durham unscreened?—The forehold was not full of Durham unscreened. It is heavier coal. With a vessel like her, taking her all over, to fill her up full it would be about 70 tons, more of unscreened house coal.

1393. The boat you referred to is an old boat?—Yes.

1394. A very odd shape, and do not you know that coal will vary tremendously?—With heavy coal she never carries herself full.

1395. She would go out of trim, I suppose?—Yes. The men that were forward got paid for what they thought was about the fair complement for the general run of the vessel, but we aft knew we were short.

1396. Was the draught of the vessel the same as on the previous voyages?—Yes, about the general run.

1397. (Chairman.) Was the hold that you were working as full as the holds that the other men were working?—Yes, our hold was right full.

1398. Exactly the same kind of coal?—Yes.

1399. And yet you say you were paid short and they were not paid short?—Quite so.

1400. (Mr. Gordon.) Do the firm weigh at Tilbury?—Yes. Some goes on the quay.

1401. How do they weigh—by grabs?—No. As each tank comes out they have a proper weighing machine on the crane.

1402. Is it weighed on the quay?—No. If it goes on the quay it is not weighed. The other that goes in barges it would be easy to check, because we know the size of the barges. They come alongside the vessel. They get full. But as to the other that goes on the quay, we want to know where that goes to. We claim at the least 50 tons short.

1403. It is not weighed at all?—No. It is house coal that goes on the quay to be sold out retail.

1404. How do you suggest that the firm get paid for handling that coal, because most of it is not their own coal?—I cannot say anything at all about that. Then there is another steamer, a Newcastle steamer. The captain of that vessel tells us that whenever she goes up the Baltic or to Hamburg, or those places on the continent, he has at the least 580 to 600 tons in her middle hold. We have had to do that hold for 540 tons, and once 530.

1405. But does it not occur to you at once that that captain has not explained to you that when the boat goes to the Baltic it has a totally different quantity of bunkers from a boat coming to London?—Quite so, and it ought to be all the more.

1406. There would be less coal in the holds?—That is a different thing with regard to the bunkers, but we know when a hold is full. If it has 600 tons, and then comes to London, it ought to have more in the holds. It ought to make 620 when it comes to London or 630.

1407. They put a bulkhead in the hold?—Yes, but this vessel has not a bulkhead.

1408. But they put a bulkhead in the hold, you know?—Yes, they hundreds of them, 1409. (Mr. Mead.) What is your position—day workman or what?—Piece-work. Almost all coal discharged is piece-work.

1410, With regard to your first case, you knocked off work because you were not satisfied with the amount of coal which was declared to be in the after-hold?—Yes.

1411. It was declared to you as 480 and you were ultimately paid on 497?—We were paid on 17 tons more. In the first place the foreman told us there were 470 tons in the hold.

1412. What did he offer to pay you on?—On 487.

1413. You were paid ultimately on 487?—Yes.

1414. You are satisfied from your own knowledge that the men were paid on the ordinary quantity that the steamer carried in tde other two holds?—Yes.

1415. What is her dead weight—about 1,330 tons?—Something like that.

1416. So it was a question of 17 tons on 1,330?—We claim that at the least in that hold there were about 520 tons to 530. I havd had the working of her over 100 times, I dare say. It is not only once.

1417. You accepted payment on 17 tons?—Yes.

1418. That is about one and a half per cent. Why did you take payment on this amount?—Because we are helpless.

1419. If you are helpless how did you get the 17 tons?—All I can say is that we stopped work, and the foreman went to the office and came out again and told us that he had made a mistake, and 17 tons was put on top of it. But even then we knew that we were being robbed.

1420. You returned to work on that?—If we had had a weighman here to weigh the coals it would have different.

1421. You resumed work on being told that you should be paid 17 tons more?—We were not satisfied.

1422. But you resumed work?—We resumed work.

1423. Was this ship quite full?—Yes.

1424. In your experience of working coal steamers do you find that to all appearances they are full when their hatches are taken off but when you work down they are sometimes not full below?—Yes, quite so.

1425. Therefore the way in which a vessel may be trimmed at the port of loading may, unless her draught is known to be correct by cargo, only show an appearance that is very misleading?—Yes, but we do not go by the appearance of a vessel.

1426. But as you work down you find that she has spaces although she appears to be perfectly full?—Yes.

1427. (Mr. Orbell.) Was it the case that there were spaces when you got down in this particular cargo?—No.

1428. (Mr. Sexton.) Was this cargo properly trimmed?—Yes.

1429. Right full?—Yes.

1430. (Mr. Mead.) You say that the vessel was absolutely full all over?—Yes.

1431. Can you give us the name of the steamer with regard to the linseed?—It was not their steamers but their barges.

1432. Who was the cargo going to?—That I could not say. It was taken from barges to the shore.

1433. Being stowed?—Yes.

1434. How had it got into the barges?—Out of steamers—or it may have come down the river.

1435. Was the barge discharged from steamer in the dock or how did it come into the dock?—I could not say whether it was discharged from steamer in the dock or how it was brought into the dock.

1436. Can you give us the name of the barge?—I cannot.

1437. How can we refute this if you do not give the actual dates and facts?—Unfortunately I have not those dates and facts, but the time when it happened was about July or August last year.

1438. It did not happen to you personally?—No.

1439. It has been reported to you?—It has been reported to me.

1440. Therefore, as far as you personally are concerned, you have no knowledge of it?—No, quite so.

1441. It is hearsay?—Yes. When we are engaged we do not make inquiries to see where the cargo has come from, and all the likes of that. All we know is that we are told to do the work, and we do it.

1442. (Mr. Harrington.) Were the bags put out of the barge on to the quay?—Yes, or into the warehouse.

1443. (Mr. Lloyd-Morgan.) You know nothing about the linseed from your own personal knowledge?—No.

1444. Have you any personal knowledge with regard to the sugar question?—Not personally.

1445. All you know is with reference to coal?—Yes.

1446. You say that the men are afraid to make representations of their grievances?—Yes.

1447. You have made many complaints yourself?—Quite so, and, well, I have suffered from it.

1448. You are still employed, I suppose?—Yes, I am employed at my place.

1449. How have you suffered by making representations of grievances? What followed?—When there is no work at our place I am not wanted at other places where I use to be.

1450. (Chairman.) What do you call other places?—Other employers in the dock and round the dock.

1451. (Mr. Sexton.) As a matter of fact you are not now employed at the place where you made complaints?—No, I am not employed there now.

1452. And you do not get any work, I suppose, where you made the complaint?—No.

1453. (Mr. Bellhouse.) Do I understand that the different gangs in the holds are quite independent of one another?—Quite so.

1454. There is no method of hotch potch when you have unloaded a ship. Each gang is paid on what they themselves unload from a particular hold. They do not pool the tonnage?—No.

1455. You told us that the coal that is put on the quay is not weighed at all?—Quite so.

1456. How would you suggest that you could allocate between the three gangs if there are three holds in the ship the amount of coal that has been unloaded by any particular gang. I presume it is all put in one big pile on the quay?—Yes, but only this one gang puts it on the quay. The other two gangs that work on the vessel put it in barges.

1457. In the one case on to the quay and in the case of the other two into barges?—Yes.

1458. It would not go out from more than one hold at a time. My difficulty is this: If it is all put into one heap in any case on the quay it may be very difficult when you get the actual weight from the shipowner, which I take it is what you want, to allocate how much ought to go to each particular gang?—That is what we require—that each particular gang should be paid for what they do.

1459. (Mr. Sexton.) You do not understand the question. Do you ascertain the tonnage in each hatch?—When they are not weighed?

1460. Yes?—We go by our previous experience on these vessels. If it was a strange vessel we should not be any wiser, and could not be. The only thing we could say would be that the coals were very light. We know the number of tanks.

1461. (Mr. Bellhouse.) The object of the inquiry is that you shall have something in writing to show you what is in each hold. Where is that information coming from then if the coal is all piled up together in a heap on the quay?—It would not matter to us if it was piled up in a heap on the quay.

1462. How would you know how much No. 1 hatch has done and how much No. 2 hatch has done. Where would you get that information?—I have never seen yet two hatches together shot on the quay. It is only one hold at a time.

1463. (Mr. Orbell.) As a matter of fact do you know of any case where they take cargo from two distinct holds and put it in one bulk on the quay?—Yes. We will take, for example, Beckton Gas Works. The system there of working is this: It comes out of the vessel, goes over a weighbridge, and each tank of coal is tallied as it comes out. It is averaged as 12 cwts. When it exceeds that each gang gets the quantity over, and if it goes under, each gang gets the quantity under.

1464. But I want to know this: Coming closer, where they put the coals in bulk on the quay, is it the general custom to take each hold in the ship and place the cargo separately on the quay, or some overside into a lighter or trucks and some on the quay, or do they put the whole lot from all three holds in one bulk on the quay?—No; they only put one on the quay, the other goes in lighters.

1465. There may be exceptions; that is, generally speaking?—Yes.

1466. Therefore there would not be the difficulty with regard to the various gangs that Mr. Bellhouse mentioned?—No.

1467. (Mr. Wignall.) Is it within your knowledge that all the coal put into the steamer is weighed to the lb. at the port of departure, and the captain knows absolutely within a lb.; how much coal is in every hatch of the ship when she leaves the port of departure?—Yes.

1468. Do you know that?—Yes.

1469. And you know that there must be in somebody's possession a document showing almost to the lb. the amount of coal on that ship in every hatch?—Yes.

1470. Take, for instance, Welsh coal coming to London. If they leave Cardiff, Barry, Swansea or Penarth, the captain or mate of the ship knows exactly almost to the lb. how much coal he has in the ship and how much is in every hatch?—Yes.

1471. And he ought to be in a position to produce a document to show how much coal the ship took in?—Yes.

1472. And how much is in every hatch?—Yes.

1473. (Mr. Bellhouse.) Are men paid by the draught when they are loading into barges?—No; they are paid by the tonnage.

1474. Did not you say something different?—The barges are marked to take so much.

1475. That mark would not be very accurate. It might be affected by bilge water?—I could not say anything with regard to that.

1476. (Mr. Anderson.) I did not hear what your statement was, but did you suggest that sometimes when the barge was not fully loaded they estimated the quantity in the barge by the draught. You know that that is done very often?—Yes, that is done.

1477. (Mr. Gordon.) In dealing with the London coal trade you are dealing with coasting vessels generally?—Yes, quite so.

1478. Take, for instance, the north country trade. Have you any knowledge whatever of the mode of shipping coals at Tyne Dock?—Yes.

1479. Have you been there?—Yes.

1480. Do you know the weight of a truck of coal?—The trucks vary.

1481. Approximately. Give me a general idea of the weight of a truck of coal?—I could not say that at all.

1482. Take it from me that it is about 30 tons. Do you know the mode of shipment of coal?—Yes.

1453. How is it shipped?—It comes along the jetty and is put into the steamers.

Mr. A. E. Clark.

13 Feb. 1908.

1484. In the Tyne Dock?—Yes.

1485. When a hold is considered to contain sufficient, do you know that the shoot is stopped at the end?—Yes.

1486. And no account of the weight in the shoot exists. You do not know whether it holds 30 or 50 tons?—No.

1487. How do you know the weight that is going into the next hold at the start?—You are asking me now of what I have very little experience of.

1488. But you made a definite statement?—I have seen it, it is true, but I have not worked there, and I cannot give you anything like that.

1489. You stated definitely that the mate of the vessel knew exactly how much there was in each hold, when you spoke as to the general custom with regard to each steamer that came to London?—No, I never said that at all. I did not say that the mate knows definitely. From the ship's papers the owners of the vessel or someone on the vessel knows what is put into her.

1490. In each hold?—Yes.

1891. Do you know from your own knowledge that they know that?—Yes, 1492. How do you know that?—Because the mate told us.

1493. That he knows what is in each hold?—Yes.

1494. As a shipper, I can tell you that I do not know it, and my captains do not know it, and it is impossible to know it?—With regard to being a cwt. or two cwts., or a ton or two, I cannot speak to that.

1495. 20 or 30 tons?—It cannot be 20 or 30 tons.

1496. (Mr. Bellhouse.) Are gangs removed from one ship to another, before the unloading of any particular ship is completed?—No.

1497. You always complete a ship?—We always complete a vessel.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. J. Sexton.

Mr. James Sexton (a member of the Committee) examined.

1498. (Chairman.) You are general secretary of the National Union of Dock Labourers?—Yes.

1499. For how long have you been in that position?—Since 1893.

1500. What was your previous occupation?—Dock labourer.

1501. What area does your union cover?—It covers Goole in Yorkshire, Liverpool, Preston, Fleetwood, Heysham, Ireland, and Scotland.

1502. Can you tell us about the number of members your union contains?—I cannot give it accurately now, but I should say about 20,000.

1503. What proportion of those men are engaged in piece-work?—I should say 60 per cent.

1504. Have you had brought before you any complaints of the men not receiving their full amount on piece-work?—Yes—continually—of a general character.

1505. How often?—Every week.

1506. What is the general nature of the complaints?—The general nature is that they cannot get any evidence, no matter how they may ask for it, except in some special cases which I will mention, of the actual amount of tonnage that they work. The complaints refer to ballast gravel and sand, slag, macadam, iron ore, coal, and, in some cases, standards—timber measurements and grain. The general complaint is that there are no means of getting to know, and if they ask for it it is point-blank refused, except in special cases which I will mention as an example of what can be done.

1507. Would you tell us who it is that employs the men?—In a great measure it is the contractor. There are some firms that employ their own men direct, but they are only few in number. I may say, with respect to Liverpool, that the tonnage system is on the decrease; it is gradually disappearing.

1508. What is it precisely that the men require?—They require, I should say, an extension of the principle, where possible, of the checkweighman's system, or, as an alternative, the production of some document after their work is done to certify the exact amount of tonnage discharged or loaded.

1509. Are you of opinion that in all cases it would be possible for the employers to produce documentary evidence of the weights in question?—I think it would.

1510. Have you any instances in your own mind where it would not be possible?—The difficulty would be with respect to general cargoes.

1511. I was going to ask about general cargoes. Are the men who are engaged in loading and unloading general cargoes generally employed by piece-work?—In our case very very few.

1512. But supposing they were employed by piece-work, would it be possible in every instance, taking into consideration the mixed cargo that they would have to handle, and the very large number of bills of lading, to present to the men a statement?—I think it would in course of time. It is a question of how long.

1513. We have heard of cases where the actual weight of a cargo is not known for some weeks, or even months, after the ship is unloaded. Would the men be satisfied to have an adjustment when those actual figures were produced?—I think they would if they could not get it before.

1514. I am assuming that they cannot get it before?—If they were sure that they would eventually get it, and if some satisfactory evidence was produced. I think they would be satisfied.

1515. I think you mentioned the other day that you could have brought many more witnesses and fuller evidence to establish cases of grievance?—Yes, I could. I have their statements here signed.

1516. But you thought it wiser not to do that because you heard that in principle the Committee had agreed to accede to the men's demand?—Yes, and it would be overlapping. They would give practically the same evidence. Some of the cases stated here are cases of fact.

1517. May we consider that, so far as the men whom you represent are concerned, the case is closed?—Except that I want to give you a few cases here, that is all.

1518. Will you kindly give those?—Take Burntisland and Methven, two coal ports in Scotland. The evidence from both of these places is to the effect that there is not the slightest difficulty on the part of the men in both of these ports to get the exact weight. They get it from the railway offices. The foreman gets it for them and gives it to them, and there is no difficulty about it at all. In Grangemouth, strange to say, there is a difficulty. There is the same kind of work done in Grangemouth and there is a difficulty in the men getting to know the tonnage, because when they ask for it it is refused. With regard to Bowness the same thing applies. There is no difficulty there, as, of course, the union is pretty strong, and there is only one firm who refuse to give the information. Mr. James Carlow, our branch secretary, says: "This "company has repeatedly refused to show us the bills "or proper weights." As far as the rest of our piece-work is concerned, he says: "When discharging a "cargo the men get the weigh-bill from the weigher. "They take it to the pay office themselves, and they "are paid on the weigh-bill they get. In Grange-"mouth this is not done." Our secretary in Londonderry, Mr. W. J. McNulty, says that they have two systems of discharging coal there—sometimes by the crane, when the men are not paid for as full an amount as when it is worked by hand. They have no method of finding out how much except when it is worked by hand. He goes to the men who weigh the coal at the weighbridge, but they refuse to give it to him. The employers say that they are paying on the bills of lading, but they never show them. One boat comes to Derry two or three times a week, and when she is weighed by hand the men receive 20 tons more than when she is put out by the crane. The employers have stopped the men who weigh the coals over the bridges from giving our men the amounts they weigh out of each boat. The captains and mates of boats have been told not to give the weights. The amounts used to be obtained from the captains or mates, or even from the men who weigh over the bridges, or firms who have no interest in the output, who used to give it, but that is all stopped? It has been stopped lately. We have had repeatedly cases where boats have been weighed by beams, and the employer has reduced the amount weighed out by 20 tons, and said that she was that amount over her bills of lading. That is in Derry. There is one case from our secretary in Preston. He gives the name of the shipowner and that of the shipbroker. Three or four months ago the men asked for the right and were refused. Afterwards, however, when the men protested, they were paid 1*s.* 6*d.* per head extra. A steamer from Hamburg was loaded with wood for paving streets. This was put upon waggons. The men were engaged on piece-work. They were not paid for the weight loaded up, and when they asked for the bill of lading or the manifest it was refused. From Drogheda Robert Nugent, branch secretary, writes on the 15th:—"I went on Saturday "last to a firm where two coal-boats were discharging. "I saw the manager, and asked to see the weigh-bills, "and he wanted to know what business it was of mine. "He told me that they pay a lump sum to one man, "and he divides the tonnage money amongst them, but "he would not let me see the weigh-bills." Another case is a man of the name of Johnson, who asked his employer to show the weigh-bill of the boat he was discharging. He was refused, and dismissed from employment. This man went to the Customs House, and paid to see the bills, which were 20 tons short. After the boat had discharged 250 tons it was only paid on 230. He writes on 7th December: "I went to the "Customs House to inquire about the weigh-bills of a "Newry steamer laden with coal. The officer went to "the employer and asked to see the weigh-bills. The "Customs House officer came back and told me the "exact amount of tonnage, but I did not see the weigh-"bill. This boat discharged 385 tons in one firm one "day, and in another firm the following day 370. "There is another boat, the ————, of Newry, which "discharges 340 tons in one firm and 214 tons in "another. It has been proved in this case to be "26 tons short each time, I could multiply these, but "I do not think it is necessary."

1519. (Mr. Hardy.) Is this all coal?—It is all coal.

1520. (Chairman.) Have you, as a leading trade union official, brought any of these cases before the employers?—I could give you half-a-dozen cases which I have brought before the employer himself, and where I have been ordered out of the place. That is four or five years ago.

1521. Did you attend any of the deputations to the Home Secretary, when they appeared before him to present the workmen's grievances?—Yes. I put the case myself to the late Lord Ritchie when he was Home Secretary, as a member of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress.

1522. (Mr. Bellhouse.) I am looking at this, of course, entirely from an administrative point of view. You say that you think that there would be no difficulty in producing documents. Do you suggest that this should be a compulsory production, or that they should only be asked for where wanted?—I should make it compulsory. Anything else would be useless.

1523. Is there always an office or some place of that sort, where such notices could be affixed or in evidence? I had some little experience in Dublin, and I know that there some of the stevedores were in a very small way of business, and I do not think they had any offices at all?—Yes, but in every case I think the employer, whether he be a shipowner employing direct or a contractor, even in loading, surely has a shipping note to which he can get access.

1524. But I take it you do not want that the men should have to go to ask for this; you want it put up somewhere?—I would not go so far as that. There could be no objection, of course, to its being put up—it would be much better if it was—but I think if a representative of the men were to ask for it in a respectful manner, it ought to be shown to him.

1525. Yes, but there have been a great many complaints in the evidence that has been given, that the fact of asking has led to non-employment. Do you think that if it was made compulsory by law that these things should be produced, you would get rid of the difficulty of non-employment?—You would not where the men individually have to ask, but as far as the organised trades are concerned, a paid representative of the men would ask. I have no objection to its being posted up.

1526. But you do not think it absolutely necessary?—No.

1527. Take this case: I go down to visit a ship; I presume you consider that this proposed provision would be enforced by the factory inspector. These things generally fall on him in the result. How am I, as a factory inspector, unless you make it compulsory to hang the information up, to get any evidence as to whether the men are getting the particulars as required?—I admit that there is a very great difficulty in that case. If I may say so, trying to be absolutely fair, although I cannot be impartial, our chaps are not angels any more than the employers. I do not want to diagnose their faults. If you put a power (to be perfectly frank) like that in their hands, for a gang of men to demand (supposing we will say there are 40 or 50), the number of tons of ballast in a ship's hold, there are some cases where it would not work. I will tell you how. A ship has taken ballast from a rubbish heap—broken bricks and earth—each cartload is weighed over a weighbridge. The only test you would have there would be the total of the tickets of the weighbridge after the job was completed. Then, you see, the men would have to wait until the job was completed; it might be a day or two days; and then they would go to the weighbridge and get the total weight of broken bricks or rubbish and then come down and post it up. But if it were compulsory to put up the particulars of weight in a case like that, the difficulty would be that these men, knowing that they had the right to do it, might knock off the job at once until each weigh-bill was posted up as the cart went over the machine. That is the only difficulty I see, but in a general sense I think you are right.

1528. A witness certainly told us (I think he came from Cardiff) that the gangs do not always complete a ship. They may be moved on from one to another?—Mr. Wignall said that that is not so in his case, but it is so in ours.

1529. Do you, in your experience, know of such cases?—I know such cases in Aberdeen.

1530. If they are moved from ship to ship, and you cannot get the weights at the time, how are you going to allocate your wages amongst the different gangs?—When a man commences a job on tonnage, unless he commits himself, he should be allowed to finish it and should not be shifted.

1531. But I understand that in practice it is not so?—Generally speaking it is, but there are cases where it is not.

1532. I mean where a whole gang is shifted?—Do you mean where the gang is moved by the employer from a hatch or ship that is not finished?

1533. Yes.—It is almost impossible to ascertain the exact amount of tonnage that that man has put out. The general rule is that a man finishes a hatch.

1534. I want to know what the remedy is. How will you allocate the wages amongst the different gangs?—In a case like that it is impossible.

1535. (Chairman.) How is it done to-day?—The men take the bull by the horns, and say, "If you are "going to shift us from this hatch, then we are going "to be paid on all that is in it."

1536. (Mr. Bellhouse.) Where the shipowner is paid on dead weight, and the men discharge on measurement weight, where are you going to get your paper or your notice in writing to show what the actual measurement weight is?—Personally I have not had much experience of payment by weight or measurement.

1537. How do you propose to arrive at the particulars to enable the men to be paid measurement weight?—There should be some system of either accepting measurement or dead weight.

1538. Would the men be willing to provide an expert measurer in such cases?—Speaking generally, I think that where the work is all done by piece-work they would. It would pay them to do it.

1539. Can you suggest any other solution, because that is one of the difficulties?—That would meet it.

1540. Would it be possible to have a contract in writing for each of the cases?—My reply to that is that where the cargo is handled wholesale in the way spoken of by Mr. Wignall, if the men desire to appoint a measurer or a weigher they should have the privilege of doing it legally.

1541. You would not be satisfied with an agreement on each occasion?—No; I do not think it would act at all. It would cause trouble and confusion if you did that.

1542. (Mr. Scrutton.) The difficulty you have at present is not the settlement, but the basis of the settlement. It is merely that the men do not get settlement on the proper tonnage?—That is so.

1543. The settlements go through all right?—Yes.

1544. (Mr. Hardy.) You speak principally of coals and bulk cargoes of that kind?—Coals, minerals, and grain.

1545. Is the difficulty pretty much confined to that class of cargo?—In our case, yes.

1546. Take for instance a cargo of Yankee notions such as they have at Liverpool. You do not suggest that all that can be weighed?—We work that as day-work.

1547. But it is conceivable that it might be worked by some sort of piece-work somewhere. You do not suggest, I suppose, that cargo which could not be weighed or measured in the ordinary course could be weighed or measured for this purpose?—It would be very difficult I admit.

1548. (Mr. Gordon.) With regard to dead-weight cargoes, you are aware that the shipowner gets paid on the total dead-weight the ship discharges?—Yes.

1549. No record, as far as he is concerned, is kept of the output of each hold?—But is it not a fact, that the total weight that the ship carries is registered?

1550. Yes; but as a matter of fact the shipowner only receives payment on the total output. He does not know what comes out of each hold; there is no evidence of that, nor is their any evidence kept by the receiver even?—But there is a ship's plan showing the weight of each hatch.

1551. With dead-weight cargo that would be of no value to the men or the shipowner?—With regard to nitre, for instance, there is a manifest for each hatch; that is dead-weight cargo.

1552. That is exceptional cargo?—There is a ship's plan showing the amount of weight for each hatch.

1553. No?—I understand there is.

1554. No, you may take it from me that it is not so?—Very well.

1555. Taking generally dead-weight cargoes the shipowner receives freight on the total output of the vessel, and in 19 out of 20 cases he knows nothing of what is in each hold?—I think that the difficulty can be met in this way. Of course it would require a lapse of time, but the consignee knows what he is getting.

1556. He knows the total he is getting, but he does not know what has come out of each hold. The gangs in each hold want to be paid a certain sum of money, and neither the receiver of the cargo nor the shipowner has evidence on that point?—There are what they call counters off—the men who check the cargo. They have a book of each hatch.

1557. Whose man is this?—He is employed by the consignee or the stevedore or the contractor. He has to give a tally of the hatch. There will be no difficulty in getting the counters off books when the ship is discharged, and totalling each book up for each hatch.

1558. But there again you are dealing more with packed cargoes, but take the case of dead-weight bulk cargoes—coal or iron ore or phosphate—where there is no such record kept at each hatch, and where neither the shipowner nor the receiver of that cargo knows what has come out of each hatch. How do you propose to deal with that, because, after all, the contract of the foreman stevedore with the men has nothing to do with his contract with the shipowner?—I know there is a difficulty there, but, if I might suggest it, it might be met in this way. I know that in Bilbao and the Spanish ports each hatch is checked by the mine-owner. A tally is kept, then it is easy.

1559. In some instances certainly, but from your experience is it not a fact that, from the shipowner's point of view, it is absolutely unreliable, because there are no trades where there are greater disputes than the ore trade as between the shipowner and the receiver?—But there is a tally kept of each hatch.

1560. (Chairman.) How are the men paid to-day?—They are paid on the tonnage of each hatch.

1561. How is the weight ascertained?—They ask the mate or the captain and he says "There is so much "in that hatch, and so much in that hatch."

1562. Is it guess-work?—They have to take his word for it.

1563. (Mr. Gordon.) But it may be incorrect. He may tell you approximately, but he does not know absolutely?—Where men are constantly employed on iron ore they should have the privilege of the extension of the checkweighman's system and appoint their own checkweighman or their own official to ascertain the weights at each hatch.

1564. You are discharging ore into trucks, say, at Middlesbrough, and these trucks are not weighed until they get some distance from the vessel; perhaps 100 yards. There is no record kept as to which hatch the cargo has come from?—The checkweigher can keep a record.

1565. How?—He can mark the truck.

1566. Do you propose that your men should do this?—Yes, where the men are constantly employed on that kind of work. The shipowner pays so much a ton on the entire capacity of the vessel to a master stevedore, and that master stevedore pays the men on each hatchway, which is a totally different thing, and that is where the difficulty arises.

1567. The employer or his man could mark the trucks "No. 1 hatch," "No. 2 hatch," "No. 3 hatch," or the men themselves could.

1568. (Mr. Scrutton.) Do not you think it would be sufficient if the men knew the total weight out of a ship. They could settle the matter amongst themselves?—The difficulty there would be that you would have to pool the whole of the tonnage.

1569. But if the employer furnished the total weight could not they get over the difficulty?—I think they could average the whole thing if that was done.

1570. (Mr. Mead.) Would you be satisfied that, if required by the men, the employer of the labour should furnish you with a certificate of the amount of the entire cargo loaded or discharged; and if the cargo is not weighed or measured before or during the loading or during or after discharge, the workmen will accept the settlement of their wages on the weight on which the carrier receives his payment of freight?—I think that that would meet the case. I understand exactly your question: if the employers produce documents of a satisfactory character, showing the exact amount of weight or measurement, should we be satisfied with that?

1571. Yes; perhaps you would like to defer your answer so that I can show you exactly what I mean?—I cannot give any other answer than I have given. We should be satisfied.

1572. I believe that where a worthless man is in the habit of living by making a profit out of working men in a dishonest way, you, representing the men, desire to see him disappear?—Yes.

1573. This would have the effect of making it not worth his while to go on?—Yes, that is the remedy. As a matter of fact, the present system pays that kind of man.

1574. The present system makes it possible—we will put it in that way?—Yes.

Mr. James Anderson (a member of the Committee) examined.

Mr. J. Anderson.

1575. (Chairman.) How many men are members of your union?—3,600.

1576. Is the membership confined to London?—Yes, to the port of London.

1577. Entirely?—It includes Tilbury.

1578. For how long have you been an official of the union?—For 13 years general secretary.

1579. About how often have you heard complaints from men that they have not received the full money due to them?—Continually, ever since I have been in office.

1580. How many times a month?—Sometimes two or three times in a week.

1581. Has the question of having a check on the amount of the men's wages been discussed by the union?—We have supported the motion before congress for a number of years past.

1582. What is the opinion of the men on the subject?—They feel that they are not paid correctly, and they complain of not having access to the correct figures.

1583. Are there any special points in connection with work in London which you wish to put before us?—So far as our work is concerned we see no difficulty whatever in the correct figures being supplied to the men within a reasonable time after the work is performed.

1584. Can you suggest any particular forms of cargo where there would be difficulty in the employers of the men providing the necessary documents?—No, we do not know of any.

1585. In your capacity as a trade union official have you brought any of these grievances before the notice of the employers?—I have spoken to employers from time to time, and where, by some means or other, we have been able to get hold of the correct figures and present the account to the employer, it has always been met without any dispute. I have a list of cases here.

1586. Is it your opinion that if there were a statutory liability upon the employers to produce documents the grievances would disappear?—Yes. I will give you a list of a few cases which have occurred. I have only gone back to 1900. These are comparatively small amounts.

1587. If you would give us a case or two which occurred last year, and say in your evidence that you could produce so many in other years, that would be sufficient?—These are the only cases where we have been able to get the correct figures. We say that the cases where we have not been able to get the correct figures are much more numerous. I will not take you very far back. There is a small matter here in 1904, July 12th. The men got some figures; I presented them to Mr. Harrington, who is in the room now, and he paid me the balance due to the men. That was 13*s.* 4*d.* That is a comparatively small amount. I have before me a claim against a steamship for 3*l.* 19*s.* This amount is due to perhaps seven or eight men. It is rather an important matter. Here is a case against a steamship for 6*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.*

1588. These are cases where the men had been underpaid?—Where the men had been underpaid. The men, through their officials, got the correct figures.

1589. (Mr. Bellhouse.) Each man or the gang?—6*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* due to eight men.

1590. (Mr. Harrington.) Was it timber?—No; general cargo.

1591. Was the other case general cargo?—Yes; general cargo also. There is quite a recent one, July 27th, 1907, a vessel discharging phosphate rock. One gang discharged 689 tons and they were paid for 655 tons. I got the corrected figures and received the balance 1*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* due to eight men. A case occurred this year where the men were paid for 225 tons out of the after hold, and the captain told them he knew there were 280 tons in the after hold.

1592. (Chairman.) Has that been remedied?—No, it has not been remedied, and the men have no remedy.

1593. (Mr. Scrutton.) Did you get the total weight?—We did not trouble about the weights of the other hatches.

1594. If you had got the total weight that would have settled the question?—I do not think it would.

1595. You would have evidence of exactly what the ship turned out then?—We have had the total weights over and over again, and we have found that the men have been paid considerably less than what she has been manifested.

1596. That is quite possible?—When the total weight on the manifest has been pointed out to the employer he has said, "You cannot go by the manifest," and we know that you cannot.

1597. That is quite right?—When we have taken the total weights that the men have been paid on for the whole of the ship they have been sometimes as much as 200 tons more than the manifest showed.

1598. (Mr. Mead.) But in this case there is nothing to show that the men were underpaid?—The captain who saw the stuff put into the ship knows within a few tons what is put down.

1599. What month was that?—January 1908.

1600. Have you the figures for the whole ship?—No, I have not the figures for the whole ship.

1601. I want to know the entire weight of the ship?—The only figures supplied to me are the figures with regard to that particular gang. I might say that in London each gang is paid separately for what they do, but we do not anticipate any difficulty in that direction in London, because an account is kept of the barges which are loaded out of the different hatches. Take the case of a phosphate rock cargo which I have done a great deal of myself; an account is kept by either the foreman or the ship's clerk of the barges which are loaded out of that ship and of the particular hatchways that they are loaded from. The barges are taken to their destination. When by some miscalculation or other the men have been overpaid, the employer has always been in a position to give us a list of the barges and the exact weights of the cargo within a pound.

1602. (Chairman.) So you say that, conversely, he could do it in the case of under-payment?—Yes.

1603. (Mr. Scrutton.) Did you apply for that information?—We have an outstanding dispute with that firm and he has point-blank refused to pay. It has been standing over for nine months and I know it is absolutely useless to apply to him. I have brought their case before him, the thing is still going on, and I am convinced that when the correct weights are brought forward we shall find that the captain's estimate is much nearer the mark than the employer's.

1604. (Mr. Harrington.) Phosphate rock and copper ore when not weighed on board are weighed on the wharf?—Yes.

1605. The bill of lading is always on the ship?—Yes.

Mr. J. Anderson.

13 Feb. 1908.

1606. It is always possible to get the weight from the wharf?—No, it is not.

1607. Have you ever tried?—Yes. That leads me to the other point which was made by our witnesses and which I can confirm by my own personal experience, and that is that until about five years ago, by going to the various wharves, I could get the weights from the weigh clerk. It meant a small honorarium, but we did not mind that. Now I am absolutely refused point-blank any information respecting the weights of barges discharged.

1608. (Mr. Lloyd Morgan.) How has this change come about?—By some mysterious means which I am not able to probe.

1609. Has it arisen from some dispute with the authorities?—I could not tell you. I can only say that the change has come about, and it is universal.

1610. (Mr. Harrington.) Until a short time ago was it not practically one master stevedore who did the whole of the phosphate rock work?—I cannot say that.

1611. Practically?—Up to 10 years ago one man had practically the handling of the whole of the bulk phosphate or copper ore, but now there are three or four men on the market.

1612. Is it not usual to pay out on the bill of lading?—It is not. It was at one time; it is not now. These different men cut one another up to get into shipowners' offices, and then they try to take it out of the men at the finish. Where at one time the master stevedores were prepared to pay out on the bill of lading and take the chance of overpaying on one job and making it up on the next, now they will pay 200 tons short, say, and say "She is bound not to turn out her full weight." They keep 200 or 300 tons in hand, but you never hear anything of it afterwards, 1613. (Chairman.) Do not they adjust afterwards?—No, except where by mischance they overpay, I have never known a case where a master stevedore has voluntarily come forward and said, "You did not get "enough on that last ship; here is the balance." The only time they come forward with the figures is where they overpay.

1614. (Mr. Scrutton.) Do the men pay anything back?—Yes. Where our men have been overpaid, and that has been satisfactorily proved by the employers, the men always pay it back.

1615. (Chairman.) Have you ever had any difficulty in getting them to pay it back?—No. We have pretty good control over our members, and when they know they have to pay, they pay.

1616. (Mr. Larkin.) Is there any necessity for stevedores at all in this particular work?—One or two firms are managing without them.

1617. (Mr. Mead.) Is the whole of your experience confined to the lower river?—The docks and the river.

1618. How far up the river do you come?—Up to the Tower Bridge.

1619. As far as the Tower Bridge, but not beyond?—No.

1620. You heard the question I asked Mr. Sexton: would you be satisfied that, if required by the men, the employer shall furnish a certificate of the amount of the entire cargo, loaded or discharged, and if the cargo is not weighed or measured before or during the loading or during or after the discharge, the workmen will accept the settlement of their wages on the weight that the carrier receives his payment of freight?—Yes, except in the cases where the master stevedore has a proper settlement on the actual weights later on, where the actual weights are obtainable.

1621. The actual weight is what the freight is payable on, is it not?—Yes.

1622. I said on the weight upon which the carrier receives his payment for freight?—I want to make it perfectly clear that what would satisfy us is the production by the employer, as soon as possible, of a document showing the actual amount of tonnage that he is paid for, but I do not want any such provision as this: "if required by the men." It should be compulsory.

1623. The men have to ask for it if they want it, have they not?—I would not make it obligatory on the men or any person to ask for it before it is produced I think it should be compulsory on the part of the employer to produce it, and there should be a penalty for supplying false information or not producing it at all.

1624. I have asked you that leading question. Subject to certain qualifications, the arrangement indicated in my question would satisfy you, would it not?—Yes, that would satisfy us, the production of a document showing the amount of tonnage that the employer was paid for.

Mr. J. Wignall.

Mr. JAMES WIGNALL (a member of the Committee) examined.

1625. Chairman What is your official position?—General Organiser to the Dock Wharf Riverside and Workers' Union.

1626. How many men are there in your union?—Approximately between 16,000 and 17,000 men.

1627. For how long have you been in that position?—I have been in my present position about eight years. Previous to that I was district secretary for about 10 years.

1628. What area does your union cover?—We cover the whole of South Wales, parts of London and the north-east coast and various centres throughout the country.

1629. What proportion of your members are paid by piece-work?—Confining myself to South Wales, where my work largely lies, I should say that 90 per cent of the men employed at docks in loading, discharging, or handling cargo would be paid on the piece-work system.

1630. Do you have many complaints from the men that they are not satisfied with the amount of wages they received?—Yes, we have very many complaints, but in some parts the complaints are considerably less; for instance, at Barry Dock, where the middleman or contractor is almost entirely unknown, things are pretty well settled down to peace and contentment. The men are satisfied. They get the weights from the office where they want them. Then in Swansea, again, where the contractor has been removed and the Harbour Trust do the work, the men are perfectly well satisfied that the company would not do them out of the tonnage. The complaints centre more on the middleman, the man of straw who comes in, gets on board ship, and by some mysterious means gets the work, and then we get trouble with him.

1631. To what do you attribute the cause of these grievances?—First of all there is the general feeling among the men that there is no guarantee that they get paid for what they handle. That is getting less, as I say; but taking the contractor, the middleman, that comes in between the men and the shipowner, they can get no satisfaction from such men at all.

1632. Do I understand that it is the shipowner who lets out the contract to a middleman, and that the middleman does not treat the men fairly in every instance?—No. He gives them no satisfaction at all.

1633. If the men had a statutory right to demand a document showing the precise amount of weight which the employer was paid for, would that satisfy the men?—Undoubtedly; that is all we want. To take a case in point; only last Wednesday, some men working for ———— came rushing along the street to me, "We "are paid a certain amount of tonnage short, how are "we going to get it?" We could get no satisfaction out of the employer. I do not know whether they have got it yet. We left that to our district secretary to handle.

1634. You could have brought a greater number of witnesses and given fuller evidence to establish the grievances, I understand?—Yes. Fortunately the fear of victimisation is unknown to us in South Wales. We have a system there that is entirely different from that in vogue at the London Docks and other large centres.

1635. I understand that as the Committee generally agree to accept the principle of the men's demand, you refrain from calling more witnesses?—Yes. We have covered the district very well and whatever other evidence there might be would only overlap and be repetition.

1636. Have you, as a trades union official, brought these cases to the notice of employers?—Covering the last 10 years, hundreds, if not thousands of cases.

1637. With what response?—It was a daily occurrence when the work was largely given out to contract. We never could get satisfactory information if we applied to the brokers' or the shipowners' representatives. As district secretary, in many scores of cases, I have written to the shipowners or brokers. They could give no information, We have gone to the Customs and paid half-a-crown or 5*s.*, as the case might be, for the ship's manifest, and we have resorted to every means and have taken cases to court. That has been largely removed by the disappearance of the middleman, but for seven or eight years I had a very very busy time.

1638. As far as your district is concerned may we take it that your case is closed?—Yes, unless you like to call for more evidence. We have any amount more evidence. I might explain that in Cardiff there is a question of discharging iron ores. Take the Dowlais Company who deal with an enormous quantity. We have no trouble with them if they do the work themselves, but where they give it out to a contractor we have trouble. In several cases the Dowlais Iron Company have got the weights and they give us almost to the exact lb. the stuff that has been taken out of the ship, and in most cases we have had balances of money paid to the men. They have a record of practically every ton that comes out of the ship, and what hatch it comes out of.

1639. (Mr. Mead.) The total cargo?—I say every ton that comes out of every hatch.

1640. (Chairman.) Where is the weighing done?—I take it that it is weighed on the railway or on their own weighbridge.

1641. Is it weighed by the Dowlais people?—It is probably weighed on their own weighbridge in the works. There is the fact that when we have gone to them and they have agreed to check off the cargo they have been able to give us almost to the lb. the weight of the cargo and the hatch it has come out of, and in many cases the contractors have paid the men various sums of money claimed. Invariably we have found that the men were right in their claim.

1642. (Mr. Mead.) Really, what you have in your mind is that without in any way hampering trade you wish to have just means found whereby the men may be satisfied that they are receiving payment on the amount of work which they have actually done?—Precisely. That is exactly my position and the position of the men. I should like, if it can be brought about in our finding, that there should be some permissive arrangement by which men, if they so desire, could appoint a checkweigher similar to what is done in the mines—not compulsory, but permissive to the men if they desire to do so.

1643. (Mr. Hardy.) That is, in cases where weighing is done at present?—Yes, and from my experience I do not know where it is not done. In the districts I cover they are always exact in weighing cargoes in and out.

1644. But I want to know whether you suggest that it should be done where weighing is not now done?—So far as my knowledge goes, I do not know what is not weighed. I cannot find out.

1645. (Mr. Mead.) You agree that weighing should not be specially done to arrive at the payment of wages?—Yes, but where the stuff is weighed out now, if the men desire to appoint a checkweigher they should have the right to do it.

1646. (Mr. Bellhouse.) As regards general cargoes, is not your district peculiarly situated; is not nearly everything paid piece-work?—Yes, nearly everything is paid piece-work.

1647. Do you foresee any difficulty in connection with general cargoes in getting particulars from the shipowner or any other people that would not occur with bulk cargo?—Really, I have never found a difficulty. Take Swansea, for instance, where we have a lot of general cargo imported or exported. Sometimes it is a very mixed cargo. When the office take the trouble to satisfy us if we ask them to do so—and in most cases they do—they can give us every information, we find, almost to the last lb. of stuff in the boat.

1648. You do not think that there is more difficulty with general cargo than there is with bulk cargo?—As far as the Harbour Trust goes, we have no difficulty at all. It is the other fellows that make the trouble, and, in my opinion, middlemen are the cause of all the trouble.

Adjourned for a short time.

Mr. Owen Wade, called and examined.

Mr. O. Wade.

1649. (Chairman.) What is your exact position?—I am official district delegate of the National Amalgamated Union of Labour.

1650. I understand that your union act as contractors for the North-Eastern Railway Company?—Yes.

1651. Are you employed by the railway company?—No, I am not employed by the North-Eastern Railway Company, but our members are employed by the North-Eastern Railway Company.

1652. What are their precise duties?—The precise duty is discharging iron ore, loading up plate-iron, bricks, pig-iron, or anything of the sort.

1653. The members of the trade union, I understand, are paid by the railway company?—Yes; we have the price that they would pay to the stevedore. The men have the same price that the stevedore would have.

1654. And so they save the middleman's profit?—Yes.

1655. The workmen get the benefit of that?—Yes.

1656. Does the system answers satisfactorily?—Yes.

1657. Have the men any complaints?—The men have not any complaints to make.

1658. Are they allowed to see the docmments?—We are not allowed to see the documents. We get the weights from the railway company. They give the men the weight that goes over the bars. It is weighed by the company it is consigned to, such as the Consett Iron Company and other companies.

1659. What do the men see?—They get a return of the amount of tonnage which has been put out of No. 1, No. 2, or No. 3 hold.

1660. Were you asked to give evidence on behalf of the men?—Yes.

1661. What do you wish to convey to the Committee?—I wish to convey to the Committee that it is essential that we should see the documents. The men acting for the North-Eastern Railway Company are not our only members. We have other sections of our members who are employed in loading and discharging vessels which come to the Tyne.

1662. You want those men to have the same privileges as the men employed by the North-Eastern have?—Not exactly, but there is a system wanted with regard to the necessary documents.

1663. Your point is that if the North-Eastern can provide the necessary documents the stevedores ought to be able to do the same thing?—Yes.

1664. Are there any cargoes that your men handle where it would be difficult for the stevedore to show them documents?—I do not think so. There is a certain amount of timber discharged where the documents could be seen—log timber, deals and battens.

Mr. O. Wade.

1665. In some parts of the country, I understand, the weight of the timber is not actually ascertained until the merchant receives it?—I do not know. We had a Norwegian vessel in August; she discharged log timber in the Tyne. Her men complained through the branches when the settling-up day came that they were 150 short, which amounted to about 6*l.* 6*s.* 0*d.* We consider that it was very hard that they were paid that amount short.

1666. In the ports which you represent in the north of England, is the actual weight of the timber known until it is received by the merchant?—I do not know anything about that. Our people who are working for the stevedore generally ask the mate or the second mate or an official what cargo is in and they tell them.

1667. Have you heard of other cases where the men have complained that they have not received the whole of their wages for loading timber?—Yes; another steamer showed a deficiency of 37*l.*, which worked out at 18*s.* a head.

1668. Have you investigated those complaints?—Only so far as they came through the branches to me and I got talking to the men.

1669. How many complaints do you receive in a year?—We receive numerous complaints in a year with regard to short tonnage.

1670. Is it in connection with any particular cargo?—Different cargoes. With a certain steamer loaded with coal it amounted to about 16*s.* 2*d.* a head for 12 men—an ordinary job. She could not take the coal in from the coal stage and therefore she had to take it in from what you may call a barge in this part.

1671. The grievances which your men suffer from are not confined to coal?—Coal and other discharging.

1672. All cargoes?—Such as copper ore and bricks.

1673. Any other kind of cargoes?—Bricks and tar.

1674. (Mr. Sexton.) How did the present relations between you and the North-Eastern Railway Company come about?—The men were working for a stevedore at 5*s.* a day, I think, discharging iron ore, and they came out for an advance of a shilling per day. The stevedore said his price was so low that he could not afford to give any advance of wages. Mr. Hicks was then District Superintendent of the North-Eastern and he got the men together and asked them if they would do the work at the price the stevedore was doing it at. They said they would. They took it on and shortly afterwards they went in and got an advance on the price—4*d.* or 5*d.* a ton—and it stands at that now.

1675. How do you ascertain the exact tonnage?—The North-Eastern Railway have a weigh bar on the west side where the stuff is weighed before it goes to Consett or other iron works. They check it there themselves and it is checked at the other end. The men have been paid on the North-Eastern weight.

1676. Have you any agent?—Yes; we have a deputy there who supervises the work.

1677. Do not misunderstand me. He is acting as the stevedore for the union?—Yes.

1678. And therefore he gets the weight for the company and for you at the same time?—Yes; a sort of checkweighman.

1679.—Not exactly a checkweighman, but he is acting in that capacity and he is practically doing the work of a checkweighman?—Yes.

1680.—Are those the exact copies that you have there that are supplied to the North-Eastern by the weighmen?—Yes; they are signed by J. R. Roach, our deputy, and I take it that they are accurate. They come from the company, or the North Eastern proper.

1681. Those give the tonnage in each hatch?—Yes.

1682. How do you ascertain that?—It is weighed on a weigh bar, as already explained.

1683. How do you know out of which hatch it comes, 1 or 2?—I am not in a position to say. He can say. It is from him I get it.

1684. I will not press it. The other companies that you work for will not agree to give you the same facilities as the North-Eastern?—No, they will not.

1685. Have they refused them?—Yes.

1686. Have you applied for them?—They have applied to the stevedores and they have refused.

1687. What do they tell you?—That they have not got them themselves.

1688. Is that the only explanation?—Yes, that is all; that is all they tell me.

1689. With regard to the case of 16*s.* a man paid short, how did you ascertain that?—With regard to bunker coals, according to the men's tariff all ships under 1,500 tons are 1*s.* a ton; above 1,500 up to 2,500 or part thereof it is 1*s.* 3*d.* a ton; but if it is over 2,500 tons another 1*d.* goes on to that, which would give the men 1*s.* 4*d.* a ton. The stevedore contended that the ship was below the 2,500, hence he would only pay 1*s.* 3*d.* a ton.

1690. How did you ascertain that it was above?—From what I could gather from the men who had been to the Board of Trade or the Custom House.

1691. I wanted to get at that. What did they get at the Custom House?—The Customs said that the net tonnage of the vessel was 2,581.

1692. On what estimate was that, the bill of lading?—That is the net registered tonnage of the vessel, 25.813 · 6.

1693. Do you get paid on the net registered tonnage of the vessel?—Yes.

1694. Not on the actual amount of tonnage she carries as cargo?—She shipped 4,000 odd tons.

1695. How did you ascertain that the tonnage carried by the ship was in conformity with the Customs' document?—We ascertained it at the Customs, the registered tonnage and the net tonnage.

1696. I do not quite follow that?—The registered tonnage of the vessel is 2,581 tons.

1697. (Mr. Larkin.) And she shipped 4,000 odd tons?—Yes.

1698. (Mr. Sexton.) What did the bills of lading say?—The bills of lading did not show that; this was the registered and net tonnage.

1699. You were bunkering these coals?—Yes, and these were taken out of the craft.

1700. (Mr. Scrutton.) This was a dispute with the stevedore as to how much should be paid for the size of the ship, there being a certain weight for a certain size?—Yes.

1701. (Mr. Harrington.) When you took over the North-Eastern Railway work you took it at the price that the previous stevedore had been paid?—Yes, 3½*d.* a ton.

1702. Did you find that it did not pay you at that rate?—It did pay us, but the men thought they should get a little extra for doing the same work for the company, and they tried and got it.

1703. The North-Eastern gave you a price which they would not pay the stevedore?—Yes, They put us on the same level as the north-east coast and what they pay in the Tees district. We started at the stevedore's price and got a matter of 8*s.* to 8*s.* 6*d.*

1704. Instead of 5*s.*?—Yes, 8*s.* instead of 5*s.*

1705. (Mr. Hardy.) You are satisfied with what the North-Eastern pay?—Yes, we are satisfied with what the North-Eastern pay; there is no doubt about that. It applies to other sections. In the Hartlepool district the men do the work themselves also.

1706. You have been speaking of the Tyne Dock?—Of the Tyne Dock.

1707. (Mr. Larkin.) Would you be prepared to act in that way in any other port? Do you think that it would be wiser that the workmen should do the work directly without the intervention of a stevedore?—I think so.

1708. There is no necessity for a stevedore?—Not in the least. Our people were very foolish when the employers offered them the work in the nineties and they did not accept it.

1709. (Mr. Wignall.) The general opinion of the men is that they would be more satisfied if they could get the documents proving the exact tonnage in the ship?—That is it.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. J. HERBERT SCRUTTON (a Member of the Committee) examined.

Mr. J. H. Scrutton.
13 Feb. 1908.

1710. (Chairman.) I understand that so far as the shipowners are concerned you have no evidence you wish to produce?—I do not see, as a shipowner, that there is anything in the evidence given that it is necessary for the shipowner to answer.

1711. You mean that so far as shipowners are concerned, there has been no complaint made against them directly?—That I understand to be the tenour of the evidence.

1712. I should like to ask you a few questions with regard to the system on which this work is done. Would you please tell us why the bills of lading would not be satisfactory evidence of the weight?—A bill of lading is very often more or less an estimated quantity. The bill of lading is signed: "Weight and contents unknown."

1713. The ship's manifest is a summary of the bills of lading, is it not?—It is a summary of the bills of lading.

1714. We hear that in a number of cases the men are paid on the bills of lading, so that I take it the bills of lading are in some cases accurate. Can you explain in what cases the bills of lading would be satisfactory evidence of weight, and in what cases they would not?—There are so many trades and so many different customs, that it is very difficult to give a general answer to that question.

1715. Would you explain the methods by which the shipowners ascertain the weights or measurements of the cargoes for the purpose of charging freight dues?—Unless cargo is absolutely weighed or measured at the time of delivery or after delivery, the shipowner would, in the ordinary course, be satisfied with the weight or measurement on which an actual transaction took place; that is to say, that if there was a weight or measurement which was used for the purpose of the sale of the article in question, it would be accepted by the shipowner as satisfactory from the freight point of view.

1716. I take it that the shipowner must have some data to go upon to make out his freight bill?—The shipowner gets the weight supplied to him by the merchant in most cases, and he satisfies himself that that is a correct weight.

1717. And so far as the shipowner is concerned, there would be no objection to supplying that document to the person whom the shipowner employed to unload the ship?—The shipowner would be quite prepared to satisfy his sub-contractor by the granting of this information, so long as it was in his possession.

1718. Do you know of any cases where the shipowner is not interested in ascertaining the weight of the cargo? I will give you an illustration of what I mean. A Gloucester firm writes as follows: "We presume "from the wording of your circular that the question "arises in the case of parcel and general goods cargoes, "where the shipowner is not directly interested in the "weight or measurement, as in the case of liners "carrying their own goods or freightage. In such "cases the dock company's tolls or tonnages are "collected upon some reliable ascertained weight, and "we would suggest that they should be required to "give a certificate at a nominal charge to anyone "desiring the information." Can you explain that paragraph?—No, I do not understand altogether what they mean. The only case in which the shipowner is not directly interested in the weight or measurement of the cargo would be where the payment is made in a lump sum.

1719. Are there such cases where you take a batch of goods for a lump sum without knowing the weight?—Yes, but it does not follow that there is piece-work done on that particular cargo. It would apply more to general cargoes, where the question of piece-work would not arise.

1720. If there are certain cases where the shipowner does not know the weight of the cargo, are there any cases where both the shipowner and the dock company are ignorant of the weights or where there is no dock company concerned?—I should think it is very very exceptional for there to be no ascertainable weight either on shipment or discharge.

1721. May I take it that where there was no ascertainable weight the shipowners would employ people to unload or load, as the case might be, by time and not by weight?—Generally speaking, I should think so.

1722. It seems to me that the first question which we have to settle is, who are the persons to issue the certificates of weight or measurement which are to be supplied to the men. Supposing that the men were employed by a stevedore and he was obliged by law to provide them with a certificate, he must obtain that certificate from the person by whom he is employed. I want, therefore, to find out what classes of persons employ stevedores, that is to say, what classes of persons are responsible for loading and unloading ships?—It would be either the shipowner or the receiver of the goods.

1723. I will put them seriatim. First, in what cases is the shipowner responsible for unloading or loading?—Where he contracts to carry cargo at a rate which includes the discharge.

1724. When the merchant sends the goods to the dock is the shipowner responsible for putting them into the ship?—Yes, as a rule.

1725. And when a ship arrives in port is the shipowner usually responsible for unloading the cargo on to the quay side?—The shipowner is responsible for delivering the cargo from his tackles to the receiver.

1726. Are there any cases where the shipowner does not undertake to load or unload the goods?—There may be exceptional cases in which the shipper or receiver undertakes to load or discharge.

1727. By whom is it done then?—By the owner of the goods or his representatives.

1728. Does not the dock company ever do it?—Only as the agent of the shipowner, I should say.

1729. You have put in a memorandum here in conjunction with Mr. Gordon and Mr. Mead, in which I understand you concede the principle of conceding the men's demands. I will read the memorandum:—

1. In loading or discharging ships, where the workmen undertake to load or discharge the cargo at a rate per ton weight or measurement, the settlement with the employer with whom they have contracted to perform the work shall be made in the following manner.

2. The employer shall, if required, furnish a certificate of the quantity of cargo loaded or discharged.

3. If the cargo is not weighed or measured before, or during, the loading, or during, or after, discharge of the ship, the employer shall produce a certificate from the shipowner or the ship-broker, acting on his behalf, showing the quantity of cargo on which the shipowner has received, or is to receive, payment of freight, and the workmen shall accept a settlement of their wages on the basis of such certificate.

4. For the purpose of the settlement of wages as above, the employer, or the shipowner or his agent, shall have the right to demand from shippers or receivers of cargo, dock companies or wharfingers, or any other persons having particulars of the weights or measurements of cargo loaded or discharged, particulars of the total weight or measurements of such cargo, as and when they are ascertained, and such particulars shall be furnished without charge.

May I take it that that is the unanimous decision of the three gentlemen representing the shipowners?—This is a memorandum drawn up by myself and my co-shipowners on this Committee for the purpose of assisting you in preparing the draft report, and it expresses the lines on which we think it should be possible to frame regulations for dealing with the points in dispute.

1730. The difficulty which I see is not in the cases where it is plain sailing, so to speak, but in the cases which are outside the ordinary rule where documents are not easily obtainable. What would you suggest in such cases?—You mean where there is no possibility of furnishing a certificate of the quantity of cargo loaded or discharged?

Mr. J. H. Scrutton.

1731. Yes?—It is difficult to imagine a case where some satisfactory evidence cannot be obtained, because if cargo is shipped there must be some particulars existing of the quantity.

1732. Are there cases where men are employed by a firm unloading goods from the firm's own barges on to the firm's own quay, and consequently, as the firm are carrying their own goods in their own barges, there are no freight notes?—But they must have purchased those goods somewhere.

1733. But what kind of certificate can the men get in these cases?—There must be some invoice or bill of cost existing in respect of those goods which could be furnished by the owner.

1734. I will read an extract from a letter from one of the firms:—"We should not refuse to show our "men any certificate or weight note which was in this "office, but we should object to be obliged to procure "any specially defined certificates such as those men-"tioned in the claim. In some cases we have no freight "notes, and we rarely pay dock dues on our imports, "so that we have no dock certificates. A barge note "could always be shown." What do you think of that?—I cannot imagine a case in which someone is not doing work in connection with a parcel of goods which would define the quantity.

1735. Then there is the question of mixed cargoes. The Swansea Harbour Trust writes:—"We would "point out that in the case of general cargo exports "a single cargo may consist of, say, 50 to 100 separate "consignments, and it is difficult to conceive what "certificates can be produced to prove to the men that "they are being paid on the weight or measurement "on which freight or dock dues are paid. The Trustees "do not weigh such general cargo, but accept the "weight declared to them by the consigners"?—They are paid for doing the work, and in consequence they have to arrive at some estimate of the quantity of cargo which they handle.

1736. The exact words are:—"The cargo may "consist of, say, 50 to 100 separate consignments, "and it is difficult to conceive what certificates can "be produced to prove to the men that they are "being paid on weight or measurement on which "freight or dock dues are paid"?—The point which I want to bring out is that they have the information in their possession for their own purposes. In a case like that it would be sufficient if the employer of the men produced a certificate showing the basis upon which he himself received payment.

1737. Then there is the case mentioned just now of different gangs working different holds. How are the men to ascertain the amount in each hold?—That was answered by Mr. Sexton. They would be satisfied if they get the total amount that the ship has discharged. The men among themselves would be able to apportion it out.

1738. (Mr. Sexton.) Are you aware that there is a system now in operation whereby the contractor whom the shipowner gets to discharge his ship is also the contractor for the consignee and receives the stuff on the quay?—I know of cases where the man who is discharging the ship under contract with the shipowner is also handling the goods for the consignee.

1739. We call them in Liverpool master stevedores and master porters. The reason why I ask that question is that in the case you were putting you said that the consignee received his own stuff, and I wanted to make it clear that the one man does the two jobs in Liverpool, generally speaking?—I follow.

1740. (Mr. Larkin.) I would like to ask what is the basis that the shipowners pay the stevedore on?—It depends on the bargain.

1740*a*. It must be the measurement or tonnage or piece or day system?—It depends on the individual bargain.

1741. What is it, generally speaking?—Generally speaking, I should say a weight rate.

1742. I want to convince this Committee and also any persons outside that the stevedore, being the agent of the shipowner, would have access to documents to prove what the ship was carrying and the master porter acting for the consignee, would have the actual weight. Somebody between the shipowner and the worker must have the actual weight?—I have said already that somebody must have the actual weight.

1743. (Chairman.) So far as the shipowners are concerned, then, you do not propose to call any evidence?—I do not see any necessity for it.

Mr. J. C. MEAD (a Member of the Committee) examined.

Mr. J. C. Mead.

1744. (Chairman.) I am very anxious that every branch of the shipping industry should have an opportunity of putting their views before the Committee. Would you tell us what branch of the shipping industry you represent?—Roughly speaking, I represent, I take it, most of the regular lines that utilise the Thames. When I say the Thames, I mean not including, as a rule, the docks, although many of our owners whom I represent at times utilise the docks.

1745. Have you had an opportunity of conferring with them or with their representatives on the matter which this Committee is reviewing?—I hardly occupy that position. I was asked whether I would act as their representative, and, therefore, when I accepted I simply came here representing a certain tonnage to do what I considered was right as an individual.

1746. Would you tell us what that tonnage is?—I should say that the turnover amounts to many million tons a year. I cannot say exactly.

1747. You have been a party to this document which has been handed in, which shows clearly that in principle you agree with the men's demands?—In principle, I think that a case has been shown as to the desirability of some means being found for satisfying the men as to the correctness of the weights upon which they are paid.

1748. You have told us that you are here practically in a representative character and that the people whom you represent will agree to any decision you arrive at?—As I have been requested to represent certain interests, I have no reason for doubting that they will agree to any decision I may be a party to.

Mr. JAMES HARRINGTON (a Member of the Committee) examined.

Mr. J. Harrington.

1749. (Chairman.) What is your exact position?—I am Vice-Chairman of the Port of London Master Stevedores' Association.

1750. About how much of the work of the Port of London is done at piece-work rates?—With regard to general cargo I should say about 25 to 30 per cent., and with regard to timber about 80 per cent.

1751. Have you had many complaints from the men with regard to the tonnage they have been paid upon?—Yes, continually.

1752. Now with regard to timber discharging, will you give us some information with regard to that sort of cargo?—With regard to timber discharging the unloading is practically done day work. The delivery over the side, that is, loading of barges or putting it on to the quay, is done at piece-work rates. It is sublet by the master stevedore to one of the men. The greatest difficulty of timber discharging is to get a return. Although the bills of lading are there they are not correct, invariably not correct, with the consequence that until this timber is stacked on the quay and measured, or delivered to the consignee's barges and delivered to the different wharves and measured, you cannot get a return of what is in the ship.

1753. Are the stevedores not paid finally until they get a return from the merchant?—That is so.

1754. How do you pay the men?—We take the bills of lading as practically a guide, and keep ourselves on the safe side so that we are not paying them too much.

1755. Do you ever pay them in addition?—We very often pay them over.

1756. When you have paid a certain sum do you ever adjust the accounts and give them the difference?—Yes; on several occasions that has been done.

1757. Would your society consent to giving the men's representatives full information and, if necessary, documents to prove that they had received the full tonnage they had handled?—Certainly.

1758. What is your association's opinion with regard to this inquiry?—They would be perfectly agreeable to a short Act being passed in order to make the men secure. We should feel that our troubles with the men would be finished because they would have the necessary documents and we should be able to pay them the right amount.

1759. Then I understand that you would welcome any such legislation?—Yes, we should.

1760. What is the usual custom in the Port of London when you have had a dispute with the men?—It is referred to the men's association and their representative comes and takes the matter up, and it is mutually settled. If it is not mutually settled we go to the Chamber or London Conciliation Board for arbitration and the matter is finished.

1761. Do you know or have you ever heard of any prosecutions of master stevedores or contractors in London with regard to having deliberately falsified the men's tonnage?—No.

1762. When you have had any disputes with the men have they been adjusted without any necessity for prosecution?—Yes.

1763. I want to know precisely what your association represents?—It is an association formed of just over 40 of the principal master stevedores in the Port of London.

1764. How many master stevedores are there altogether in London?—I should think that there were about 100.

1765. You do not represent quite half?—We represent the principal stevedores of the Port of London. There are a number of small men that we do not recognise as master stevedores at all.

1766. You feel that you speak in a truly representative capacity?—I represent 80 per cent. of the stevedore work.

1767. (Mr. Larkin.) What is the reason that stevedores who have substantial backing behind them give away their work on the tonnage basis. There must be some reason for it. These men who are substantial people give it away to people who have no standing, and these are the men whom the difficulty arises with all the time?—I do not think I understand you.

1768. (Chairman.) Do you ever sublet your contracts?—It is always done with regard to timber work, but it is sublet to trade union men. With regard to the overside work with a 2,000 or 3,000 ton steamer, there are about 16 men employed, and one takes it on and divides the money amongst the 16. It is really a trades union arrangement.

1769. In subletting the contracts you give the sub-contractors the information which could be handed to the men?—Yes.

1770. (Mr. Anderson.) As a matter of fact, is it a sub-contract in the true sense of the word? Is it not rather letting the outside work, as we term it, piece-work?—You may describe it in that way if you like.

1771. The other man does not get any more profit out of it than the men?—No. It is divided amongst the men.

1772. It is all shared equally between the whole of the men?—Yes.

1773. There may be 16, 18, or 20 outside the ship?—Yes; he employs what he thinks is necessary.

1774. And they share it equally?—Yes.

1775. (Mr. Wignall.) Your Association of Master Stevedores is confined strictly, I understand, to London?—Yes, London only.

1776. Do you have any difficulty in getting your accounts made up by the shipowner?—No; we get them made up as soon as they get the returns.

1777. What is the average length of time that it takes between the discharge of the cargo and the making of the returns?—We find the greatest time is with timber. It would be two months sometimes before we got a return, not owing to the shipowner's fault, but on account of the consignees not returning the amount of measurement.

1778. You pay the men approximately what you believe the cargo is till you get the measurement?—Yes.

1779. Do you then publish a statement to the men if they ask for it?—Always.

1780. If you found out that you had paid them too much, you would not wait for them to ask?—We should refer it to the union.

1781. If they are underpaid do you apply to them then to come to claim the money?—I do not know.

1782. (Mr. Bellhouse.) It may be two months, you say, before you get the details of the timber?—Yes.

1783. Do you keep a record of the actual labourers who worked on the ship that is unloaded?—Yes, a daily record.

1784. You always have a record?—Yes.

1785. (Mr Anderson.) In the case where a complete list is not kept of the whole of the men, you have a record of those who have charge of the gangs?—Yes. You mean with regard to the outside work?

1786. Yes?—Yes.

1787. So you would have no difficulty in finding the men if any balance was due to them?—No. It could be done through me.

1788. If this Act passes?—It would be a most satisfactory way that the delegate of the men should see the returns, and if there is any balance to take, the delegate should take it and divide it among the men.

1789. (Mr Bellhouse.) Would you object to keeping a register of outstanding ships which would be available for inspection by the Factory Inspector?—No; I should be perfectly agreeable to that.

1790. (Chairman.) I understand that you do not wish to call any evidence?—I do not think so. We are perfectly in agreement on the whole matter.

FIFTH DAY.

Thursday, 27th February 1908.

PRESENT:

ERNEST F. G. HATCH, Esq. (Chairman).

JAMES ANDERSON, Esq. (Amalgamated Stevedores' Labour Protection League).

GERALD BELLHOUSE, Esq. (one of His Majesty's Inspectors of Factories).

C. W. GORDON, Esq. (Gordon Steam Shipping Company).

THOMAS HARDY, Esq. (Manager of the London and India Docks Company).

JAMES HARRINGTON, Esq. (London Master Stevedores' Association).

JAMES LARKIN, Esq. (National Union of Dock Labourers).

J. C. MEAD, Esq. (of Messrs. Mead, Son, and Hussey, Shipowners).

J. LLOYD MORGAN, Esq., K.C., M.P.

H. ORBELL, Esq. (Dock, Wharf, Riverside, and General Workers' Union).

J. HERBERT SCRUTTON, Esq. (of Messrs. Scrutton, Sons & Co., Shipowners).

JAMES SEXTON, Esq. (National Union of Dock Labourers).

JAMES WIGNALL, Esq. (Dock, Wharf, Riverside, and General Workers' Union).

Mr. J. Harman.

27 Feb. 1908.

Mr. JAMES HARMAN called and examined.

1791. (Chairman.) I understand that you are the Superintendent of the Cardiff Railway Company?—Yes, and the Bute Docks.

1792. The company owns the Bute Docks, Cardiff, does it not?—Yes.

1793. By whom are the men engaged in loading or unloading at these docks employed?—By the Cardiff Railway Company now. The dock company is merged into the railway company.

1794. Are they ever engaged by stevedores?—No, not for coal-tipping. There are men engaged by stevedores on other work.

1795. What other work is that?—Discharging iron ore, loading rails, plates, and general work of that kind—chiefly iron ore and pit wood.

1796. Does the dock company confine itself entirely to loading and unloading coal?—No. We load rails and plates at times ourselves by our own men by piece-work, and the stevedores' labour is done by day-work. There is no piece-work there or tonnage work. The only tonnage work we have is the coal at so much per 100 tons for the men.

1797. I wanted to get at that. The only tonnage work at the Cardiff Docks, I understand, is in connection with coal?—No, I cannot say that, because the iron ore is paid by ton.

1798. Kindly tell us what you handle?—Take coal first. The coal is brought down in freighters' trucks and remains on the railway company's sidings or our sidings until required for shipment. The order is then given by the merchant to tip the coals into certain vessels. The railway companies or ourselves bring the coal forward on to the tip sidings, and it is there marshalled as required for mixing or for whatever else the merchant requires, and the coal is tipped into the vessel. There are three roads, as a rule, leading to the staith sidings. Before getting to the staiths they have to pass the coal over a weighing machine which is kept in order by ourselves, and by Pooley and Sons, who do this by contract.

1799. Pooley and Company being ——?—Being the medium for the proper testing of the accuracy of the machines.

1800. Are they the makers of the machines?—Yes. As a rule the coal-tipping machines are maintained by them. We have machines of other makers. Messrs. Pooley keep a staff on the ground for the purpose of testing the machines every morning. It is rather peculiar in South Wales ports. Taking Newport, going down southward to Cardiff, Penarth, Barry, Port Talbot, and Swansea, all these docks do their work under similar circumstances; that is, they pay the men per 100 tons. We have two methods of tipping coal—by crane and by fixed tips and by movable tips. The men are engaged by the company, and form a gang of three men to the cranes and four men to the tips; they select amongst themselves, subject to our approval, the better class men to undertake the weighing.

1801. What do you mean by "undertake the weighing"?—They do the weighing themselves and are paid upon their own weight. It is the same process. They weigh and tip. The first operation is weighing. The weigher then assists in turning the waggon on to a turntable, and it goes on to a cradle to the fixed tip and it is lifted up by hydraulic power. Three men perform that work. The other system is the Lewis and Hunter system. There the waggons are tipped into a receptacle five feet below the ground level; this large hopper holding eight or ten tons as required is lifted from a pit on board of the vessel and dropped into the hold of the vessel.

1802. Are these men employed by the dock company?—They are the servants of and are paid by the dock company, but they are the medium between three parties. They are paid by piece-work.

1803. Would you please put it a little more simply; I only want to know whether these men are employed entirely by the dock company?—Yes.

1804–5. They are never employed by contractors?—Never.

1806. Is there any objection to the men having the right to appoint a checkweighman?—I will answer that question by saying that they are their own checkweighmen.

1807. But is there any objection to having that right by legal enactment?—I should say yes; it would be very detrimental to the interests of the trade and is not required. It would be a man upon a man.

1808. Would you kindly tell us in what way it would be detrimental to the trade?—It would stultify the ordinary course of the weighing, and the man might have the power to interfere unnecessarily. Our men do not ask for this kind of thing.

1809–10. But the principle of allowing the men a legal right to appoint checkweighmen has been given in all coal mines?—That is so because the difference is so very apparent. The coal is worked down at the bottom of the earth and worked up, and the men down below have no knowledge of what becomes of that. The checkweigher at the top is the instrument of their being paid rightly, but with us the men are themselves the instruments of their own payments.

1811. What objection is there to allowing the men to have as legal right what you give them as a customary arrangement?—I cannot answer for other people, but with regard to ourselves I have a strong objection.

1812. What difference would it make to the working of your system?—The difference is that we should have a man there doing nothing. The weigher makes his own return to the merchant, to the ship, to the dock company, and to himself; and a fourth man there would be a useless man.

1813. If the men were satisfied they would not wish to appoint a checkweighman?—But there is nothing to satisfy them upon.

1814. But if the men were satisfied, as you say they are, then there would be no object in the men appointing a checkweighman?—No; that is what I say; that is my contention. There is no object.

1815. So that there could be no objection to their having a right which they would have no reason to exercise?—As a dock company we have objection to a man loafing about our premises and going in seeing what may be wanted or required.

1816. You know that in all cases of checkweighmen if a man is not behaving himself he can be summarily removed?—But we do not want to have any objectionable men or even a person who would be objectionable. He is not required.

1817. In every trade that we have investigated there is no objection at all in principle to allowing the men to have the right to appoint checkweighmen?—I do not object to the principle of a body of men who cannot control the work themselves having someone to look after their interests, but here it is totally different. We have to trust to the men themselves. A man weighs a waggon. It contains 20 tons of coal, say. The net weight is taken, and he is paid on that himself, and we accept his weight and the merchant accepts his weight.

1818. Yes, but I cannot see that giving him the legal right to do what you let him do to-day without a legal right is going to interfere with your work?—We have 62 tips and to force 62 men to remain in idleness on our property I think would be objectionable

1819. But do not you see that the men would not exercise the power unless they thought it necessary. The checkweighmen would be paid by the men, and they would not go to the expense of appointing them unless they thought it necessary?—I do not think that our men, or any men in South Wales ports, require a checkweigher. He is a useless article.

1820. Then if he is not wanted, and the men are satisfied, they will not appoint him. Any provision will be purely permissive?—Yes, but we do not want to give the men power to bring men on our dock just when they think proper. It is our property, not the men's.

1821. But the principle has been conceded in other industries?—As far as I am concerned, with reference to the dock company I object to the principle.

1822. You object?—Certainly. I do not concede it, because it is unnecessary.

1823. I do not think that you have brought forward any argument to show us that it would be detrimental to the interests of your dock company?—Well, I give you the facts as to what is taking place day by day.

1824. You have only given us the fact that the men are satisfied?—Yes, and I also give my own opinion that I think an additional man to stand doing nothing 1825. But, excuse me, the additional man would not be appointed unless the men were dissatisfied. You say that the men are satisfied, and that if they had the chance of checking the weights they would refuse the power that Parliament might give them?—I see your contention, but I want to be fair to you and fair to the men. The checkweigher would be an abstraction from the men's wages. He must be paid by somebody. The dock company would not pay him.

1826. That is the men's business and they would not appoint checkweighmen unless they thought it necessary. You say that they do the checking themselves?—Yes.

1827. We could not, as a Committee, recommend that one particular industry should be exempt from any Act of Parliament. If the men are to have a legal right to appoint checkweighmen in some cases, we must include all similar cases?—We are the people that pay the men and we are the people that find the capital, and we ought to have some voice in the matter of how our work should be done, without having men forced on us.

1828. You accept the principle, I understand, that the men should have the right of knowing the weights which they handle?—Speaking for myself and our own docks, they have the right now, but I do not accept the principle of an additional man.

1829. Do you accept the principle that the men should have the right to know the weights which they handle?—Not by an outside party, because they have it themselves. I must protect myself.

1830. But, please, answer the question. Do you accept the principle that the men should have the right to know the weights which they handle?—Not in my particular case; I object to it.

1831. You do not think they ought to have the right to know the weights that they handle?—Not so far as I particularly am concerned, and the work I am responsible for.

1832. Surely it is common justice?—I am perfectly willing to be just and reasonable, but I am not willing to have some one imposed on me that the men or myself do not want. I cannot give any other reply.

1833. I have pointed out that if they do not want a checkweighman they will not impose one?—I do not want any one to have the power to enforce it.

1834. Would you yourself object to having anyone about the works if the men wanted to know exactly what the weights were?—I cannot accept that. The men make the weights themselves now, and to have another man loafing about (because he would be loafing on our premises, I put it broadly) I object to.

1835. Now I will ask you about French pit wood. You say in your letter that the importer discharges the pit wood from the vessels into the coal waggons?—Yes.

1836. Whom do you mean by the importer?—The man that buys the timber in France.

1837. Does he employ the men engaged in loading the wood?—Yes; that is day-work. We have nothing to do with that.

1838. Is it weighed on the dock company's machines?—Yes; after being loaded it is weighed.

1839. Does the dock company employ the weighmen?—Yes.

1840. Does the dock company give a return of the weights to the employer of the men?—They do not give them, but the men see them for themselves. The foreman who has the discharging of each ship goes to the machine and takes the weight. A copy of the invoice is taken by the importer and merchant. It follows the traffic, and on that the importer gets paid by the merchant.

1841. Does the buyer accept the weights taken by the dock company?—He does.

1842. In regard to Norwegian timber are the men paid piece-work in unloading?—Paid by the day, not piece-work.

1843. Now with regard to grain cargoes, in bulk? Who employs the men engaged in discharging the grain?—Two parties. Spillers and Baker, who import very largely, have their own "bushellers," as we call them, in the hold of the vessel. They load the corn into bags. It is brought up by men on to the deck and there weighed.

1844. Who employs the men engaged on the grain? In some cases we undertake the work, and in some cases Spillers do it themselves.

1845. They have their own bushellers, you say?—Yes.

Mr. J. Hurman.

27 Feb. 1908.

1846. Are the bushellers and the carriers employed by the same person?—Yes, at times.

1847. Is the grain weighed at the dock?—On the deck of the vessel.

1848. Is the weighman employed by the dock company?—In some instances, and in some instances by the importer.

1849. Does the company give a return of the weights to the employer of the men?—The men take them themselves. We take the weight from the men.

1850. Have the men access to the returns?—Yes. It is on their own return that the invoices are made up. The weights are ascertained by the men themselves, who have a machine on the deck. They enter them in their books, and so they have them.

1851. With regard to grain in bags, is the same system adopted in dealing with this kind of cargo?—Yes. The grain is brought up and taken on the machine on the vessel and weighed and taken by the carriers over the side of the vessel into the warehouses.

1852. With regard to general cargoes I understand that the men are paid day wages for general cargo, except when handling timber and deal?—Yes, in every instance.

1853. Who employs the men engaged in unloading these cargoes?—The dock company does.

1854. Are the men paid by the standard?—Yes, by the standard. That is, in discharging from the vessel to the rail and from there on it is paid by day-work.

1855. I am only speaking of tonnage rates. Do they receive so much on account?—Yes.

1856. In other words is there any adjustment afterwards?—They receive so much on account until the whole of the cargo is discharged and taken into the different yards and rearranged. They are in different lengths, and they are put into 12 feet lengths or 14 feet lenghts to arrive at the standard, and on that the men are paid. In the meantime the adjustment is made as nearly as possible. Sometimes the master stevedore loses by the transaction, and the next time he pays more than he ought to pay.

1857. In cases where they do not get the exact standard is there any adjustment afterwards?—Yes, there is a readjustment between the men and the stevedore on ascertaining from the timber merchant against the manifest of the vessel as to the quantity of standards on board.

1858. The shipowner is not paid, I suppose, until the measure is accurately ascertained?—No. The vessel is paid on the ascertained manifest tonnage.

1859. Does the dock company receive any payment in respect of these cargoes?—Only in the shape of dock dues and wharfage charges.

1860. How are these payments calculated?—They are calculated on the registered tonnage of the vessel.

1861. And dues on the goods?—Dues on the goods in that instance. The coal is paid for on actual shipments.

1862. The dock dues are on the registered tonnage?—They are on the registered tonnage.

1863. How is the number of standards ascertained at present for the purpose of paying the men?—By the manifest, in the first instance. It gives them a guide. And then there is a man on the deck who is a counter, and he takes account of what passes over. The men are pretty accurate on their own behalf to find out how many standards have passed over the rail. Until the whole of the cargo is discharged, if it remains on our trucks, not getting into the yard for days and weeks, and the account is outstanding, there is difficulty in our getting the weight from the merchants.

1864. In those cases the men are not paid until those weights are received from the merchant?—Not in some cases.

1865. Therefore they get so much on account and the rest is adjusted when those weights are received from the merchant?—When the delivery is effected and the standards are arranged they find out how many standards have been received.

1866. Have you ever heard the men complain that they do not get the full weight?—No. I have instances where stevedores have paid more money and have failed to get it back again.

1867. You have never heard the converse?—No, I have never heard the converse.

1868. (Mr. Hardy.) Your idea is, I take it, that if there were checkweighmen appointed it would be surplusage altogether?—Entirely.

1869. And although the men would have to pay for their own checkweigher in some form or other, at some time or other, that having been an expense of the work it would fall back on the employer?—I think that the ultimate result would be that we should have to pay for it.

1870. Would you mind if the men themselves agreed to the weigher that you employed?—He is the checkweigher now.

1871. But he is the man that you appoint?—Yes.

1872. Would you mind if you had to get the men's consent to the appointment of that particular man to do the weighing?—Yes, I should, because I think he would not do what the present weigher does, that is, assist in tipping the coal. He would be merely a weigher pure and simple.

1873. I quite see your point. You say that another man would be surplusage, and somehow or other he would have to be paid for?—Yes, and would be detrimental to the work.

1874. That I quite understand, but would you have any objection to the men nominating the man who is now doing the work and letting him do what he now does?—That is done at the present moment. The men select the weigher amongst themselves and pass him on to us to accept.

1875. You do not object to that?—Not to the present principle, but I do object to having a man that I do not employ.

1876. I follow all that. I quite see that it might be a waste of money to put another man there, and in the long run the extra expense would fall on the dock company?—Yes.

1877. I want to know whether you would object to the men employed in the work assenting to this particular weigher?—No, because we assent to it now.

1878. (Mr. Lloyd Morgan.) Supposing that the men were not satisfied with the particular man who did the weighing, how could they get rid of him?—By reporting to me some irregularity. We do not discharge a man because another man complains or else it would be a very sorry thing.

1879. Take it that there was some reasonable complaint, that the man was careless, or that something had happened through which the weights were not properly given?—I should discharge him if I found the complaint a proper one and useful one.

1880. You would hold a kind of inquiry?—I should satisfy myself and make the men prove what they said against the man. Every man must have fair play.

1881. Supposing that after having made that inquiry you came to the conclusion that you were not satisfied that there was anything in the men's complaint, supposing you thought that the men's complaint was groundless, would you, in that case, object to their appointing another man to satisfy themselves as to the weight?—But I should not want another man if I retained him.

1882. I am afraid you do not follow me?—I do. You first of all must get rid of that man.

1883. But the men cannot get rid of him?—I can get rid of him.

1884. I know that, but the men cannot get rid of him. Take it, first of all, that the men are not satisfied, and in the second place you refuse to get rid of him?—Without just cause?

1885. Let us say simply that you refuse to get rid of him. Would you in that case be willing for the men to appoint some one else to check the weights?—And I am to employ the man they appoint?

1886. Yes?—I should object.

1887. (Mr. Hardy.) If the men are dissatisfied with this particular weigher, and yet he is wronging them, would you mind putting a man on that would satisfy them?—In all probability I should remove the man to another machine and bring another man from another machine there. I should ring the changes.

1888. I perfectly follow your objection to having a man there as checkweigher who is surplusage and has to be paid by somebody and, no doubt, eventually has to be paid by the dock company. He is an unnecessary man, that I quite follow; but what I do wish to know is whether you would have any objection to satisfying the men as to the man that you put there?—In what way must I satisfy them? You put a question to me which I cannot follow.

1889. If they think that that man is wronging them, would you have any objection to putting another man there?—I am assuming three men. I should have objection to putting a fourth man as a check, but I should take such action as would prevent the other two men having cause to complain of the third man by removing him and putting another man in his place.

1890. Substituting another man?—Yes.

1891. If you had Jones at the weighbridge, and Smith in the gang objected, and said, "He is not giving the correct weights," you would not mind putting another man there and giving Jones a chance somewhere else?—That is what I should do if I thought that Jones was doing what was wrong.

1892. (Mr. Lloyd Morgan.) If the other gang would not have him or did not want him, what would you do then?—I cannot suppose that. They would have to.

1893. (Mr. Anderson.) Has it ever been done?—No.

1894. (Mr. Mead.) With regard to grain, it is weighed on the ship's deck?—Yes.

1895. Who supplies those weighers—I do not quite understand?—We do.

1896. As a dock company?—In some instances, and the importer in others. When they undertake the work themselves they supply their own men.

1897. Are those weights checked at all?—They are checked, because sacks, as a rule, hold five bushels, and within a shade either up or down the men themselves know the weight by the fact of the sacks holding five bushels.

1898. I did not quite mean that. You specially mentioned Spillers and Baker. They get cargoes from Ralli Brothers, I suppose. They are in the habit, are they not, of sending somebody down to check the weight?—Always standing on the deck, but they do not weigh.

1899. Do they check the weight taken by the man appointed?—Yes. Spillers would have a man there.

1900. The weight is checked by the seller?—And the buyer in his own interest.

1901. There is a check as far as buyer and seller are concerned. How do the men arrive at the weight, is it passed on to them?—They make up the weight themselves of their own working.

1902. How can they do that?—Every sack is entered in a book by the men themselves.

1903. Do the men put some one there to check the weights?—No. The man who weighs is part and parcel of the men who are paid on those weights.

1904. Who appoints him?—In Spillers' case he is appointed by Spillers, and in our case by us.

1905. He may be one of the men, but he is not appointed by the men themselves. Have they any choice in the man put there to check those weights?—No, I do not think they have.

1906. I understood you to say with regard to timber that the basis of payment was the ship's manifest?—With regard to the dock company, but the standard discharged from the ship is the basis of payment on which the men receive payment.

1907. I am coming to that. The basis on which you pay in the first instance is the manifest?—It is gathered from the manifest. It is an assumed figure.

1908. The actual payment, or the actual standard capacity, is only arrived at after the timber has been piled in the receiver's yards?—Yes, or at our own yards.

1909. Take the case now of a receiver's yard. You say that the pieces are put in their various lengths, and so on. Are you absolutely bound to accept the measurements given to you by the receiver?—Yes, we have no check upon them. We know the number of deals upon every truck. They are loaded on trucks from the ship's side.

1910. That is not my point. I want to know about the measurement. With regard to payment on standard capacity, are there no means offered by the receiver for having the measurement checked?—Not until the trucks are in his yard and discharged and the timber sorted.

1911. When they are in the yard and discharged does anybody have an opportunity of checking the measurements?—They would have an opportunity if they went to a yard. Take Bland and Company, who are large people. After a cargo has been discharged a fortnight or three weeks after the vessel has sailed before they can take the whole of the deals in and sort them into sizes, and into lengths, they are put together and I suppose they ascertain that there is a pile of so many deals of 12 feet and so many of 14, and they reduce them to standards.

1912. The consignee does that, the receiver?—Yes.

1913. Has nobody the opportunity of checking that?—I cannot answer.

1914. The standard capacity arrived at for freight and labour purposes is a capacity which is not found on delivery from the steamer, but is found after it has been piled in the receiver's yards?—That is my impression.

1915. (Mr. Bellhouse.) With regard to pit wood you said that the men can go to the weighhouse and see the weight?—Yes.

1916. That is simply by grace. They have no right to go there?—We feel that they have a right.

1917. They have no legal right at any rate; it is only a moral right. It is by your permission at present?—It is by practice, and it has got into legality, if I may use the word.

1918. But you could, as a matter of fact, forbid them?—We could certainly.

1919. Would you object to that being made a legal right?—Not in the particular instance, because I do not think it would stultify the work.

1920. Your present arrangements apparently are entirely satisfactory both to yourselves and to the men with regard to coal. To take a case where there is dispute between you and the men and you say: "No, I will appoint the weighman in future, and he shall not be one of your gang at all," would you object then to their having a checkweighman supposing they did not make their own weight?—You must not ask me to suppose a thing of that kind.

1921. But there are heaps of cases of that sort in the country. I am asking as a matter of principle?—I am not aware of them and I object to the principle.

1922. You object to it?—Yes.

1923. To go to ordinary timber, there are often, you told us, weeks of delay before the outstanding accounts can be adjusted?—Two or three weeks probably.

1924. Is any register of outstanding accounts of that sort kept?—Yes, it is kept by the stevedore. I should have given a little further explanation; all the deals are loaded on to trucks. Sometimes they are dumped on the ground. If they are dumped on the ground for the sake of despatch they are reloaded into trucks. The stevedore or the foreman takes the number of every truck that passes from the dock side waiting delivery to the timber merchant. I am not quite sure of my ground but I should imagine that they would follow the timber to the yard and find out the delivery from each truck.

1925. That is a little more than I intended. I want to know whether you would have any objection with regard to your own men to keeping a register in some form to be prescribed by the Secretary of State, say, showing the date upon which you receive the particulars upon which you are paid, and the date upon which the particulars are supplied to the foreman of the men?—That is a broad question. I should require to know what the Secretary of State would propose before I could answer that.

Mr. J. Hurman.

1926. Supposing he says you shall keep a register in which you shall enter the date at which you receive the particulars on which you are paid and also enter the date upon which you give those particulars to the workmen on which his wages are based, have you any objection to keeping a register of that sort?—We keep the register now.

1927. Assuming that these suggestions became law and had to be administered by some Government department or local department, as the case may be, would you have any objection to that register being open to inspection by an officer of that department, or even I may go further and say by a duly appointed representative of the men?—No, not if he was duly appointed by the men, but except by appointment of the men I should object to any outsider.

1928. You do not want anybody to come in, but you do not mind a proper representative of the men, and you would not object, I take it, to a Government official?—I do not know. I rather think that I should.

1929. You would?—Yes. You see we do not want our privacy or the relations between our customer and ourselves placed in the hands of everybody.

1930. That does not enter into it. It is merely a question between yourselves and your workmen as to whether you give them the particulars of the weights or not?—If our particulars were not correct at the present moment, I should not object to their coming to me and saying, "We are not satisfied; allow us to look at the weighings."

1931. You would not object?—No; that is fair.

1932. You do keep registers and so on that are open to the Government inspector now?—We have the Factory Act inspector upon us and we have others that we get on very well with.

1933. (Mr. Sexton). Mr. Hardy put a question, to you that eventually the price of the checkweighman would fall upon the dock company?—It is an unknown matter as to how it would work.

1934. I wanted to know how that was calculated. You always hear when the men are overpaid?—Yes.

1935. Have you never heard of their being underpaid?—I have never heard of their being underpaid.

1936. Has it never occurred?—No; I think that the men are quite capable of looking after themselves, and they are not underpaid because they get subs, as you know, at different times. Sometimes they are over-subbed and it is very difficult to get anything back when they are over-subbed.

1937. Does it not occur to you that they may be underpaid at times?—If they are underpaid, I expect that they get paid by some means or other. They would make the stevedore pay up.

1938. You said that checkweighmen would be detrimental to the work because it would be necessary to appoint 62. Why would it be necessary to do that?—Because we have 62 tips.

1939. But does it follow that with 62 tips you would want 62 checkweighmen?—Yes. We tip a wagon in 2½ minutes. He could not walk from one tip to another to check the weights.

1940. Take it from me it would not be the intention of the men to employ 62 checkweighman?—Then it would not be a proper record on the part of the men. While the checkweighman was away, if they liked, they could enter in wrong weights. The checkweighman is a man there to prevent any irregularity, I take it.

1941. Supposing that the men had the chance of appointing one checkweighman for the 62 tips, would you have any objection?—It would be like a drop in the ocean.

1942. But I am asking you if you would have any objection?—Yes. I have an objection on principle. The same thing applies to one as to the whole.

1943. You say that the stevedore checks the trucks?—The stevedore's foreman—the man that is on the ground.

1944. Who employs the stevedores; do you?—No, not in every instance.

1945. In any instance are they employed by you?—In some instances they are.

1946. Do they check the trucks, then?—Yes, certainly.

1947. Why?—The same principle applies. We do the work for so much money, and the stevedore arranges with us to do the work for so much money.

1948. Do they check the trucks to see whether you pay them the right weight?—The same principle applies if the outsider employs them or the importers themselves.

1949. May I take it that they do not trust you?—They will not trust anybody.

1950. But the men are to trust everybody?—The men take an account themselves.

1951. Is not that an unfair position to place the men in?—I do not think so.

1952. A stevedore has the right to check because he does not trust you, and the men have no right to check?—That is your language, not mine.

1953. Why does the stevedore check?—To satisfy himself of what he shall pay the men.

1954. He will not take your word?—We do not give the word. It is not in our hands.

1955. Why does he check the trucks?—To ascertain what quantity has passed over the side.

1956. And to see that they get the correct weight?—To see that they get the correct weight from the merchant after the discharging.

1957. To see that they get the correct weight from those who employ them?—Yes.

1958. You do not extend the same right to the men?—They are paid by day-work.

1959. You said that they were paid by standard?—Yes—or by standard.

1960. (Mr. Larkin.) Have you had a varied experience as manager of a dock company?—I have had 35 years' experience.

1961. In case there is any difficulty on a question on tonnage, the men would have to apply to you, I take it?—You must particularise the tonnage.

1962. Supposing there was a discrepancy in the amount paid, and the men said, "You have not paid us sufficient for these standards" or "this coal," they would have to come to you to make complaint?—No. You do not quite understand. The men themselves make up the tonnage.

1963. I want to understand you?—I am telling you what the men do. The men make up the tonnage themselves, and they themselves make up their slip as to what they should get.

1964. Supposing that there was some difference between them and the weigher, who is the person they would have to appeal to?—To me.

1965. And you have the right to decide the question?—Yes, and I have never had an appeal yet.

1966. (Mr. Wignall.) I have been very interested in your evidence, which, I think, has been a very fair statement. Now, you spoke about outsiders. Would you consider a duly appointed paid official of a trade union an outsider, who had no right to inquire into the weights of the men?—Yes, I should.

1967. And you would refuse to acknowledge him, and you would refuse to give him any information?—Yes, I should.

1968. As a rule, your company are very unsympathetic towards organised labour; is not that so?—I cannot answer that question.

1969. We have cleared up the ground with regard to that, because your previous answer has already answered it. With regard to coal, I did not think that this Committee, after the evidence given, was going very largely into the question, but as a matter of fact, all that you have said with reference to the payment and conditions of labour applies merely to the hoistman, the tipper, and the weighman?—It applies to all the men who deal with coal shipments.

1970. Do you employ the trimmers?—No.

1971. Do you pay the trimmers?—No.

1972. So that my first question is right. The men that you employ are the tippers and the hoistmen and the men employed round about the tip?—Yes; on the ground.

1973. So that the trimmers are a body of men very, very much larger than the tippers and hoistmen and so on, and they have to be paid according to the weights?—By the merchant who employs them, or rather the foreman who employs the gang. He looks after the weights.

1974. All the coal is weighed before going into the ship on your weighbridge?—Yes; that is evidence of contract between the seller and the buyer.

1975. Is it not a fact that a printed notice is posted in the weigh offices, and that they are not allowed to give a copy of the weights to any person or people who apply for them?—No.

1976. Has ever such a notice been posted up?—No, but your question leads to another. I will tell you what we do. What is allowed and what is done is either the captain or the chief mate goes into the weighing office and verifies the weights as they are taken when and how he thinks proper. That is done for the purpose of trimming to some extent, and the foreman trimmer does the same thing. If he puts into the middle hold 2,000 tons a mark is made, or the weigher makes it when the hold is finished and ascertains the weight. The mate goes to the captain to see how he shall trim his vessel.

1977. But you can instruct the weighman in your employ to refuse to give a copy of the weights to the trimmers if you so desire; it is within your right?—I cannot answer in that way, because we do not desire. The foreman trimmer is continually about the vessel and is bound to be there to give orders as to what coal shall be shipped, and he has the entrée to the machine and gets his weights.

1978. Under present conditions there is not much to complain about in the Bristol Channel as far as coal tipping and shipping is concerned. I have admitted that from the first and I will admit it now. The present system is almost perfect if it will continue?—Why do you say if it will continue?

1979. Because the trimmers are not in your employ at all, and they are dependent on those weights?—Yes, subject to their foreman satisfying himself as to the accuracy.

1980. Have they no other means of checking the tonnage?—No.

1981. Then it is at present a mere act of courtesy for them to get a copy of the weights?—I do not suppose that they have any right. It is by courtesy, and we are very courteous and give the weights.

1982. You object to making the courtesy into a legal act?—In that sense, yes.

1983. That is the crux of the whole thing. The foreman is not employed by you at all?—No.

1984. He is employed by the shipper?—Yes, by the merchant—the shipper.

1985. You made a statement a moment ago in reply to a question. You said that the men appoint the weigher and he is one of themselves?—They select the man and he is recommended to us. To give an instance, supposing a weigher gets ill or dies or goes out of the way the other men say they would like to have so-and-so appointed. If he is a scholar and equal to doing the work we have no objection.

1986. You limit it to the weighers themselves?—Certainly, because they are the people interested.

1987. That is the distinction. They are a complete body in the employ. When you say "the men" you mean only the weighers; you do not touch the trimmers?—Certainly. There is no object in their being under our control.

1988. Would you respect the right of the trimmers to recommend a man?—If he was a good man we would put him on.

1989. You would resent the right of the trimmers to interfere?—Certainly. We want to control our own work.

1990. I thought you said that at Cardiff you did nearly all the work?—No, I did not, indeed.

1991. I am glad you correct that. That was what was conveyed to my mind. Outside of coal and timber you say that nearly the whole of the work is done by stevedores or contractors or importers except the supervision by the dock company?—That is right. The contractor deals with all the Norway timber and the importer deals with his own French pit wood.

1992. You have nothing to do with the work with regard to grain, mineral, iron ore, exports of rails, iron, steel, and so on?—Wherever it is necessary to weigh over our machines any of the traffic we are the medium between the buyer and the seller.

1993. You know the names of Jellings, Fletcher, Gray, and Stephens?—Yes; they are all stevedores and take up work from the outside people irrespective of us.

1994. They are all respectable men—you understand that—I only mention the names to show that they are contractors at the dock?—Yes.

1995. With regard to the province of these men you never interfere?—Yes, sometimes when it is necessary.

1996. Do you know whether the men are satisfied with the tonnage they receive when they are employed by those men?—No, no complaint is ever made to me of any dissatisfaction existing between them.

1997. You said just now that the men were satisfied?—I say that because I get no complaints.

1998. But would the men employed by any one of this list of names come to you to complain?—No, I do not suppose they would.

1999. The trimmers would not come to you?—They would have the right to come if they liked.

2000. But would they come as a matter of fact?—If they had a complaint, because I am the one to be appealed to. I am the medium between the men and the contractor.

2001. The contractors take the work, employ the men, pay the men, and in every sense of the word are the employers of the men?—Even the stevedore cannot do as he likes on the dock. He is subject to our supervision. As I said just now, I often have to take up matters that are wrong.

2002. That we accept, as a matter of course. They are there by your permission, but 101 complaints could occur in a week and you would have no knowledge of them at all?—Certainly not—if they are not brought to me I should not.

2003. And the men employed by these contractors may be a very large number and be full of dissatisfaction and you would have no knowledge of it?—You are assuming something now.

2004. But, as a matter of fact, it is not possible?—It is possible. Everything is possible. If the men have cause to complain they know where to appeal to.

2005. When you say that they are satisfied you base your knowledge on the tippers and the weighmen and the few who are directly in your employ?—No, excuse me, I base my reply on the whole of the work of the dock in every section.

2006. Have you ever had communication made to you that the men have been underpaid in their tonnage rates?—What men?

2007. Say discharging iron ore, the men have complained that they are not paid on the full tonnage handled, and after investigation a balance has been paid to them which proves the reason of their complaint?—I am not aware of that.

Mr. J. Hurman.

27 Feb. 1908.

2008. If the men made a statement you would assume that it was true because you had nothing to prove the contrary?—It would hardly be in my province. Iron ore is discharged by the importers at their own wharves, and by a stevedore, therefore it is outside my province to know if there is any dispute. I have knowledge by reason of differences with our company as to their method of doing their work. That is what you refer to, do you not?

2009. That is exactly the point I was getting at. You have answered the question exactly as I understand it to be?—I am not responsible for that; that is outside the dock.

2010. The number of men employed by the contractors is very large, especially in the summer time?—Yes.

2011. And very much larger than the number of men you employ yourselves?—No, I will not say that. You are particularising the iron ore business. That is not very large.

2012. You particularised iron ore, not I. Taking the general dock work at the busy season, the number of men employed by the contractors would be in excess of the number of men employed by your company direct?—Only in one particular, and that is the Norway timber. In everything else we are the larger employers. We have not discharged iron ore for some time by our own labour, but it is done at our wharf.

2013. But you do not follow my question. Taking the general imports and exports except coal, including the Norway timber?—Do you classify under that the coal trimmers?

2014. No. Leaving coal out altogether I said?—We employ the larger number.

2015. You state that?—I do.

2016. Would you be surprised if I said that in my opinion the larger number is employed by the contractors?—I should be surprised, excepting the Norway timber.

2017. Leaving that out?—I make that exception. In other respects we are the larger employers.

2018. Would you contradict any statement coming from the men that there is general dissatisfaction among the men and that they are anxious, especially in Cardiff more than in any other port in South Wales, to get the legal right to ascertain the tonnage handled?—As I sit here now and with the knowledge which I possess I deny that they are dissatisfied.

2019. You have admitted that your knowledge is limited to very few men who have no right to be dissatisfied?—I admit nothing of the kind.

2020. The men employed on Swedish and Norwegian timber are paid day-work rate and it would not apply to them. The men employed on the French pit wood you do not employ and they are paid by piece-work and you cannot say anything about them. The men employed on iron ore are paid piece-work and you do not employ them?—Only rarely.

2021. Very, very rarely indeed?—Quite right.

2022. So rarely that you cannot remember when it occurred last?—You must not make a statement of that kind. You test my memory. Last week we discharged a vessel by our own men.

2023, Up to recently that was done by contractors?—We have always done that for one firm. Sometimes we have seven or eight vessels in for them. Their wharf will only take four, and they come back to our wharf and we do the work then. It happens continually.

2024. I take it that those who do the surplus amount of work for the Dowlais people are employed direct?— —— is the man.

2025. He employs those men and pays them?—Yes, and we pay him.

2026. Does he compensate the men in case of injury?—Yes.

2027. Would it surprise you if I said this is the first time I ever knew, or the men knew, that he was in your employ for this particular class of work?—You say so; I do not admit it.

2028. It would surprise you?—It would surprise me, certainly.

2029. Do you know that the men have always recognised him as their direct employer?—Yes, the contractor engages the men, and finds all necessary labour, reducing his proportion to less than 2*d*. For instance, we pay him 10*d*., not 1*s*.

2030. I understand the principle. You have never had information conveyed to you of any disputes between him and his men?—No.

2031. That surprises me. If the men came to you next week and asked for a copy of the returns of a particular boat, would you give it to the men, as against this contractor?—No, I do not think I should.

2032. (Mr. Harrington.) With regard to the timber boats you first of all pay these men out on the manifest weight?—Yes. They ascertain as near as they can as they discharge what they discharge, and they get subs until the final return.

2033. With regard to the final return, what is your experience?—It does not affect the company. It is a matter between the stevedore, the men, and the merchant. It does not come through our books at all. It is an outside arrangement between parties.

2034. They work up from the manifest first of all?—Yes.

2035. Do you find that the steamers turn out invariably short?—Not invariably; they do sometimes. A dock cargo may get lost and so on. There are many things to account for it, but that does not come into my province really with regard to inquiring into it.

2036. When you have the measurements at the finish, if the steamer is supposed to have had 900 standards in her you have very seldom found out that she had 905 or 906?—I cannot answer that in the affirmative. It does not affect us. It is between other parties. We are paid dock dues on the registered tonnage of the vessel, and the gross cargo is no element as far as we are concerned with regard to ascertaining its value or its number; that is between other people.

2037. (Mr. Wignall.) Have you ever had knowledge of a case where the contractor complained that he had overpaid the men and recovered the money from the men?—I had better give you a statement received from the contractor previously mentioned on that point. He writes to me, "In several cases the ship has turned "out less than the actual bill of lading quantities, and "although payment has been made on less than the "bill of lading quantity the difference has caused a "loss to the stevedore. In one case, 68 standards were "overpaid by the stevedore; in another, 22 standards, "and in another, 14 standards, the stevedore, being "unable to get any of the overpayment back from the "men. On the other hand, when the out-turn is "greater than that upon which the men have been "paid, the men are paid the difference, accepting the "importer's measurement." That is from the contractor himself.

2038. Have you ever known a case where the contractor has deducted from the second week's pay any overpayment made the week previous?—That I do not know.

2039. He has not given you all the information, has he?—He has given me this.

2040. Would you be prepared to go into this matter when we get back to Cardiff?—No, I do not think I should.

2041. (Mr. Anderson.) You have already told us that you have a very strong objection to the appointment of checkweighmen. Have you any objection to its being made compulsory upon your company to supply the correct weights of any cargo discharged on or about your premises to either party interested in having those correct weights?—I must first answer that by saying that we do not issue incorrect weights. Our weights are correct.

2042. I am not questioning the correctness of the particulars when you supply them. I do not say that you have supplied incorrect weights, but have you any objection to its being made compulsory for you to supply weights where you do not supply them now.

I will leave out the "correct"?—I take that as a qualified question. I do not admit that we have incorrect weights. We are not living on incorrect weights, and I object to the term, but I have no objection to giving weights to properly authorised persons who are entitled to receive them.

2043. Any person interested in having the weights in order to settle up their accounts?—The interests are so varied that I cannot answer a general question like that.

Mr. J. Hurman.

27 Feb. 1908.

2044. There are only one or two—the men who do the work and the persons whom they work for?—They have it now.

2045. You have no objection?—No objection to giving what they are already having and what they are entitled to.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. JOHN LAURENCE THOMPSON called and examined.

Mr. J. L. Thompson.

2046. (Chairman.) You are the Assistant Superintendent of the Hull and Barnsley Railway Dock?—That is so.

2047. The general manager of the railway company, in his letter to us of the 14th February, told us that piece-work at this dock was practically confined to the handling of coals and timber?—That is so.

2048. Are there any other cargoes upon which the men are paid by weight or measurement, and, if so, what are they?—None but coal and timber.

2049. You say "practically confined," that is why I ask. What do you mean by "practically," if there are no others?—The other work is all done by day-work.

2050. As to coals, the general manager says that the men engaged in shipping coals are paid at a rate per waggon?—That is so.

2051. But he also implies that their wages depend on the weight of the waggon loads. Will you please explain the system of payment?—The men take the tickets off the waggon sides themselves.

2052. There is usually a ticket showing the weight?—Yes.

2053. Where have the waggons been weighed, and by whom?—At the colliery by the different collieries who send the coal to Alexandra Dock.

2054. Why are the men interested in the weight?—because it is piece-work. They ship the waggons by piece-work.

2055. Are they paid so much per ton?—Yes, and so much per waggon; it depends. If they are shipping the coal by crane, they are paid by the ton, but if they are shipping the coal by the hoist they get so much per waggon.

2056. Are the waggons weighed?—Not at the dock.

2057. But they are weighed at the colliery?—Yes, they are weighed at the colliery when they leave.

2059. Is the weight usually shown on the tickets of the waggon?—I think it is a general thing.

2060. When is it not done?—I have not seen any waggons where it has not been shown.

2061. In the general manager's letter he speaks of the tickets on which the weight "is usually shown"?—Yes.

2063. Those waggons have not been weighed then?—Yes. The waggons are weighed before they leave the colliery, because they are not weighed at the dock.

2064. If the men are paid on the weight shown in the invoice, is there any objection to showing that invoice to the men?—None whatever.

2065. Are the men engaged in unloading timber employed by your company?—In the timber yards, very few.

2066. By whom are they employed?—They are employed by the Hull and Barnsley Railway Company and the timber merchants.

2067. They are employed by your company?—Yes, but most of the men are employed by the merchants, may I say.

2068. I said the men unloading timber?—Do you mean from ships or from bogies.

2069. In any case?—We do no stevedoring at all.

2070. In what way do you unload?—We simply unload the bogies that are loaded by the stevedore. The custom is different from most docks.

2071. How are the men paid for that unloading?—Piece-work.

2072. How is it calculated?—By the standard.

2073. Is the timber measured by your company before it leaves the docks?—The timber is measured by a tallyman engaged by the dock company.

2074. Would you have any objection to allowing the men to appoint a representative at their own expense to check these measurements?—Well, you see we allow the men to have a look at the tally books any time they like, but we never have any dispute with our men.

2075. Exactly; but supposing it was necessary to frame an Act of Parliament for the whole country you would have no objection to the men being allowed, if they wished, to appoint a representative to see the books?—Personally I cannot answer the question; that is a question for the company. So far as the men are concerned we should have no objection to showing the books at any time.

2076. And in that case they would very likely not wish to have a representative. All that the men desire is to be certain that they are getting the exact weight, and if they are satisfied, they would not go to the expense of having a checkweighman?—Of course.

2077. Does your company charge the merchant for the labour of unloading the timber?—Yes.

2078. Are the charges based on measurement?—On measurement.

2079. Would you have any objection to allowing a representative of the men to satisfy himself that the charges made to the merchant and the wages paid to the men are based on the same measurements?—So far as that is concerned I might answer it in this way: that we have no objection to the men, or the ganger (the head man in the gang) coming to see the books; but what we charge to the merchant has nothing to do with the ganger.

2080. It is not the actual charge but the measurement that I am speaking of?—He could see the measurements at any time as far as we are concerned.

2081. Could he see if the merchant was charged on those measurements?—It has nothing to do with the men what we charge.

2082. I want to know whether the men receive their wages on the same measurements as those upon which the merchant is charged?—Yes, because the same account is made by the timber clerk to the merchant.

2083. So there would be no objection to the men being satisfied on that point?—Certainly not.

2085. Would you explain what the differences are?—Might I just say that I have not the particulars in front of me now, but small boards are paid at higher rates than 3 by 9 or 3 by 7 deals. The small stuff takes much more handling, and our piece-work rates have been agreed by the men some time ago.

27 Feb. 1908.

2086. Are the charges to the merchants, and the wages of the men, always calculated on the same basis?—Yes.

2087. So that it would be always possible for the men to check the wages?—Yes.

2088. For instance, you say in your letter that different rates of wages are paid for different operations?—Yes.

2089. Are there correspondingly different charges to the merchant in these different operations?—Yes, There is a higher price charged to the merchant for boards than there is for 3 by 7 or 3 by 9 deals, as I have said.

2090. (Mr. Gordon.) You said with regard to timber that the dock company's tallyman measures it?—Take deals. He takes the account of the measurement. The ganger, as we term him, is in charge of the piece-work gang. He is one of the set. He measures the deals and calls out to the tallyman.

2091. Does he measure to obtain the Petersburg standard?—Yes.

2092. Is he employed by your dock company?—Yes.

2093. You pay him?—We pay him.

2094. With regard to the other docks in Hull, is the practice the same?—Yes. Our work is exactly the same as theirs.

2095. I have in my mind the case of private timber yards bordering on the quays at the docks—Wade's, for instance, and some of the bigger receivers in Hull. They have their own wharf on the dock company's property?—Yes.

2096. Who measures the timber in that case?—Wade's own men; they do the work themselves.

2097. What check has the workman on that measurement?—They have a ganger of a gang. The ganger is the head man of the gang.

2098. He is paid by Wade's?—Yes, by Wade's.

2099. What check has the ordinary workman on Wade's measurements?—He measures the timber himself.

2100. Who?—The ganger.

2101. He is employed by Wade's. I am not suggesting anything wrong against them, but what check has an ordinary workman on the measurement. He never sees it?—The ganger is in a set of eight men. They are all in together.

2102. But still he is on private property?—Yes.

2103. You said that in the Hull and Barnsley case your dock company take the measurement, but it is not the practice in all the docks. There are private wharves?—Yes.

2104. (Mr. Mead.) With regard to this measurement which is arrived at by the tallyman employed by the dock company, is that measurement the one which is accepted and on which the merchants pay you as a dock company?—Yes.

2105. Is it also accepted by the men employed by the stevedore as the basis on which the men are paid?—Yes.

2106. Is it also accepted by the shipowner as the basis upon which his freight is settled?—I do not know anything about that. It is done by stevedore.

2107. (Mr. Sexton.) You can only answer with regard to the stevedore's men and the men employed by you?—Yes.

2108. It is accepted there?—Yes.

2109. You only represent a portion of the dock system of Hull?—Yes, that is all.

2110. And a very small portion?—Not a very small portion.

2111. Have you a map there of the dock company's system?—Yes, I have brought a map, I thought it might be useful (handing the same to the Committee).

2112. (Mr. Bellhouse.) Is there ever any difficulty between you and your men as to the price per ton, or the price per standard, on which they are paid?—No difficulty whatever.

2113. How was that fixed?—The piece-work rates were fixed by the men about eight or nine years ago, as near as I can guess, with the late Mr. Anderson, the dock superintendent.

2114. Is that price list available anywhere?—Yes, I did not bring it with me.

2115. But it is available to the men?—Yes.

2116. It was arrived at by agreement?—Yes, a deputation of the men.

2117. Between the union and the masters?—No. A deputation from the deal carriers came to see Mr. Anderson and asked for an increase of wages. I was present when that deputation was received by Mr. Anderson, who asked me if I agreed to the increase of wages under the circumstances. I said that they were getting extra pay at the other docks and we increased their wages. No one was present but the men themselves.

2118. It was an agreement between the railway company and the men then?—Yes.

2119. Is it in writing; I take it that it is?—Yes.

2120. It appears to me to be as necessary to the man to know how much per ton he is going to be paid as to know how many tons he is going to be paid on?—Yes, and he knows that.

2121. With regard to coal, are the gangs in the separate holds of the ships distinct one from another?—We only ship the coal; we do not do any trimming.

2122. (Mr. Sexton.) You do not do any discharging of timber direct?—We do no discharging.

2123. That is in the hands of the contractor—the stevedore?—What we call stevedores—yes.

2124. Would there be any objection on your part to supplying the stevedore, if he asked for it, or if an Act was passed of a compulsory character, with the exact measurements? Would you have any objection to giving it to him to supply to the men?—May I say that we do not employ the stevedore. The stevedore is employed by the shipbroker.

2125. Do not you measure the timber to ascertain the exact amount of measurement that you carry in the ship?—Yes. We measure timber.

2126. Would you have any objection to supplying that to the stevedore?—If the stevedore asked me how many standards the ship had discharged and I had the information, I should certainly not give it.

2127. That is not my point. The point is would you object to supplying the document showing the exact measurement?—Yes, to the stevedore.

2128. You would?—Yes, because he is not employed by us.

2129. You would object to supplying it?—Yes—to the stevedore.

2130. Would you give us the grounds of your objection?—Just what I have said—he is not employed by us.

2131. I put it in this way: Supposing all the men wanted to ascertain the exact measurement of the timber, and it could be got from you by the stevedore, would you object to supplying it to the stevedore to show to the men?—May I put in this way, please: The proper course for the stevedore to pursue in that case would be to ask the shipbroker how many standards the ship had discharged. If the shipbroker asked the dock company how many standards she had discharged we should tell him, so that the information could be given to the stevedore through the proper course—through the shipbroker.

2132. You would have no objection to supplying it through that course?—No.

2133. You spoke about the ganger taking the measurement?—Yes.

2134. But you do not employ that ganger to give the measurement to anyone but yourselves?—He gives the measurement to us.

2135. As a duty?—As a duty. He knows exactly what is done.

2136. But you do not employ him to give the measurement to the men at the same time. He must give it to you direct?—He gives us the measurement.

2137. You employ him for that purpose; you do not employ him to give it to the men as well?—May I say that the ganger and the men are all what we call one set. They are all workmen.

2138–9. My point is that you do not employ the ganger, who is the head of the gang, to take measurements to give to the men?—No.

2140. You employ him to give the measurements to you?—Yes, so that we can supply the information to the merchant.

2141. Would you have any objection to the ganger supplying the same information to the men?—Certainly not.

2142. (Chairman.) He does now, I suppose?—Yes.

2143. (Mr. Sexton.) And he does it, of course, as a matter of courtesy?—Yes.

2144. He has no right to ask for it?—The men have a right to know what they have done.

2145. You do not object to giving it?—No, certainly not.

2146. Well, that is very good of you. Now the trimmers in each ship are in a majority, are they not, as compared with the men that you actually and directly employ?—As I said before, the trimmers are not employed by us.

2147. No, they are not; but they are greater in number than the men you do employ?—Yes, considerably more.

2148. Could you tell me how they would ascertain the weight?—I cannot speak for the trimmers, really, because they are not employed by us.

2149. If, as you say, the only way in which the weight is ascertained now is by the labels on the waggons, is that the only method by which the trimmers could get to know the exact weight?—I do not think that that question ought to be put to me. Seeing that the trimmers are not employed by the Hull and Barnsley Railway, I do not know how they get their weight.

2150. I will not press it?—I do not know how they get it, and it would not be right for me to answer that question.

2151. Would you give the stevedore who employs the trimmers the weights that you have if he asked for them?—He could get them through the same source—through the shipbroker.

2152. (Mr. Hardy.) You do not know the outturn of a ship in the Alexandra Dock?—We do so little work now in comparison with what we used to.

2153. There is a great deal of overside work, upon which you get nothing, and of which you have no record?—Yes.

2154. Therefore you do not know the outturn?—The grain trade goes over the side, but the deals, battens, and pit props, and boards are all landed.

2155. In a great many cases there is overside work?—Very seldom in timber.

2156. But in grain—not timber?—Yes.

2157. You could not give information with regard to that because you do not know yourself?—No, I do not.

2158. (Mr. Larkin.) On what basis do you charge the lighterage?—I do not know, we do not do the work.

2159. But somebody must do the lighterage?—It is done by the merchant and the "lighter owner."

2160. The point has been raised by Mr. Hardy that you, to your knowledge, know nothing about these charges and that you could not get them. We say on this side of the table that we can get the charges at some place or time?—But you cannot get them from us because we do not know them.

2161. The measurer—that is the technical term—the ganger, has an assistant. Two men really measure. One is calling out the weights and one marks them down. Supposing six men are carrying off or stowing, or so on, what check have they against the ganger?—What I want to impress upon you is this: The ganger is part of the piece-work men 2162. I am aware of that. I have been a ganger myself and one of the men?—He is part of the men as I have said before, and they implicitly trust him. If they want to know the figures he has a little book, and if he strikes 2½ standards off a pile he puts that in the book, and the men at what they call the pipe time look in the books and know exactly what they have done.

2163. Eight months ago in the docks at Preston there was a strike because the man measuring was in collusion with the stevedore?—We never have that.

2164. They are exceptional men in Hull?—The deal carriers in Hull are very good men.

2165. I am glad to hear that, and I wish they were all the same; but we want to apply all round a check in order to know that we are getting dealt with honestly. If it is honest in Hull it may be dishonest somewhere else. You do not object to our having a legal right of access to the documents?—I do not object that the men should have a legal right.

2166. (Mr. Orbell.) With reference to the coal you said that some of the trucks have not weigh tickets on them?—Very few have not.

2167. But still there are some?—Yes.

2168. (Mr. Gordon.) The invoice could be seen?—Yes, that could be seen.

2169. All collieries send a waybill, with the number of each truck and the weight of each truck?—There is no objection whatever to that being seen.

2170. (Mr. Orbell.) There are eight men in the gang, I understand you to say, and they are paid according to the tariff?—Yes.

2171. A printed tariff?—Yes.

2172. You have it in book form?—Each man carries the book with him.

2173. It is a reprint of what was signed by Mr. Pellett and myself with Mr. Anderson?—It was after that.

2174. It was a reprint from that?—Yes.

2175. Do the eight men share equally in the amount of money earned by the gang?—Yes, they share equally with the ganger.

2176. He gets nothing extra?—He gets nothing extra.

2177. I suppose it is to his interest to see that the remainder of his gang get the right weights or the right measurement, because he shares equally?—Yes, he shares equally.

2178. Have you ever had any complaints lodged with you about dissatisfaction?—None whatever from the men.

2179. Or from anybody?—No, it is rather strange but we have very little trouble with our men just now.

2180. Have you no complaints about going beyond a certain height of piling?—No. We have no very large cargoes now; we only have small parcels.

2181–2. But I am speaking with regard to the height of the deals. There is a different price for different heights?—They go six tiers high.

2183. There have been complaints, you will find, I think, about going higher?—I have never pressed our men to go higher.

Mr. J. L. Thompson.

27 Feb. 1908.

2184. There is a different price for the height. It may be six tiers or six standards high. If you go eight you pay more for it?—The men would ask for more.

2185. You would pay more for that?—Yes.

2186. You have gone higher than six tiers?—Not with the Hull and Barnsley. We never ask them to. It is not safe to go higher than six tiers.

2187. It is a matter of record and, probably, you have not gone into that?—I have never asked the men to go higher than six tiers.

2188. Now, supposing one of the gang, not the measurer nor the checker, came to the office in an ordinary business way and asked to have a correct return of the week's work, it might cover many ships?—Yes.

2189. Would you object to giving it?—Certainly not.

2190. If it became law that that should be done you would have no objection to such a law or an order?—If the men came to the office and said that they were not satisfied with the account of what they had done during the week we should say: "There are the tally books, "my lads; let your checker go through the books."

2191. But the checker would be the man called into question?—But may I put it that the checker is employed by the Hull and Barnsley Railway.

2192. Is the checker, who is employed by the Hull and Barnsley Railway, one of the eight?—No, he is not.

2193. And he is the one they would have to appeal to?—Yes.

2194. The man who is one of the eight is only the man who has the rod to measure the length of the deal or whatever it may be?—Yes.

2195. The man who enters it in the book is not one of the eight?—He is not.

2196. He is employed by your company?—He is employed by our company.

2197. Your company pays for the amount of work done?—Yes.

2198. It would be against that man that the men would have the dispute or the doubt if there was a doubt?—Yes, if there was a doubt.

2199. Would you have an objection to one of the ordinary gang—not the measurer now because you do not put anybody to measure, do you?—No.

2200. Strike the measurer out. Now supposing he had some ground in his own opinion to doubt the accuracy of his payment, if he came to the office to whom would you send him? You would give him the checker's book?—We would allow him to look through the tally book if he was not satisfied.

2201. But this man in nine cases out of ten would not be able to understand that book, even if he looked at it, and certainly would not be able to total up the amount of timber delivered or piled, as the case may be?—We would explain it to him then.

2202. Do not associate this particular question with trade unionism. Remove that for the moment from your mind. Supposing that the gang said: "We will "appoint so and so to examine these books." Would you object to that?—Yes.

2203. Why?—Because the man is not employed by us.

2204. But this is the man employed by the gang of men who are employed, who have reason to think that the payment is not correct, and if they are not capable, or the one appointed is not capable, of checking these accounts, would you say that there is no right to appoint a capable man?—We would not allow him to have access to our books if he was not one of the gang.

2205. Supposing that the men said, "We will appoint a Government inspector," for instance, would you object to him?—That is a different thing.

2206. You would not object to a Government inspector?—I would not object to a Government inspector.

2207. If the order was worded that the men should appoint one of their number or appoint a representative to go over the accounts you would object to that?—Yes.

2208. Because the men appointed him?—Yes.

2209. If they appointed the Government inspector you would not object to him?—We could not. If the Government inspector comes on the dock to make inquiries we cannot object.

2210. He comes on the dock at the present time, I understand, to check the accuracy of the scales or accidents to gear, &c.?—He comes to inquire into accidents.

2211. In the case of wages he could not touch your figures. In actual working, now, at the present time no Government inspector, I take it, comes to inquire whether the men have been paid the right number of standards?—No.

2212. If the men appointed a Government inspector to come and inquire, would you object to him?—No.

2213. If they appointed someone, who was not a Government inspector, to come and inquire, would you object to him?—Yes.

2214. Why?—Because he is not employed by the company.

2215. Neither would the Government inspector be?—He is different altogether.

2216. But he comes there as a citizen or an ordinary workman?—Yes, but if he comes on to the docks and inquires into accidents or anything of the sort we give him any information he likes.

2217. At the present time the law says that the Government inspector has the right to come in, but I do not think it says at the present time, although we hope it will do, that the Government inspector has the right to inquire between the employer and the workmen as to the amount of money paid and received. It does say so at the present time?—No, I believe not.

The witness withdrew.

SIXTH DAY.

Thursday, 12th March 1908.

PRESENT:

JAMES SEXTON, Esq. (National Union of Dock labourers).

JAMES WIGNALL, Esq. (Dock, Wharf, Riverside, and General Workers' Union).

Mr. PAUL FIELDING called and examined.

Mr. P Fielding.

12 Mar. 1908.

2218. (Chairman.) You are manager of the derricks of Messrs. Cory and Sons?—Yes.

2219. About how many men do you employ in loading and unloading?—Do you mean at the total number of discharging berths? We have several up and down the river.

2220. Yes?—It might comprise roughly about a couple of thousand hands.

2221. How much of the work is done at piece-work rates?—Pretty well the bulk of it. There is very little that is not done by piece-work. A very slight percentage is done by day-work labour.

2222. Do you pay a fixed minimum wage and in addition a bonus or plus calculated on weights or measurements?—Our payment is by rate according to the kind of coal. Welsh coal has a different rate paid for discharging than we pay for north country coal, and the various grades of Welsh and north country coal are paid various prices.

2223. Is coal the only kind of cargo you load or unload?—Yes, only coal.

2224. Will you tell me your system of paying the men?—As a ship comes alongside so in each ship we put a crane to each particular hatch or hold. Each hold has a gang to work out that particular hold and to each gang we appoint a man whom we term a meter; in other words a checker—a weigher. That man is paid piece-work and so are our gangs. It is then that man's duty on the completion of his particular hold (each hold has a meter as well as a gang) to make out a pay-ticket according to the number of tons he has discharged. He gives his gang that pay-ticket — fore hold, main hold, after hold. Here is one of the tickets.

2225. May I see that please (the same was handed to the Committee)?—Before he leaves the depôt at which he is working, the derrick or discharging berth, he gives the ganger that ticket. The ganger then proceeds down to the Dock and hands it in at the pay window, and not until he hands it in is it our property. When he hands it in he is then paid. The ganger is then in a position to see how much the meter has discharged out of that hold and he can inform his men and the meter is paid the same number of tons as the ganger receives.

2226. That seems a very complete system. Is there any other system that you adopt?—No. The same applies to all the derricks.

2227. Have the men any means of checking these weights?—That is their means of checking.

2229. (Mr. Scrutton.) One of the actual gang?—One of the actual gang. He is the thirteenth man in and is a member of the gang just as the other 12.

2230. (Chairman.) Are your men satisfied with the system?—Perfectly. They have no ground of complaint and we have no complaint, because it is to the meter's interest that he should make out a correct account, otherwise he gets short paid himself if the gang gets short paid. If he made an error and said that he had only discharged 350 tons out of the hold instead of 400 or 450 he would only get paid on 350. Of course we catch a thing like that up because we practically know what a ship's hold ought to carry if she is our own ship. With an outside ship it is sometimes difficult to get.

2231. Are there any cargoes handled by you of which the exact weight is not known at the time of unloading and is only ascertained afterwards when the goods have reached the consignee?—Yes, and we cannot ascertain it even then. If the coal is brought up by our clients in ships, either their own or ships chartered by them, it is impossible for us to know.

2232. (Mr. Gordon.) You do not understand the question. What the Chairman means, I take it, is whether in every case where you discharge a vessel you have the same certificates?—Decidedly.

2233. Whether it is one of your boats or not?—Yes, decidedly.

2235. If the men at any time in the future question the accuracy of that certificate would you object to allowing one of them, or a representative of the gang on their behalf, to see the original documents in your office which show the weights?—No, but these tickets are the original documents and have been in the possession of the men at one time. As I say, they are handed to the gang before we ourselves as a company, get them. As you see in numerous cases they are very dirty where the ganger puts them in his pocket. He brings them to our pay window. They are his property.

2236. Supposing the men had any reason, whether just or unjust, to question the accuracy of the weighman, would you have any objection to the men verifying the figures to be quite sure that they were getting the correct weight?—No, decidedly not—whatever the complaint was.

Mr. P. Fielding.

12 Mar. 1908.

2237. Would you object if a person undertaking the verification was not one of the workmen themselves, but a representative from outside?—We would really prefer the workman himself because the workman has a greater interest in it.

2238. Supposing the workman for some reason or another would rather not make a direct appeal to you, would you have any objection to his nominating somebody else from outside to act on his behalf?—I am not in a position to answer that, of course. I could answer it if at the same time I could say that if it would entail no cost to us, decidedly then we should have no objection whatever. If we had to appoint another man it would mean additional cost.

2239. (Mr. Sexton.) The meters are paid a higher rate than the ordinary gang, are they not?—Let me see; I will consider that. A gang will get 6*d.* a ton on Welsh coal. It works out with a gang of eight men in a hold, at 6*d.*, at over a ½*d.* per ton. Eight men 12 halfpennies. The meter would receive less pay than the gang in a case like that. The meter only gets ½*d.* a ton.

2240. Whatever price or whatever rate you pay on Welsh coal or on north country coal it is all on the basis of so much a ton, is it not?—Yes, so much per ton according to the quality of the coal.

2241. Therefore there is a common basis of payment by the ton?—Yes.

2242. Does not the meter get something extra per ton more than the men?—No. He receives actually, as I say, less, because his is a fixed rate no matter what the coal is. The men go in grades. For a very easy working coal they receive so much; for a slightly harder working coal they receive a slightly higher price; for harder coal still they receive a still higher price. But the meter, never mind whether the coal is wet, dusty, or exceptionally large, and no matter what is the matter with it or what coal it is, receives one rate all through.

2243. One rate per ton?—Yes, per ton. Although the coal may occupy twice as long to discharge, his rate is still just the same rate.

2244. He does not actually handle the coal?—He does not actually handle the coal; he merely weighs it. With the men it is more a question of labour. The harder coal takes a longer time to discharge, therefore they receive more money.

2245. That does not matter much. It is not material to my point. The meter is chosen by you?—Yes.

2246. For his special adaptability to the job?—He is more a clerk than a labouring man.

2247. Is this document which he presents to you a copy of the one he keeps?—He does not keep a copy of that at all; that is made up from his weighing book.

2248. He keeps the book?—He keeps the book. His book is always available for himself or his men.

2249. So far as you know—and I do not dispute it for a moment—that document is an exact copy of his book?—Decidedly; I have no hesitation in saying that.

2250. And you say that it is not probable that the meter would give a false copy to the men?—It would be against his own interest.

2251. But let me ask you, is it probable?—No, it is not probable.

2352. Is he paid on that ticket?—Yes.

2253. The meter is?—Yes.

2254. That is a very good system. Would it surprise you to know that where meters are engaged down in the North of Scotland, men have been paid short on the meter's own certificate?—That could only be done by collusion.

2255. Exactly?—Collusion between the firm and the meter. Then, I take it that at the place where the men were paid short in your instance, the firm must keep the books correctly. Although the men might be paid short, the firm would have an entry in their books which would correspond with the exact amount that was worked.

2256. I have no doubt of that at all, and I am not casting any reflection on your system?—Quite so. I want to prove it. You want additional proof. When our meters return these tickets, we then have to make our return to our city people, and all these accounts such as you have here are tallied then with our wages sheet, which we return to our city office.

2257. I take it that that blue mark on that ticket is your sign manual that it has been paid?—It is not mine; it is the cashier's.

2258. That is what I mean. The cashier does that when he pays the bill?—Yes.

2259. (Mr. Larkin.) How is it that the name of the meter is not on that bill, and that there are only 12 men's names. There are 13 men in the gang?—It may be on. I will not say whether it is before I look at it; but the men draw their money as they complete the work. At the finish of a hold, whether it is three o'clock in the afternoon or one o'clock in the morning or half-past two in the morning, or three, they receive their pay immediately. We have a day and night staff, but the meter draws his money once a week, for his own convenience.

2260. (Mr. Sexton.) Arising out of that, is the meter paid at the end of the week?—Yes.

2261. On the totals of those accounts handed in?—On the total that he has done. He may have done three ships; he may have done one.

2262. He is not paid on sight of that ticket. When that is handed in he is not paid?—No, but it is logged in a book.

2263. At the end of the week you total up and pay him on the total?—Yes. In some cases they draw it at once. We have instances of that. A man may not be in a position to hang out to the end of the week, and he draws his money.

2264. I want to ask you another question. I would like this point cleared up, because I do not think it was brought out clearly and I would like it registered: I understood you to say with regard to cargoes brought up by your clients, that whether they were brought up in full cargoes or not, all cargoes were weighed out under the same system by you?—Certainly.

2266. There never were other documents at the command of the men?—No. These are the pay-tickets that the men receive, and until they produce them they are not paid.

2267. You said that the original document used to be at the command of the men, and I want to know what that is. The Chairman put the question?—May I ask what original document you mean?

2268. (Chairman.) I meant, anything to verify the figures shown on the pay-ticket?—Of what the ship has in her?

2269. Yes?—We are not in a position to know that.

2270. You said just now, in answer to a question, that in the case of the firm in the north of Scotland where there must be collusion, it would be possible to ascertain whether there was any difference between what the men were paid and the other sum, by looking at the company's books; and that is the sort of thing I meant when I asked the question?—The pay-notes agree with our return to our city office. That return is open to the men if they choose to look at it.

2271. (Mr. Sexton.) That is all right; that is what I wanted to know?—And it is tallied down to the last halfpenny on a return of 200 or 2,000. This is a return (showing document) for only one depôt, not the whole of the depôts. The inside sheet gives the labour.

2272. (Mr. Lloyd Morgan.) Have you ever known any case of collusion between the men's representative and the representative of the employers?—In our business?

2273. Yes?—No.

2274. Mr. Sexton referred to one case. Do you know of any case yourself?—Not in our own business.

2275. Or in any other business?—I should condemn myself, for all the depôts are under me.

2276. Have you ever heard of a case?—I might state at this moment that until January this year there was one depôt not under me, and that is our depôt at Tilbury. It was a little too far afield to be under me; but certain irregularities I understand did occur there. I was not told or given to understand what the irregularities were. I could form my own opinion. My directors saw fit to dismiss the manager there, and the depôt is now under my own charge; but it has been shut and it is not yet practically open. We shall be working there this week, I think.

2277. (Mr. Sexton.) I think it is a mistake to call the meter the men's representative. He is your representative?—He is their representative. He is equally his own and equally the men's.

2278. But the men have no direct representative at that point themselves?—Oh, no, they have no direct representative in that sense.

2279. Are you aware that in the north of Scotland, where the very same system that you work, one firm refunded to the men 290*l.* that had been short paid?—No, I am not aware of that; but of course, as you say, a thing like that would be possible in a colliery; but on a ship I should say impossible; because any sane man, a worker, a coalee in a ship, or myself, not a worker, could judge what a ship's hold would contain within a certain quantity. Each tank that comes out carries practically the same, within a few quarters, each time she comes up. Eight men in a gang could themselves tally alone the tanks; in fact it is a common habit for them to tally.

2280. I know it is; but supposing they did that and had any reason to believe that they were not getting paid the full amount?—They would come and complain to me.

2281. Supposing they did tally, and supposing they knew the exact measurement of a hold, if they had any reason to believe that there was more in that hold than they were getting paid for, would it be possible in that case for the men to be a little bit shy of putting the question?—I do not think that they are very shy with me; they are the wrong gentlemen to be shy. I am more shy with them, I think, but still I face it out at times.

2282. You are an exception?—You see I have been intimately connected with our men for the last 14 years. They know me now as well as they know themselves.

2283. Supposing I put it in another way: if the men came to you and said "There was more coal in that hatch than we have got paid for," would that have any effect upon you as regards employing those men again?—None whatever.

2284. Do not you think it is possible that it might have that effect with some managers?—Not under our system; because we have men there that we have quarrelled with many and many a time and who have been with us 30 odd years.

2285. Do not you think that the tendency would be in that direction generally speaking?—Knowing the coalee's nature as I know it, I say no. Never a day, never an hour goes by but what he has a grumble of some sort. He is like the proverbial Englishman who is not happy unless he has a complaint.

2286. Yes, I know that is his characteristic, but we know the coalees, and perhaps we have the advantage of you in some respects in knowing some of the coal contractors too. We have the special advantage of knowing some of the contractors whom you do not know?—Quite so.

2287. Would you be surprised to hear that when men have asked they have been dismissed and not employed again?—No, I should not be surprised.

2288. It could be done?—It could be done; but where you know there is no justification you do not feel sore at a man's coming and making a complaint.

2289. If they were all like you, I think we should not have much trouble?—Our system is absolutely clean and perfect.

2290. (Mr. Orbell.) Is there a weighman employed on every ship?—I have just stated that at every hatch there is a weighman; and not only so, but there are as many as five on some ships; eight with a very very big ship where we can get eight cranes into her.

2291. (Mr. Wignall.) A meter to each crane?—A meter to each crane and a crane to each hatch where suitable. Sometimes we cannot get it into a hatch, the crane does not plumb.

2292. (Mr. Orbell.) Have you the account of the "Nellie Wise" there?—Do you mean any particular instance.

2293. Yes. Take December 16th 1906?—December 16th she loaded, and she discharged December 18th and 19th.

2294. Did she have a weighman on her?—She had the usual weighman. We do not discharge any of our ships without a weighman.

2295. Would the statement that she was without a weighman be untrue?—I can prove to you that she was not without. I have no need to say whether it is untrue.

2296. Would that weighman's returns be correct?—We have them here to show you.

2297. How do you account then for there being something like 200 tons deficiency?—It is impossible with a little boat like the "Nellie Wise."

2298. Have you the amount which she had in her?—Yes.

2299. Would you tell us, please?—The total quantity she had in her? She had the usual number of cranes in her, three, and she discharged a quantity of 1,213 tons, and the gang were paid on the quantity of 1,213 tons. Would you like me to give you the various hatches?

2300. I would like the hatches if you do not mind?—No. 1 hatch put out 176 tons; No. 2 hatch put out 489 tons; and No. 3 hatch put out 548 tons. The difference in the quantity is by reason of the size of the hatch. She is bulkheaded off and is smaller in some hatches than in others.

2301. (Mr. Wignall.) According to the build of the ship?—Yes.

2302. (Mr. Orbell.) Have you the 5th January—the same ship?—I am afraid that I have not that date. She discharged at Tilbury. I have only the return made by our man at Tilbury. I very much regret it, but not being in charge of that place at that time, I cannot give you the information. I can show you the return from Tilbury made by our man.

2303. (Mr. Gordon.) What was the total quantity that she discharged?—On the 5th January, Tilbury, 1,170 tons. The difference is largely because it was a totally different kind of coal. Some ships will carry more of one class of coal than another.

2304. (Mr. Orbell.) It would not be fair to question you on the deficiency of payment at Tilbury. The men eventually got their payment. You have had to get rid of the man who was in charge down there, and you prefaced your statement by saying that you believe there were some irregularities there?—Yes, I believe so.

2305. And that was the reason for getting rid of him?—That was so.

2306. That being the case, I do not think it would be fair, because it practically confirms our case. There was something of the kind or you could not have got rid of him?—I am not in a position to say what occurred there. It was not under my charge.

2307. (Mr. Scrutton.) Your case is not confirmed with regard to the 200 tons on December 18th?—The 200 tons was under my charge. I can answer with regard to that.

2308. (Mr. Orbell.) She was at Tilbury Dock?—The 5th January, but not December. Where I have given you separate outputs of the holds the men are all under my own charge.

Mr. P. Fielding.

12 Mar. 1908.

2309. (Chairman.) Do you know why the man who was in charge at Tilbury was discharged?—No, I do not know absolutely. As I say, I believe there were certain irregularities.

2310. But what kind of irregularities were they? Are we to assume that he was paying the men less than they ought to have been paid?—I have had tales of that sort brought to me by my own men.

2311. Do you know in what way it happened?—No, I cannot say, except that I heard that there were irregularities in the payment of the men. Whether they received less than he made the return for to our city office or not, I cannot say. I was never in touch with the man.

2312. You have not investigated the case yourself?—No. I was never told by my Board and I never asked. If I had asked, it would have been out of my province.

2313. (Mr. Gordon.) Was it ever suggested to you that the difference between the two voyages of the ship was 200 tons and that that was a reason for the man being discharged?—No, never.

2314. The difference was, in fact, 47 tons?—200 tons difference on a boat of 1,200 tons total capacity is absurd.

2315. (Mr. Mead.) Forty tons would not surprise you?—No. Any shipowner knows that a ship will carry 40 tons less of one cargo than of another.

2316. As I say, it would not surprise you?—No.

2317. (Chairman.) You accept the fact that there were irregularities at Tilbury, and that the man responsible was discharged?—Yes, that is so. That was the reason of his dismissal—that there were irregularities.

2318. (Mr Larkin.) The witness says that Messrs. Cory's system is a perfect system, but at Tilbury the system was abused?—The system was not carried out.

2319. The perfect system was not carried out?—The system which we have was not carried out there. I am at liberty to tell you that, because since taking over the place I have found that the system was not such as we have at all our other depôts.

2320. (Chairman.) In what way was it lacking?—Inasmuch as the men never received these pay-tickets from the meter.

2321. (Mr Sexton.) You did not know it?—It was not under my charge.

2322. But did the firm know it?—No, the firm did not know it.

2323. They thought that the system was being carried out?—Yes.

2324. (Mr. Larkin.) Supposing that a representative of the men had asked for the tickets, that would have been found out sooner?—Yes. The men were very lax in not demanding the documents. They had the right and power to do it, and it was very foolish and absurd of them not to do so. The same men come from depôt to depôt and they know that at all the places higher up than Tilbury they receive these pay-tickets.

2325. If the men had asked the gentleman in charge at Tilbury for the tickets he would have sacked them, or not put them on, perhaps?—The head office could be complained to then. They could say then that they were not receiving their pay-tickets, and a case like that would have been investigated.

2326. (Mr. Sexton.) I put it again: would not the men be shy of that?—I should say not. I should not be. Of course you are always in the power of your servants to a certain extent.

2327. (Mr. Orbell.) You say that you are going to enforce at Tilbury the system which you have at the places higher up the river. You will not object, I take it, if the men have any ground for complaint, to their seeing the document?—It is not a case of objecting. I should welcome it for the simple reason that it is to my advantage. If the men do not receive these before they are paid, they ought to do so. They must, in fact.

2328. (Chairman.) You would welcome the men, or the men's representative, having the right to see the documents?—Decidedly, but being only a servant myself I cannot say whether the company would welcome the additional expense if they had to bear it.

2329. There would be no expense?—In that case it satisfies the men doubly and we should welcome it.

2330. (Mr. Wignall.) When you discharge Welsh coal, do you get a copy of the weigh-sheet from the port of loading?—Our city people do, I believe. They are forwarded. In the natural order of events they would get a certificate from the colliery with the quantity on.

2331. From the dock?—Yes; what we might call a bill of lading.

2332. So that they know the exact amount of coal that has gone into the ship, at the port of loading?—Yes.

2333. At each hatch?—Yes.

2334. You pay on what you get out of her?—Yes. The ship is very often discharged before they get that.

2335. (Mr. Bellhouse.) Are your firm's charges based upon these weights or not, do you know?—For what?

2336. For carrying coal, for instance?—Decidedly. Whatever the ship puts out we are paid on and the men are paid for.

2337. (Mr Hardy.) These figures are sent to the city office, I suppose?—In a lump total for the filling. May I explain? It is very simple.

(The witness explained.)

2338. Some of the discharges are done by Messrs. Cory for other people. They are not always coals in which they themselves are interested?—Exactly.

2339. Whatever tonnage is set down here, that is the tonnage on which they themselves are paid?—Yes.

2340. Therefore if there is anything wrong in these figures, so much the worse for Messrs. Cory?—We can only charge on what is put out.

2341. There is no object, therefore, in putting a lower figure here?—No, we should be the losers.

2342. And these tickets, I understand, are actually open to the inspection of the men on the spot?—Yes; they receive them and peruse them before we get them.

2343. They actually receive them and peruse them?—Yes. Each man knows what he is going to take before we get the figures.

2344. If somebody other than the men on the job were to have the right of coming in at the end of the job to look at the figures, that is the thing that he would see?—He would see that.

2345. And he could see nothing else?—He could not see anything else, because that is the only document we have.

2346. And that the men themselves can see?—The men have it and see it.

2347. If then another man came in, what could that other man do to help the men?—He would only be an additional meter. It would be two instead of one on one hold.

2348. The work is done before he could come in at all?—Yes.

9349. Could he have any further information than that which is on this ticket?—He could not possibly. That is all the information.

2350. And that the men themselves can have and do have?—Yes.

2351. (Mr. Sexton.) You say that that is the only document to be seen. Will you take it from me that we do not want the appointment of any additional meters, but we want the men to have the right in case anything happens such as happened at Tilbury to examine some document other than that if they have any doubt. You said that if they had any doubt they could have access to the returns of your own office?—Decidedly.

2352. Is there any objection to the men having access?—There is no objection whatever.

2353. (Mr Hardy.) The men themselves?—No.

2354. (Mr. Sexton.) Supposing the men themselves did not want to come and they appointed a representative of their own, a workman outside their particular gang, would you have any objection to his speaking on their behalf?—We should have no objection to their appointing a representative, but I do not know that we should care to show an utter stranger who had nothing to do with our work the entire method of our working. We have no objection to showing the men, and the men know beforehand.

2355. I do not suggest that you should show him the entire working of your concern, but in the particular case of this hold or ship, if there was any doubt in the men's minds that the return that they were getting corresponded with their own opinion with regard to what ought to be in the hold, and the men did not want to risk offending the employer (not in your own case but in any case), would you have any objection to their appointing a representative to come to see you?—We should not have any objection that I can see, provided the cost did not come on the firm.

2356. There would be no cost at all?—I may say this, since you put it in that way, that if I were of a mind to do it I could far more easily diddle an outside man than I could one of our own gang who know to an ounce what a ship will carry and everything else.

2357. Yes, but could you diddle him if you showed him the exact freightage that you were paid on?—Oh no, and with regard to figures decidedly not.

2358. That is my point?—I follow.

2359. (Mr. Hardy.) Would a man who is not employed on the work and who came in after the job was finished know anything more about it than the men themselves would know who were working at these things?—He would know less—by far less.

2360. (Mr. Sexton.) Supposing he knew less, putting it that way, if the men were content with it you would not object?—No, we should not object if they were satisfied. We should only think them fools for appointing such a man.

2361. They take the risk of that?—Very well.

2362. (Mr. Wignall.) Assuming that the men were all members of a trade union and assuming that there was some dissatisfaction among the men as to the exact tonnage or otherwise, and there was a recognised trade union official whom you recognised at your office as being the representative of the men, would not you prefer the men going on with their work and voicing their grievance in your office through their official than for the men to stop work and see you themselves?—I would heartily welcome a trade union official. I have dealt with trade union officials before and have never hesitated to give them every information in my power. I have frequently given Mr. Will Thorne every atom of information possible.

2363. (Mr. Larkin.) There would be no stoppages if all managers were like you?—I have met with nothing but courtesy from him and I have received every help from him in times of little strikes.

2364. (Mr. Hardy.) We all feel like that, but I want to get this information from you; whether the trades union official would be better qualified than one of the men themselves to examine the account?—No, decidedly not; he would not be and could not be.

2365. (Mr. Sexton.) If they were satisfied you would not object?—No.

2366. (Mr. Gordon.) Have you any intakes and outturns of Cardiff weights and London weights for comparison?—Yes, I have those very two mentioned. An instance was given where the "Nellie Wise" loaded on the 16th of December and discharged on the 19th and put out a tonnage of 1,213 tons.

2367. (Mr. Wignall.) Where did she load?—She loaded in the north of England under the Walker Drops. I cannot tell you what she loaded in each individual hold. She loaded one class of coal only. She put out 1,213 tons. Here is her loading slip.

2368. (Mr. Gordon.) I want the bill of lading; have you that?—This is the loading slip from the colliery. She loaded 1,200 tons.

2369. (Mr Wignall.) Was that an exceptional case?—No. They weigh out to the ounce sometimes. Here is a Welsh coal case, a boat by the name of "Sir Galahad." She loaded in Wales with a cargo of large Welsh coal. She loaded 1,212 tons and she put out a tonnage of 1,231 tons. I can give you another instance, I find. You spoke of the "Nellie Wise" at Tilbury. I can only tell you what our man returned her there. He returned her as having discharged 1,170 tons. She loaded 1,180 tons.

2370. What date was that?—January the 4th, 1907, 10 tons short.

2371. It might have gone to make up the other cargo?—You cannot tell. Sometimes they will come short and sometimes they will come over.

2372. Your evidence surprises me because at the Welsh ports every pound is weighed in?—Do they weigh all?

2373. Every ounce even?—Do not they sometimes weigh one truck and run in a lot and estimate?

2374. (Mr. Orbell.) As we have raised questions with regard to complaints at Tilbury, it is only fair that I should express our pleasure in knowing that the system that prevails at the up-river warehouses is going to be in force at Tilbury?—It is in force already.

(Mr. Orbell.) I am very glad of that.

(Witness.) The depôt is under my charge.

The witness withdrew.

TREASURY MINUTE

Dated 14th August, 1907.

The First Lord recommends to the Board that a Committee be appointed to consider the working of the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons of the 13th February, 1891, as embodied in Government Contracts, and to report whether any administrative changes, especially with a view to the prevention of evasion, the enforcement of the rate current in the district, and greater uniformity of interpretation and working, are desirable in order to enable the objects of the Resolution to be more effectually attained.

The First Lord further recommends that this Committee be constituted as follows, viz.:—

SIR G. H. MURRAY, K.C.B., Secretary to the Treasury, Chairman;

MR. H. DE LA BÈRE, C.B., Assistant Director of Army Finance, War Office;

MR. A. WILSON FOX, C.B., Comptroller-General, Commercial, Labour and Statistical Department of the Board of Trade;

MR. A. F. KING, Second Secretary, General Post Office;

MR. F. W. BLACK, Director of Contracts, Admiralty;

MR. R. BAILEY, M.V.O., Controller of H.M. Stationery Office; and

MR. J. B. WESTCOTT, M.V.O., H.M. Office of Works.

MR. J. J. WILLS, of the Board of Trade, Secretary.

MY LORDS approve.

[NOTE.—On the death of Mr. Westcott, Mr. J. H. HILLIER, Controller of Supplies, H.M. Office of Works, was appointed a member of the Committee in January, 1908.]

FAIR WAGES COMMITTEE.

REPORT.

TO THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF HIS MAJESTY'S TREASURY.

May it Please Your Lordships:

1. We have the honour to submit the following report on the inquiry which we were instructed to make into the working of the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons of 1891, as embodied in Government contracts.

We regret to have to record the death shortly after the commencement of our inquiry of Mr. J. B. Westcott, M.V.O., the representative of the Office of Works. His place was taken by Mr. J. H. Hillier.

2. We have taken evidence from 68 witnesses. Of these 41 represented Trade Unions, and 22 organisations of employers. In addition, evidence was submitted by four ladies on the question of women's work, and by the Clerk to the London County Council on the working of the Fair Wages Clauses in the Council's contracts. The minutes of this evidence are appended in a separate volume.

We have also received communications from the Employers' Parliamentary Council, the Parliamentary Committee of the Irish Trades Union Congress, the London Chamber of Commerce, and the Town Clerks of Bradford, Glasgow, Leicester, Liverpool, Sheffield and West Ham, which will be found printed at the end of this report. (See Appendices.)

THE FAIR WAGES RESOLUTION.

3. What is known as The "Fair Wages" Resolution was passed by the House of Commons on February 13th, 1891, and was as follows:—

> "Resolved—That in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the "Government in all Government contracts to make provision against the evils "recently disclosed before the Sweating Committee, to insert such conditions "as may prevent the abuse arising from sub-letting, and to make every effort "to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in "each trade for competent workmen."

4. The resolution aims at—

(a) The prevention of "the evils disclosed by the Sweating Committee."

(b) The prevention of abuses arising from sub-letting; and

(c) The payment of "current" rates of wages.

5. As regards (a) it may be remarked that the Sweating Committee pointed out that they could not extract from their witnesses any clear or consistent definition of "sweating," and they summed up the position in the following passage of their report (paragraph 175, p. xlii.):—"We are of opinion that although we cannot assign an "exact meaning to 'sweating,' the evils known by that name are shown in the foregoing "pages of the report to be—(1) A rate of wages inadequate to the necessities of the "workers or disproportionate to the work done; (2) excessive hours of labour; (3) the "insanitary state of the houses in which the work is carried on."

6. As regards (b) the abuses intended were possibly such as were brought to the notice of the Sweating Committee in cases in which work was sub-contracted to one or more middlemen, each of whom had to obtain his profit to the detriment of the wages of the workpeople, whose labour conditions might be unknown to the actual contractor, while at the same time the Government Department would have great difficulty in ascertaining the facts and in fastening responsibility upon the proper persons.

7. As regards (c) it will be observed that although the Resolution is usually described as the "Fair Wages" Resolution it does not contain those words; and we think that its purpose in this respect has been to some extent misunderstood.

In our view the Resolution was not intended to set up new standards of wages, but to secure that the wages paid for Government work were those ordinarily paid by good employers to competent workmen in each trade in the district where the work was carried out, and to prevent Government contracts from falling into the hands of employers who were able to quote lower prices by undercutting their competitors in the rate of wages paid.

8. We may also point out that the resolution does not contain the word "district," but that the phrase "wages current in each trade for competent workmen" is in practice (and, we think, rightly) interpreted as wages current in the district in which the work is carried out.

PRACTICE OF GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

9. We will next give an account of the manner in which effect has been given to the Resolution in the contracts entered into by the several Government Departments, and the methods by which these provisions are enforced.

Copies of the various clauses in use in the contracts will be found appended to this Report (see Appendix I.).

A common form of clause which appears in most contracts is the following:—

> "The wages paid in the execution of this contract shall be those generally accepted as current "in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out."

In Office of Works building contracts the following clause is used:—

> "The wages paid by the Builder to workmen employed by him on the execution of works "shall be those generally accepted in each trade for competent workmen in the district where they "are employed, and the Contractor's wages books and time-sheets for all workmen, as far as they "relate to this Contract, shall be open to the inspection of the Commissioners of Works or their "representative at such times as they may think fit."

Stationery Office contracts, in addition to the usual Fair Wages clause, contain the following clause on the subject of Union and non-union labour:—

> "The contractor shall further undertake that in the engagement and employment of workmen "and others required for the execution of any work ordered under this contract no preference shall "be given as between 'Unionists' and 'non-unionists.'"

As regards sub-letting it is the usual practice to forbid the transfer of any part of the contract without the written consent of the Department concerned, and to allow only such sub-letting as is customary in the trades affected.

In dealing with the less organised industries special precautions are taken, and in the case of contracts for clothing, caps, harness, accoutrements, tents, &c., clauses are inserted binding the contractor to keep proper accounts, to be produced to Inspectors who may visit the works during the process of manufacture, providing for the direct payment of wages to the workpeople and not through a foreman or other person supervising or taking part in the work, obliging the contractor to carry out the work at his own factory under penalty for breach and requiring him to post up in the workshop a notice setting forth the Fair Wages Resolution and the duties consequently accepted by the contractor under his contract. It is not to be assumed that all these clauses appear in any one contract. The nature of the obligations imposed upon the contractor varies in the different trades.

10. As regards the methods of enforcing the observance of the Fair Wages clauses, it may be mentioned that the very general practice adopted by the Departments (necessarily with some exceptions) of issuing tenders to selected lists of firms whose trade standing and premises have been the subject of enquiry and inspection, does in itself afford a considerable measure of security that the contracts will fall very largely into the hands of firms who may be expected duly and voluntarily to carry out their obligations under the Fair Wages and Sub-letting clauses. In the inspection of the premises of a new contractor, and in surprise visits to old contractors, attention is given, at any rate in those trades where sweating is likely to prevail, and to some extent in other cases, to the general labour conditions, and instances have occurred of the removal or suspension of firms from the Government list whose workrooms and standard of wages have been unsatisfactory.

In the investigation of complaints the Departments necessarily require some reasonably definite statements to enable them to determine that there are fair grounds for inquiring whether the Fair Wages and Sub-letting clauses of some specific Government contract may have been infringed. On receipt of specific information, the complaint is brought to the notice of the firm and their observations obtained, the name of the informant not being disclosed where such a course would be undesirable. When further inquiry is necessary, it is a very usual practice to send an Inspector to investigate matters on the spot, to see the parties to the dispute, and examine books and other evidence.

As already stated, in certain special cases the contract provides for a pecuniary penalty in the event of the contractor infringing the clause which requires that work shall be done at the factory specified in the tender. This provision, however, is exceptional, and the usual penalty is temporary suspension from the list of contractors invited to tender, or, in more serious cases, permanent removal from the list.

11. As regards the facilities at present afforded to workpeople in watching the contracts it may be mentioned that the names of all firms obtaining Stationery Office contracts are posted up outside that office, and that so far as the Office of Works is concerned its building contracts are noticed in the trade papers, the name of the contractor and amount of his tender being published in accordance with the general custom in the building trade of publishing the list of tenders for most contracts for fairly large amounts. In the case of the War Office, Admiralty and Post Office an arrangement has been made with the Trade Union Congress Parliamentary Committee whereby, whenever tenders are invited, copies of the tender forms are sent to Trade Union Secretaries nominated by the Parliamentary Committee referred to as representing the several trades affected in the various districts. This system enables the Trade Unions to learn when a contract is about to be placed. It is not the practice to disclose the name of the successful tenderer, but facilities are given to authorised trade union officials to inspect the list of contractors from time to time.

ALLEGED DEFECTS OF THE PRESENT SYSTEM.

12. There was some diversity of opinion among the witnesses as to the utility of the present Fair Wages Clause. Some representatives of Trade Unions, while desiring certain alterations in the present practice, considered that the clause had been of very considerable benefit to the workpeople, while in the opinion of others it had been of little use. The employers on the whole appeared to consider that the present arrangements were satisfactory.

Among the matters in regard to which complaint was made by representatives of the workpeople may be mentioned the following :—

(a) The difficulty of providing protection by means of the Fair Wages Clause to the workers in unorganised trades in which a variety of rates of wages is found and no standard rate exists.

(b) The difficulty of applying the clause in those cases where the establishment at which the work is carried out is the only one in the trade in the district in which it is situated.

(c) The employment of women, girls, apprentices, or improvers at lower rates of wages on work which is claimed by fully skilled men.

(d) The subdivision of work, for which there may be an easily ascertainable current rate of wages, into a number of sections, the persons employed in each section being confined thereto and paid less than the current rate for the whole.

(e) Payment for piece work at a rate which is not more than equivalent to the time work rate current in the district, although the output of work in a given time is greater on piecework than on time work.

(f) Fuller information is asked for as to the firms with whom Government contracts are placed, so that the workmen may be in a position to see that the contractor is paying the proper rates of wages.

(g) The methods adopted by Government Departments in dealing with complaints by the workmen are criticised, especially in regard to the delays which occasionally occur before a final decision is arrived at.

13. It is not possible to measure the extent to which the Fair Wages Clause is evaded in Government contracts or the proportion of contracts under which conditions obtain which the organised workpeople regard as "unfair." The alleged grievances are not equally distributed among the various trades. In a few instances it appears to be considered that practically all work done for the Government by the trade is done under "unfair" conditions, while in other trades little difficulty appears to arise.

Information obtained from the War Office, Admiralty, Office of Works, Post Office and Stationery Office, relating to the last five years, shows that the number of cases of alleged infringement of the Fair Wages Clause brought to the notice of the whole of those Departments averaged roughly one per week for that period. These five Departments in the course of a year enter into a very large number of contracts, varying greatly in value, and covering almost every trade, the aggregate value of which amounted last year to about twenty-five million pounds. The cases of alleged infringement brought to their notice may not comprise all that occur, and it should be remembered that the less organised trades in which the workpeople are less able to bring forward complaints are those which are most likely to need watching. On the whole, however, neither the evidence submitted to us, nor the number of cases brought to the notice of the Departments, when the large amount of work contracted for is considered, seems to indicate any widespread defects in the working of the Fair Wages Clause.

ASCERTAINMENT OF THE CURRENT RATE.

14. If, as we have assumed, the principal object of the "Fair Wages Clause" is to ensure the payment by Government Contractors of the "current rate" of the district, the question at once arises—how should this rate be ascertained?

The representatives of Trade Unions have generally suggested in their evidence that the contractor should be obliged (a) to pay the Trade Union rate of wages, and (b) to observe the Trade Union "conditions." By "Trade Union rate" the witnesses, with few exceptions, intended a rate agreed upon with the employers and actually in force; and under Trade Union "conditions" they included the regulation of the hours of labour, the proportion of apprentices to journeymen, employment of boys, women, and girls, and some other matters.

15. The number of such conditions agreed upon with employers varies considerably in the different trades. In the building trades there are few districts in which there are not working rules drawn up and signed by representatives of employers and workmen, covering not only the hourly rate of wages to be paid, but also the hours of work in summer and winter, the additional rate of payment for overtime, the number of apprentices, payment for walking time, the provision in some cases of a mess room, the method to be followed for the amicable settlement of disputes, &c. On the other hand, in some piece work trades little beyond a piece price list has been formally agreed upon with the employers.

16. The Secretary of the London Society of Compositors considered that under the present Fair Wages Clause there was no safeguard against the employer working his men an excessive number of hours per week, or against his employing an undue proportion of apprentices or boys, and he desired the insertion of "Trade Union "conditions" in the contract with a view to regulating these matters (Q. 209-213). His Union had a rule that a man should not work more than eight hours overtime per week (Q. 237) and they also limited the proportion of apprentices to one to three journeymen (Q. 231). He desired the "whole economy of the industry as recognised "by the Trade Unions to be taken into account" (Q. 258).

17. On the other hand representatives of the Master Printers gave evidence to the effect that, while there might be no difficulty in regard to wages, the enforcement of "Trade Union conditions" would make it impossible for a large number of important offices to take Government work (Q. 4454-75). They stated that non-Society houses would be unable to conform to these conditions and that therefore a preference in favour of Union labour would result (Q. 4567). But they would not object to the inclusion in the contract of well-defined conditions relating to such matters as hours of labour, number of apprentices, &c. (Q. 4566).

Representatives of the Engineering and Shipbuilding Employers' Federations also had no objection to the inclusion in the contracts of such conditions as formed part of their agreement with the Trade Unions (Q. 5450).

18. Witnesses on behalf of the London Clothiers' Cutters defined the Trade Union conditions which they desired to see enforced in their trade, in addition to the rate of wages, as the limitation of the number of boys to one boy to five men, payment for public holidays, and the limitation of the week's work to 50 hours (Q. 1004-7).

The President of the General Union of Weavers and Textile Workers considered that the Fair Wages Clause should cover hours as well as wages, so that those firms in Yorkshire who worked 58½ hours a week instead of the 55½ hours which the majority worked, would have to reduce their hours to the standard before becoming eligible as Government contractors (Q. 1284).

Mr. O'Grady, M.P., representing the furnishing trades, and Mr. Dew of the Amalgamated Carpenters and Joiners, desired the incorporation in the contract of all conditions of employment mutually agreed upon by employers and workmen (Q. 1789, 2266).

19. The above examples illustrate the general purport of the whole Trade Union evidence.

Although in most cases the witnesses intended by "Trade Union rate" a rate agreed upon with the employers (or if not formally agreed upon yet in practice generally paid), this was not always the case. Thus the Secretary of the Sheffield Cutlery Council asked that the Trade Union rate should be enforced even if the majority of the workpeople were outside the Trade Union (Q. 2594). Again, Mr. O'Grady, M.P., thought that even if only one employer out of twenty accepted the rate put forward by the men, such rate should be enforced under Government contracts (Q. 1763-8).

20. Apart from the case of a Trade Union rate being in practice obtained only by a minority of the workpeople and not generally accepted by employers, there are cases in which piece rates, even though at one time formally agreed to, have become obsolete. Thus, a manufacturer of brushes illustrated the difference between the old-fashioned method of making tooth-brush handles and the cheaper method employed by his firm and by the largest makers on the Continent (Q. 5059-5077). The new method involves the use of much machinery, and the witness contended that the Trade Union rate for making the handles by the old method would be quite inapplicable to the new processes.

Piece price lists in the brush trade date from 1872, and there are prices set out for "drawn" work which are said to be quite obsolete, the drawing of bristles into household brushes now being done by women after the holes have been bored by machinery, whereas formerly men did the whole work—boring, filling and cutting off (Q. 5150, 5194, 5272).

21. On a careful review of the evidence it is not easy to see in what respect the substitution of the phrase "Trade Union rate of wages" for "current rate of wages of "the district" would enable the objects of the Fair Wages Resolution to be carried out more effectually. As regards the rate of wages itself, where in a given district the Trade Union has succeeded in establishing a rate which is so far accepted by the employers that the majority of the workpeople in that district do in fact obtain the rate, the Trade Union rate is of course the "current rate" of the district, and is the rate which the contractor is under the present form of contract already compelled to pay on Government work carried out in the district.

22. It is only in those cases in which the Trade Union rate is not the current rate that any change would be effected by the proposed amendment; but these are cases in which it is at least open to doubt whether the Government would be justified in enforcing the payment of the Trade Union rate by its contractors. A rate demanded by a Union, but not in practice obtained, or a rate which has been agreed upon only by a minority of employers and workpeople, or which by changes of process has become to a large extent obsolete, can scarcely be the " current rate " intended in the Fair Wages Resolution. It might be found on inquiry that such a rate was so high that its enforcement would render it commercially impossible to carry on the trade. If the Government is to have its work executed at the ordinary market price it cannot require the contractor to pay more than the market rate of wages.

Moreover, where there is no Trade Union the proposed form of clause becomes meaningless.

23. On the whole, therefore, we do not recommend that the words " Trade Union " rate of wages " should be substituted for " current rate." Such a modification of the existing phraseology would, as we have shown above, be either superfluous or inequitable.

24. The proposed enforcement of " Trade Union conditions," in addition to the rate of wages, met on the whole with great opposition from the employers who gave evidence, although some had no objection to the enforcement of such conditions as had been mutually agreed upon.

25. Even in those cases where the Trade Union conditions are generally accepted by employers, it has to be considered whether they may properly be enforced in Government contracts. Some employers consider the conditions unduly restrictive of their freedom of management, and, although they quite willingly pay the Trade Union rate of wages, decline to recognise all the Trade Union conditions. To enforce the observance of Trade Union conditions would prevent many non-Union houses from taking Government contracts, although they paid the Trade Union wages, and the proposed form of clause would therefore give a distinct preference to Union houses.

26. Certain " conditions," however, may well be considered as falling within the scope of the Resolution and should (when generally accepted) be enforced equally with the rate of wages. If, for example, the current rate of wages is 36s. per week, and the working week is generally accepted as 48 hours, a contractor who pays the current weekly rate of 36s. but requires his workpeople to work 54 hours for that amount should not, in our opinion, be deemed to be complying with the Fair Wages Clause, since he is really paying his workpeople at the rate of 8d. per hour, instead of the usual rate of 9d.

Again, when there is an agreement that overtime should be paid for at a higher rate than ordinary time, there can be little doubt that to pay for overtime at the ordinary rate of wages is contrary to both the letter and the spirit of the Fair Wages Resolution, and we consider that a contractor who, although he pays the current rate for work done in ordinary hours, does not pay whatever may be the usual rate for overtime should be held to be infringing the Fair Wages Clause of his contract.

27. A more difficult point arises in connexion with piece-work earnings. In those trades in which both time and piece rates of wages are paid, it is generally recognised that persons employed on piece-work are expected to produce a greater output in a given period than those engaged on similar work and paid by time. Consequently the piece-work earnings in a given period are generally expected to be higher than the time wages for that period. The proportion between the weekly earnings under the two systems of payment is of course not fixed, and it would probably in many cases not be easy to discover an amount customarily recognised as that by which piece-work earnings per week should exceed the standard weekly wage.

28. It was contended by Trade Union witnesses that it was not sufficient compliance with the Fair Wages Clause for piece-work earnings to be equal to the standard time wage for the same period. Mr. Cummings, representing the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, said, " We mean that the day-work rate " shall be recognised irrespective of what men earn on piece-work. Of course they " will earn more on piece-work." (Q. 49). He wished to prevent an employer who only paid 34s. a week to his time-workers, while 36s. was the current rate, arguing that, as his workpeople employed on a Government contract were earning 40s. a week by piece-work, he was complying with the Fair Wages Clause. He contended that the piece-work rate would in effect be based on the time rate of 34s. (Q. 54).

Again, the Secretary of the Scientific Instrument Makers' Society gave an instance of a firm who did not pay the current rate of the district (9d. an hour) but "by introducing piece-work the men earned just a trifle over the rate of the district, and "in that way the firm were able to evade the Fair Wages Clause." No Union men would be able to work in the shop because the day rate was so low. In a district where the time rate was 9d. an hour, the witness stated that his Union would expect to earn 1s. an hour on piece-work (Q. 718-720).

Representatives of the Vellum Binders' Union stated that their members were mostly on time-work and they expected a man on piece-work to earn at least time-and-a-quarter (Q. 1039). They contended that to comply with the Fair Wages Clause a contractor should pay men on piece-work in their trade at such rates as would make the earnings at least 25 per cent. in excess of the time wage for the same period (Q. 1156).

Mr. Cummings, however, thought that 33 per cent. represented on the average the excess of piece-work earnings over time wages and that it would be higher in the case of men doing heavy work, such as smiths and boilermakers and shipbuilders (Q. 56).

29. In view of the practical impossibility in many trades of determining what the proportion between piece-work earnings and time wages should be, it is not easy to see how any rigid rule could be universally applied by the Government Departments. But we think that the principle that piece-work earnings are expected to exceed time wages should be recognised, and that individual cases of complaint that piece-work earnings are not as high as they should be must be determined in accordance with the special circumstances found to obtain in each case. It is clear that in order to compare the piece-work earnings with the standard time rate it is necessary that particulars of the time worked should be available; and we think that records of the time worked by piece-workers should be kept in all cases where there is a possibility of such a comparison with the time rate of wages being required.

ABSENCE OF A STANDARD OR AGREED RATE.

30. As we have already indicated there is no great difficulty in ascertaining the "current rate" of a district wherever there is evidence of a standard rate of wages, either formally agreed upon between the parties or fixed by one party and tacitly accepted by the other. In such cases the standard rate so arrived at necessarily becomes, for the purposes of the Fair Wages Clause, the "current rate."

But difficulties at once arise when no such agreement can be discovered.

The absence of a standard or agreed rate of wages is generally due to one of two causes:—

(a) The trade may be so unorganised, either as regards the employers or the workpeople, or both, that no concerted action is possible.

(b) The particular industry in question may be an isolated one in the district, so that no comparison can be made in the district with the wages paid by other employers in the same trade.

Unorganised Trades.

31. The following illustrations may be given of the cases falling under the former head:—

In the harness trade there was great activity during the period of the South African War and an influx of men into the trade took place (Q. 3445). Since the close of the war there has been a period of depression in the trade, doubtless due in part to the increased use of motor vehicles (Q. 3893, 3944), and the supply of labour has been in excess of requirements. The Secretary of the Midland Leather Trades Federation stated that there is an agreed price list for the saddlery trade (Q. 3447), but that at the present time there are no rates of wages agreed upon between employers and workpeople for harness makers and bridle cutters (Q. 3449-50, 3532).

The Secretary of the Birmingham branch of the Saddlers' Union stated that there had been a decline in wages since 1902 in his trade. For six years before that date there had been a price list (Q. 4370), but at the present time different rates are paid for the same class of work in different establishments (Q. 4366). He mentioned, however, that the facilities vary in the different factories.

In the accoutrement trade there is no agreement between the employers and workpeople regarding wages. The employers are not associated. "Different firms pay "different rates. They make their own terms on account of the inability of "the workmen to force their demands" (Q. 3882-6). The Trade Union representative suggested the enforcement of a price list drawn up in 1890, which is not accepted by the employers, but which he considered was the list in existence (Q. 3903, 3914-7). It had never been withdrawn by the workmen, but had not been enforced owing to the lack of organisation among the accoutrement makers (Q. 3925).

A national price list has been drawn up by the Union of Saddlers, Harness Makers, &c., the Midland Leather Trades Federation, the London Saddle and Harness Makers' Society and the Military Harness and Accoutrement Makers' Union. This list has been submitted to the employers, some of whom, but not the majority, have accepted it. One of the Trade Union witnesses suggested that, notwithstanding its non-acceptance by the bulk of employers, the national piece price list should be enforced in Government contract work (Q. 3922-4).

32. A conspicuous example of an unorganised trade is that of tailoring, the condition of which is doubtless due to the ease with which any ordinary person can soon pick up a little tailoring (Q. 4953) and to the fact that the work can be done at home with very few and inexpensive appliances. An abundance of labour (to a considerable extent alien labour) is available for the lower classes of tailoring, and the workers, who are to a great extent women, many of whom work at home, have little or no organisation to check their tendency to underbid one another. Consequently, although in the better class tailoring there is a pretty well fixed rate of payment, there is no generally recognised standard in regard to the lower class of work (Q. 6457). We were informed that one woman might be paid 2s. 6d. for making a waistcoat, while others working in the same street would be getting 1s. or 10d. for practically the same work (Q. 6458).

Apart from the lack of uniformity of rates the difficulty of arriving at anything approaching a current rate is further increased by the fact that there is no uniformity in the methods of sub-dividing the labour, so that the same garment may be made by different methods in different factories and a comparison of the wages paid in various establishments is difficult.

33. Various suggestions have been made with a view to meeting the difficulties which arise in the unorganised trades owing to the absence of a generally recognised rate of payment which the Government can enforce in its contracts. Briefly the proposals are—

(i.) That the Government should fix in the contract the rates of wages to be paid to the various classes of workpeople engaged for the various operations involved in the work.

(ii.) That a minimum time rate of wages should be fixed, below which no person engaged on the work under the contract shall be paid.

(iii.) That wages in trades such as those in question should be dealt with by Wages Boards.

(iv.) That the contractor should be required, when tendering, to furnish a schedule of the rates of wages and hours of labour which he proposes to pay and observe in the execution of the contract.

34. The first proposal is one which has already been adopted by the London County Council in their contracts for clothing, a "log" or scale of prices, to be paid on work for the Council, having been drawn up as a result of the Report of a Committee of the Council in 1890. Suggestions have been made that the log in question fixes prices considerably higher than those paid for ordinary work of a similar character (Q. 6762), and that as a consequence contractors for the Council have, by employing their workpeople for part of their time on Council work and part on other work, been able to get the latter done at very low rates of wages without depressing the weekly earnings below the normal figure, any deficiency on the private work being made up by the higher earnings on the Council work (Q. 6712). The Clerk to the Council, however, had no information that this was the case.

35. Taking into consideration the very large number and variety of the contracts for clothing entered into by the Government Departments and the fact that they are tendered for from various parts of the country, it is obviously no easy matter for the Government to fix the piece work prices that are to be paid to the workpeople engaged in the various districts. The representative of the National Federation of Merchant Tailors, however, thought that it would be possible to fix a standard pattern (in order to deal with the difficulty presented by the different methods of subdividing work in different shops), and that stringent inspection would ensure that each item was in conformity with the standard of workmanship set in the pattern (Q. 5028). Assuming that the work could be so standardised as to make comparison between the wages paid in different factories working on different systems easy, then a time-log might be constructed, setting out for each item of work the average time required. Payment would then be by the piece according to this log, the rate being calculated by multiplying the time required by the hourly rate of wages.

36. A similar system might be applied to the other less organised trades.

It is thought that many employers in these trades would welcome a scheme under which the Government fixed the rate of wages to be paid on contract work. All would be put upon an equality in tendering (as is already the case in those trades where a current rate exists), and the better class of employers would feel that they had not to meet the competition of those who cut their prices by sweating their workpeople. It might, however, be argued that the Government would have to depend largely upon the advice of employers and workpeople in the trade concerned when fixing the rate of wages, and that if all employers alike had to pay the same rate there would be no inducement to them to prevent an uneconomic rate being fixed, and that a high rate for Government work would enable them to cut down wages on other work. Employers and workpeople might, in fact, enter into a kind of combination against the Government. On the other hand, it must be remembered that if an artificial rate of wages were fixed for Government contract work there would be great discontent among the workpeople with the lower wages paid on other work, and this would tend to make the employers in favour of a rate not unduly high.

37. Whatever rates of wages were fixed in the contract there would still be the difficulty that the unfair employer might get his ordinary work done at sweated rates, the deficiency in the workpeople's earnings on the ordinary work being made up by the higher earnings on contract work. It is true that the Government are not concerned under the Fair Wages Resolution with the wages paid on private work, but it is clear that in a case of the kind referred to the Government are being overcharged for their work in order that other work may be done at low prices by sweated labour. It is clearly desirable to restrict such a practice as far as possible, and this might perhaps be done by insisting that not only should the scheduled rates of wages be paid for the contract work, but that no person's earnings in any week during which the whole or a portion of the working time was spent on contract work should average less than a certain minimum rate per hour.

38. The second suggestion is that where there is no generally recognised standard of wages to which a contractor may be obliged to conform, a minimum time rate of wages should be fixed below which no one should be allowed to be employed on Government contract work.

This proposal has been put forward particularly in regard to women's wages, in which the absence of a standard rate is especially noteworthy; and the necessity for such a measure in the case of unskilled male labour was insisted upon by a witness representing a Trade Union of unskilled labourers (Q. 293).

A method of this kind has recently been experimentally adopted in the case of certain Post Office contracts. It is to be noted also that proposals for the enforcement of a minimum wage appear in the Sweated Industries Bill which has recently been considered by the Select Committee on Home Work.

39. The argument generally advanced in favour of the fixing of a minimum rate in the unorganised trades is that owing to the lack of organisation the lowest class of workers has the least protection against sweating; and the suggestion is that the Government should do for these classes what the Trade Unions do for others. While, however, in the preceding proposal it is suggested that rates should be fixed for different classes of work having regard to the varying degrees of skill required, the present suggestion is confined rather to the fixing of an amount which shall be a minimum for all classes of labour, and therefore by no means a "fair" rate for skilled work but only a rate below which it is considered undesirable for general reasons that any person should be obliged to work—a minimum "living wage" in fact.

40. A general discussion of this proposal, which has of course not been advanced only in connexion with Government contracts, is not called for here, but some of the considerations affecting its application to industry generally may be briefly noted. In the first place the danger must be guarded against of fixing a rate higher than the trade to which it may apply can bear. On the other hand, if fixed too low the rate may very possibly tend to depress higher standard rates already established by voluntary effort: minimum rates having a tendency to become standard rates for all but exceptional workers. For example, if a minimum of 5d. per hour be fixed in London for men, there might result a tendency to lower the rates of labourers in the trades which have a standard rate exceeding that limit.

41. Again, a minimum that may be reasonable for the average worker may be too high in the case of those whose efficiency is below the general level, and it being no longer profitable to the employer to retain their services, they are likely to be permanently deprived of employment.

42. If the minimum rate is very low it is useless, and if high it will tend to make the employer "drive" his workpeople in order to get as much work out of them for the money he has to pay as when the same wages were spread over a longer period.

43. Difficulties also arise in applying a minimum weekly wage in cases where work is interrupted by illness, holidays, slackness of trade, &c., and as regards the fixing of such a wage for Government contract work only, it must be remembered that such work may account for only a portion of the hours worked per week, and it may be impossible to say exactly what portion. Even if the time spent on contract work were accurately known and a minimum hourly rate insisted on for that time, there would be the danger that the employer might unduly depress the rate for the remainder of the week, so that a portion of the earnings on the contract work were in effect applied to the other work done in the week. But, as already noted above, the fixed minimum on Government work might tend to efforts on the part of the workpeople to secure the same minimum for private work.

44. These difficulties might perhaps be avoided by fixing an hourly as well as a weekly rate and requiring that the earnings of any person who, for any portion of the week, was employed on Government contract work should not average less than the hourly rate for the whole time worked during the week, whether on Government or private work.

45. The proposal that a general minimum wage should be fixed has the advantage over the one considered in §§ 34-37 of greater simplicity. There would seem to be good grounds for varying the minimum as between London and the country districts, and for fixing different rates for men and women. Some account also must be taken of age, but there is probably less necessity to fix a rate for persons employed below the age of 17 years, in whose case the conditions under which they work are of more importance than the wages they earn.

46. With regard to the suggestion that the wages in unorganised trades should be dealt with by Wages Boards much that has been said above applies also to this proposal. We have had no definite scheme put before us in this connexion. If the Boards are not to be composed of representatives of the trade in question there would appear to be no advantage in the plan over a system of inquiry by the Government, say through the Board of Trade, either directly by the Department or by an arbitrator appointed by it. If the Boards are to be composed of representatives of employers and workpeople in the trades concerned, there is considerable difficulty in selecting persons to represent trades that are unorganised.

47. It is of interest to note that there is at any rate one instance of the establishment of machinery of this kind for Government work. A joint committee of contractors and operatives is in existence in the boot and shoe trade, which has drawn up a list of prices for the various kinds of boot and shoe work for which the Government contract. Any revision that may be found necessary in the list and the determination of prices for new patterns are carried out by this Committee, questions on which they fail to agree being referred to an umpire. But it is to be noted that the boot and shoe trade is not unorganised, and that the Government work is almost confined to one district; and these circumstances make the formation of such a Committee a fairly easy matter.

48. It would not, however, be practicable to set up a general system of Wages Boards to deal with Government contract work only, and the matter appears to be one that does not call for separate treatment, but to be part of the general question of the institution of Wages Boards for all classes of work, a question to which considerable attention has recently been given, and which need not be discussed here.

49. The previous suggestions have involved the fixing, by different methods, of rates of wages. A proposal of a rather different kind is that when contractors are invited to tender they should be required to submit a schedule of the rates of wages and hours of labour (in the case of time workers) which they propose to pay and observe in the execution of the contract.

50. A system of this kind is in operation in connexion with some* of the contracts for work for the Canadian Government. In this case the contractor states the rates that he would be prepared to pay to all persons who might be engaged on contract work. The statements are submitted to the Canadian Department of Labour, which either certifies its approval of the rates, or, when they are regarded as unfair, itself specifies the minimum rates. In the latter case the contractor is informed that until he makes an agreement securing the payment to his workpeople of the rates specified, his tender will not be considered.

51. It was considered by some witnesses that if the contractor were obliged to submit with his tender particulars of the rates of wages that he was prepared to pay, this would deter him from submitting excessively low rates (Q. 5012). The schedules of rates sent in could be considered by the Department when allotting the contract, and if the rates were thought to be too low the tender could be rejected without any more explanation being required than if it had been declined on any other ground.

52. It is possible that the piece-work prices sent in might, with a few exceptions, be very nearly alike and then the course might be adopted of disregarding those exceptional tenders which were based on rates of wages appreciably below the average. Although, however, the average rate in a case such as this might be a fair rate and the acceptance of a tender based on a rate approximating to it would be justified, it could not be assumed without investigation into the different systems of working and the relative facilities afforded to the persons employed that a rate considerably below the average was necessarily unfair. The lower rate might in fact yield better earnings than the average, owing to the difference in methods of manufacture.

On the other hand it is conceivable that the range of the prices sent in might be very wide and so distributed that no predominant rate emerged, in which case it would be difficult to say which should be regarded as fair.

Further complication would arise, if tenders were received from different districts, in taking into account the variation in wages as between one district and another.

If any scheme of this character were adopted it would be necessary to inform the contractor that in accepting his tender the Government did not thereby signify approval of the rates of wages submitted and that, if at any time it could be clearly shown that a current rate of wages existed for work similar to that under the contract, he would be under the obligation of paying not less than the current rate.

53. We are disposed to think that in the case of trades which can be identified as unorganised, or in any other cases in which the Department concerned considers that difficulties are likely to arise in ascertaining the "current rates," one or other of the proposals referred to in § 33, or some combination of them, might be adopted according to the nature of the case.

* In other contracts a "fair wages schedule," drawn up by the Canadian Labour Department, is inserted in the tender forms, and the contractor agrees to pay the rates set out in the schedule for the various occupations engaged. These rates are stated to be "based on the rates prevailing in the localities in which the work is done, and where there are no such prevailing rates obtainable, then on what might be considered a fair and reasonable rate, due regard being had to the cost of living in the localities concerned." (Report of Canadian Department of Labour for the fiscal year ended March 31st, 1907, p. 82).

Isolated Factories or Works.

54. We now pass to the second class of cases in which there is no "current rate of the district," viz.:—those in which the absence of a current rate is due not to the generally unorganised condition of the trade as a whole, but to the fact that the district is one in which only a single employer is engaged in the trade in question.

55. In these cases the suggested substitution of Trade Union rate for current rate does not diminish the difficulty. It has therefore been suggested that the Trade Union rate of the nearest town in which there is such a rate in operation should be enforced in all cases where there is no Trade Union rate in the district in question.

56. There is an obvious difficulty in connection with this proposal. The nearest town in which similar work is being done may be at a considerable distance, and the conditions may be very different there. The proposal might, to take an extreme case, involve the payment of London rates of wages in a country village in Essex, without any regard to the difference in the cost of living and the generally lower level of wages in rural districts. On the other hand, cases might arise in which a factory was set up in a large town where previously the trade had not been carried on, the nearest factory doing similar work being in a much smaller town where wages generally were lower. The rate of the nearest town might in this instance be one that would be regarded by the workpeople as too low for the new factory in the larger town.

As examples of concrete cases which have arisen in actual practice may be mentioned factories at Rugby (Q. 772), Worcester (Q. 775), and Walsall (Q. 696), at which it was suggested by the Trade Union witness that the Birmingham rate of wages should be enforced, and at Hemel Hempstead, for which the London rate was claimed (Q. 1079-81).

57. The proposed rule that the rate of the nearest town should apply in cases where there is no Trade Union rate is one which probably the Unions do not in practice attempt to enforce to any great extent. It is more probable that in most cases some regard is paid to local conditions when a Trade Union is endeavouring to agree upon a rate of wages with the employers, and there appears to be no good reason why Government contract work should be put upon a different footing. It was suggested by some Trade Union witnesses that employers generally might welcome such a rule, as the majority have to meet the competition of those who remove their factories to country districts with a view to cheapening cost of production (Q. 27), but it is open to doubt whether this opinion is well founded.

58. It was also suggested that the effect of the proposal, if adopted, would be to hasten the conclusion of an agreement between the employer and the Trade Union as to the rate of wages to be paid; but it may be remarked that the operation of the suggested rule would induce the employer to come to an agreement with the Union only in those cases in which the rate of the nearest town was higher than he was prepared to pay, in which case the rule would be no inducement to the Union to agree upon any lower rate, seeing that in the absence of an agreement the rate prevailing in the nearest town would have to be paid.

59. The opinion of the employers appeared to be that works were not set up in country districts with a view to depressing the rates of wages and that the employer in such cases was not able to do as he pleased, but that the wages would be fixed by supply and demand, restricted to some extent by public opinion. If rates were cut too low the matter would "cure itself" (Q. 4441-5). A master builder informed us that on work in country districts (e.g., on Salisbury Plain) he had had to pay rates of wages above those of the nearest town in order to induce the men to take up the job (Q. 4826), but this case is, of course, different from that of a factory permanently established in a rural district and employing workpeople domiciled in the neighbourhood.

60. The movement of factories to country districts is due partly to the lower expenditure on rent and rates as well as to the lower rates of wages outside the large towns. This movement, which appears to be making considerable progress in some trades (e.g., printing), is moreover one that is in many ways desirable from the point of view of social conditions. It cannot be denied, however, that the establishment of a factory in a country district, whatever be the intention, does in fact frequently deprive the workpeople of the power of collective bargaining, and withdraws safeguards which are available in more populous and better organised districts. Nor does the present Fair Wages Clause afford any protection to the workpeople engaged on Government contract work in such a factory. The factory being isolated and not surrounded by others with which it can be compared, the phrase "current rate of wages," so far as it means anything at all, can refer only to the rate paid at that factory, so that the clause gives no independent standard with which to compare the wages paid.

61. Where a trade is well organised on both sides and is widely spread it is probable that the difficulty could to a large extent be got over by the employers' Association and the workmen's Union agreeing upon minimum rates of wages for those country districts for which there are no wages agreements in existence. Probably it would be found that the same rate could be applied to a large area covering two or three counties, with the exception of the large towns situated in those counties. If it appeared that the rate of wages so determined met with general acceptance there would be some ground for enforcing the agreed rate on Government work carried out in an isolated factory situated in one of the large rural areas in question. The area agreed upon by the organised employers and workpeople might be regarded as the "district" for the purposes of the Fair Wages Clause, and the agreed rate might be enforced in the case of the isolated factory on the ground that it was the rate current in the district so defined.

62. How far such a course would be practicable would depend on the strength of the organisations of employers and workpeople. It is clear that if the latter fixed minimum rates of wages for areas over which they had no effective control, the rates which they had determined might be disregarded by a non-associated employer who set up works in such an area and employed non-union workpeople, and cases might arise in which the majority of the workpeople in an area were not receiving the rate determined by the organisations, which therefore could not be enforced as the current rate of the area.
